Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras ceded Districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, to put this matter in ordinary common language is better I think than using legal phraseology. When an offence is committed, an investigation proceeds. That is, policemen come there, examine the various people, take down their statements, write down what those men tell them. So they go on for a number of days. Latterly, they believe that a particular man is guilty of the offence and put him up before the Magistrate in the first instance in serious cases. When the accused person comes before the Magistrate, he or his pleader wants to know on what materials he is placed before the Magistrate, on what materials he is charged with this serious offence. He asks the Magistrate. The Magistrate says, "I do not know. You will learn. Witnesses will speak in Court and then you will learn." The witnesses do speak. The accused or his adviser believes that the witnesses at that time have improved their story, or to fit into other circumstances, are giving an altogether different story from what they told the police at the earlier stages, that is, before they had time to cogitate, to think and to find out the consequences of their statements. That is they make their story fit in with other circumstances, from the unimpeachable circumstances, which have transpired. Now these are the conditions in which often times an accused person is placed. Then it becomes very important and material to know what these witnesses had in the first instance told the police and it is then that an application is made to the magistrate to see the originals, that is the statements where these depositions are recorded. Now looking at that position, I think in the interests of justice an accused person must have the right, not as a matter of discretion of the magistrate, to see what is it in black and white made at a very early stage, when there was no opportunity to coach up the witnesses or to improve or to embellish their statements. Now, I ask, apart from all technicality and apart from other arguments, is it or is it not fair to give the accused person a chance, as much chance as the prosecution has at that stage. Now what is the harm. If your policemen have been doing their duty honestly what is the harm in telling the accused what they have done. Should the law be made enacted in a manner to shield a slovenly policeman or a dishonest policeman or an over-zealous policeman? Why should you give that opportunity? I say nothing will be lost. Justice will not suffer if you show the accused person the earlier statements recorded in writing by the policeman who made the investigation of the offence and if those witnesses have swerved from what they had said substantially, well the magistrate or the court will be in a position to judge of their veracity. If the swerving is slight in some matter of minor detail, then also the Court will see that the change is not of substance. Therefore it seems to me on grounds of ordinary justice it is fair that the accused person should have the right, not merely at the discretion of the magistrate which will vary and which we have never found exercised properly on occasions like this, to inspect these statements. Now, Sir, I have for a large number of years had direct experience of trials and inquiries. I know this was one of the sore points in every magisterial inquiry and in every Sessions trial. Some judges used to read these diaries, those who have some patience. These statements are recorded in the vernacular. Most of the judges are not able to read the originals in the vernacular. They would not therefore take the trouble to read these early statements and to ask a judge to read those statements and then tell me whether in the interests of justice I should get it or not is too much to ask of a judge in the hurry, in the hustle and in the pressure of a trial. You cannot ask a judge to read all these illegible manuscript documents and tell you whether they are important or not. You cannot ask that. Therefore, I think this provision has been very considerably misused. The accused person till a very very late stage is not in a position to know what the materials against him are,—and what is the good of a trial like that? And what happens? Justice fails in the original Court, and in the appellate Court, by the help of counsel and others there, things are raked up, re-trials are ordered, or convictions are upset, and all this delay, all this annoyance and worry is caused. Therefore I think in the interests of justice it is better to give the right to the accused person. There is one other argument which I feel strongly, and it is a strong argument in support of this request, and it is this: you will make the policeman write down, take down statements with greater care; he will not write them out in an indifferent manner. He will know that these statements will be brought up before the Magistrate, and therefore in taking down these statements he will take them down with care, with precision. And now what happens now in these times? Things are mixed up; there is one paragraph of the statement, and two or four paragraphs of information, opinion and suspicion,—and all to the prejudice of the accused person. And when the judge reads it all, he naturally gets prejudiced against the accused because there are so many things against him, which cannot be evidence in a Court, embodied in that diary. He is told, the accused is a notoriously bad man; he is a great gambler. All these impressions are formed. So it is a salutary thing if you will allow, as a matter of right, the inspection of these documents, for then the police will enter in these statements only useful matter, and if he has got opinions and impressions, he will record them in another place, and so the two will be separated, and what the accused gets will be a mere statement. What is a confidential document will be a confidential document and no inspection of it will be claimed. It will work in the interest of the efficiency of the police, for the integrity of the work, and also it will save a lot of unnecessary worry and annoyance to the accused.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: I move, Sir, that the consideration of this section be adjourned.

Mr. Chairman: It will automatically be adjourned at Four.

Mr. Jannadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): I move that the question be put. (Cries of 'No, no.')

Dr. H. S. Gour: I understand, Sir, that the matter will automatically close for the day as soon as it is Four of the Clock.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): I venture to make a suggestion which will cut short this discussion,—that 'shall' should be changed into 'may.'

Dr. H. S. Gour: I rise to a point of order. I understood the Honourable the Law Member to indicate a desire to compromise this matter with Members on this side of the House; and if I understood him aright, he was in a compromising mood. We also are anxious that there should be a settlement, so that the official bludgeon may not descend upon the non-official Members on this side of the House; and I therefore submit that we should give the Government a little more time to think. They will come better prepared to meet our wishes at the next sitting. I therefore submit that it is one of those cases in which nothing is lost in giving time.

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.

APPOINTMENT OF A ROYAL COMMISSION ON CIVIL SERVICES.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order. The Council will now proceed to discuss the motion for adjournment of the House to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the decision of His Majesty's Government to appoint a Royal Commission on the Civil Services in India.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): I rise, Sir, to move the adjournment of the House to consider the announcement made yesterday by the Honourable the Home Member that His Majesty's Government in England have decided to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the financial and other conditions of the Civil Service.

Before I proceed very much further, Sir, I should like to advert to a sentence in the letter of Mr. Montagu—one of the greatest friends of India—which he addressed to the London "Times" on this subject. Speaking of the Legislature in relation to the Civil Services, he says, that the Legislature has very often exhibited hostility to that Service and has occasionally used violent language towards it. I am sorry that such a good friend of India should be so unfair to the Members of the Legislature. Sir, during my career as a Judge of the High Court I have worked with many Civil Servants. I have very many friends among them even to-day; I have supervised their work. I say with confidence that they are good friends, loyal colleagues and willing subordinates. They have done exceedingly good work in the past and I have no doubt they will continue to discharge their duties as efficiently and as willingly in the times to come. In fact, Sir, when I look at the Treasury Bench, which contains such a large number of Civil Servants in this House, which is supposed to be a popular Assembly and when I find how wholeheartedly they give their time and intellect to the work, I have every hope that the Civil Service in the years to come will discharge their duties even better than they did in the past. Therefore, Sir, I do not expect that any friends of mine, certainly not myself, will use any language which will be hostile to the Civil Servants and which would show that we are not willing to treat them justly and generously. Sir,

[Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar.]

I doubt whether this move on the part of His Majesty's Government is in the interests of that Service. I am inclined to think that the best minds in that Service do not like an inquiry of this nature as that would antagonize the Indian people and would probably not result in any good to them.

Look at the matter, Sir, from the point of view of the mode in which this announcement has been made; look at the time of the announcement; we have been asking for the Indianization of the Services; a Circular has been sent round for eliciting opinion on that question. It is only yesterday, or day before yesterday, that a bombshell was thrown by the Secretary of State's decision not to make any further advance in regard to constitutional reforms. The financial position of the country is very unfavourable; and at this period, and at this time to have resolved upon appointing a Commission with the avowed object of making the position of the Civil Servants better financially is a step which is calculated to damp the ardour of the most earnest amongst us who want to befriend the Civil Service. Sir, is there any country which enjoys self-Government in which such an idea has been entertained? I think I am right in saying, Sir, that the idea of appointing a Royal Commission is opposed to the pronouncement made, time after time, in the Houses of Parliament; it is opposed to the Preamble of the India Act; it is opposed to the language used by Mr. Montagu at the time when he made the famous pronouncement. What does the Preamble to the Act say? It says that Indians should be increasingly associated with Europeans in the service of the country. It also says that the object of the Parliament is to develop the self-governing capacity of the people with a view to progressive realization of responsible Government in this country. Now, Sir, I ask the question, is it possible to have progressive realization of responsible Government in this country if the Indian Government and the Indian people are not to consider the pay and prospects of the services, but that Parliament should appoint a Commission to consider the grievances and the conditions of service of the Europeans. What does it come to? It means this, that these European Civil servants will have their pay fixed by a body outside India, although they will have to work under Ministers who represent the people of this country. Now, is that a position which can be contemplated with equanimity—a service which will be irremovable, which will have its pay fixed by an outside body, to work under the people's Ministers? That would mean that the Ministers can have no control over them. Certainly that is not the way by which you can facilitate “progressive realisation of self-Government in this country.” I began by asking is there any self-governing country in which such an idea has been entertained or could be entertained? Certainly you do not find in the self-governing Colonies any attempt made by the British Parliament to impose a civil service on them. I was reading, Sir, the other day an interesting debate in the House of Lords on the question of the civil service in Ireland. An amendment was moved in these terms by Lord Glanaway.

The amendment was:

“The civil servants in Ireland should have a statutory right to compensation on retiring owing to the change of Irish Government.”

This was opposed by the Government, and there were not half a dozen Peers to stand up for this proposition. That shows that in the House of Lords such an idea was considered to be too ridiculous to be pressed for a division. In this country however without consulting the Legislature, without understanding our views on this matter, already a decision has been come to that there must be a Royal Commission to examine into the grievances of civil servants. Sir, I must point out at this stage that if a Commission is appointed the inquiry will be practically one-sided. The whole country has been against the appointment of a Commission and it is not right to expect that we, the representatives of the people, would co-operate with a Commission which may come out here for the purpose of making such an inquiry. It is impossible to think of any co-operation being given to a Commission which has been forced on us. The country from one end to the other has raised its voice against this step and if against our will, notwithstanding our protest, a Commission comes, it will find that we are not prepared to co-operate with them; the whole inquiry will be one-sided and will have no effect upon the people or on the Government. Sir, if a Commission is necessary, there are means by which it can come into being. Why should not the powers given under the Government of India Act be availed of? There is section 96B. (A voice: '96C.') yes, 96C thanks which enables the Government to appoint a Public Services Commission which can go into the question of pay, prospects and pension, etc., of the services. If that is done, the Legislature will have a voice in the matter; then there will not be as much grievance as we have now. Instead of availing themselves of the powers given under the Government of India Act, against the teeth of that very power, an outside body has resolved upon appointing a Commission which the people do not want and which the Legislature resents. Sir, as there are a large number of my friends who wish to speak on the subject, I do not want to take up much more time. But I must say this that there has been a feeling in this country, and the feeling is growing, that the Conservative Government at home is not friendly to Indian reforms, Indian progress. The practical dismissal of Mr. Montagu was at the instance of a large number of Conservative Members of the House of Commons. Ever since his disappearance from the India Office, we have heard of attempts being made by Whitehall to limit and to resist any attempt made by the Government of India to give to the people of this country more privileges. It has been said, times without number, that mandates have come from Whitehall to stop attempts made by the Government on the spot to take the people into their confidence and to invest them with larger powers. These apprehensions exist, and the people call to memory that in the old days the Conservative Government have never shown itself friendly to progress in this country. Sir, this attempt on the part of the present Government to force upon us a Royal Commission which the people do not want is another instance in point. They want to prevent, as far as possible, all attempts at reforming the constitution. They may say, Sir, that they will not go back on the pronouncement made by Mr. Montagu. They may say that the preamble of the Act is there and that they will give effect to it. They may keep themselves within the letter of the law, but the spirit to carry the people with them, the spirit to assist the people in obtaining responsible self-government is certainly not in evidence, and I am sorry that Lord Peel should have fallen into the mistake of appointing this Commission, which is certainly ill-advised and uncalled for. For all these reasons I move that this House shall adjourn as a protest against the appointment of the Commission which was announced yesterday.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, in supporting this motion, I desire in the first instance to convey our thanks to the Honourable the Leader of the House for making as early an official announcement here as he could and thus giving us an opportunity of entering a strong, I shall not add indignant, protest at the way that this Commission is proposed to be appointed. It emphasizes Lord Curzon's pronouncement that the Government of India is but a subordinate branch of the British Government. Well, I rubbed my eyes hard when I got a copy of the pronouncement, thanks again to the courtesy of the Home Member, and I asked myself what the authority and the constitution was under which this Commission was going to be appointed. At one time it had occurred to me that the authority was what Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has referred to—section 96 (c) of the Government of India Act. Well, whoever is responsible for the decision, and we are considering the decision now because the appointment has not yet been made, was however wide awake. Section 96 (c), clause (2), gives authority to the Public Services Commission mentioned there to discharge in regard to recruitment and control of public services in India such functions as may be assigned thereto by rules made by the Secretary of State in Council. The bomb thrown two days ago has been spoken of by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. That is the Despatch of the 2nd of November, published here on the 24th. But it was a bomb that was well expected. In that Despatch occurs memorable advice to the Legislature to explore the structure of the present elastic constitution for development within the limits of what would be probably called expanding conventions. The Secretary of State himself however did not explore what was provided for under the Government of India Act. Though near upon three years have elapsed the rules contemplated in section 96C and the Commission suggested there have yet to come. Supposing, Sir, this Commission and the rules were there, as they should have been long ago, and if the Services made their grievances known through the usual channels, what would there have been to prevent "two people sitting down of a morning," as Lord Islington puts it and setting right those grievances in the light of growing exigencies and changing circumstances, economic and otherwise? In 1915, at the expenditure of near upon six lakhs of public money, and three years of time, the Public Services Commission made recommendations which were published in 1917. What has happened since? The question of percentage whether of 25 or 33 per cent. or something else has been somehow dealt with. Though we are not satisfied with the percentage, we are waiting and watching. That is not what is troubling those who are responsible for this Royal Commission. Questions of pay and prospects, statutory security, thereabout and, adroitly enough, the question of Indianisation have been more or less vaguely introduced in this scheme which probably could not be done by the machinery under section 96C of the Government of India Act. The country will probably be called upon to pay another six lakhs. I should like to know what the Honourable Sir Basil Blackett or the House will have to say in regard to that or whether the charges are to be borne by the Secretary of State or the British Treasury. Sir, the Retrenchment Committee is sitting. Supposing, like the Bengal Retrenchment Committee, this Committee were to suggest a lower scale of pay right through and the Royal Commission makes other recommendations, where shall we be? How are these not unlikely extremes to meet? It is more than inopportune, therefore, it is unfortunate that, without taking all these circumstances into consideration, without invoking in the first instance the machinery at the disposal of the Secretary of State, this Royal Commission should have been decided on. Who is in its favour? Is the public opinion in India in its favour? Is the thinking public opinion, as voiced in the Press—Indian and Anglo-Indian—in its favour? Are men who know all about these things, men like Lord Islington, who has dealt with the question of the public Services, here, fully in its favour? No. Mr. Montagu has no doubt indicated that an investigation is necessary; that may be in his own justification. But there is other machinery for investigation than a Royal Commission. Why, for example should not that investigation have been made by a Committee like the one which your (Mr. Rungachariar's) intended motion in this House suggested that the Government of India should undertake as the Secretary of State has failed to appoint his Commission under section 96C of the Act. Are we quite sure again that the Services like it? My friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, has suggested that they do not; that is my belief also. The chances on the other hand are that under the Fundamental Rules and many other rules which we very little understand they are really not doing badly, some of the gain may not bear examination.

Then, Sir, there is the question of reconciling public opinion. We had only two days ago the dietum about its being "too early to think of revising or going back upon what has been done." The very significant word "now" comes in this announcement. Within two months of the Secretary of State's pronouncement that certain other things of a revisionary nature are not to be undertaken because of things that are not before the public.

Is the Government of India in favour of this Commission? Of course, the Government of India will never tell us. Yesterday, however, in another place, not very far from here, it was suggested that the Government of India did not like this Commission and was in fact opposed to it, and I believe that that was not denied, certainly not stoutly denied. (Mr. N. M. Samarth "Not categorically denied.") Not categorically denied. I am thankful to my Honourable friend for that suggestion. If my reading of the situation is correct, if the Government of India is opposed to it, if the thinking Indian public is opposed to it, if men like Lord Islington are opposed to it, if the Service itself as some of us think, is opposed to it, where is the necessity, or justification, where is also the authority under the constitution for this Commission?

Sir, belittling of and constant interference with the Government of India does not and cannot make for progress. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has spoken of likely non-co-operation. When the Commission come I hope he and others like him will not take up any attitude like that but will, when the Royal Commission comes place all materials before the Commission, and make them see that much of what is proposed cannot be done. But there are other and real non-co-operators. Will not this sort of action be strengthening their hands? Will they not be able to say and say with great force: "Here is your machinery; you have been toiling hard; you have been given a constitution which is not to be interfered with for 10 years (as we were told in November last) and now here is an attempt to go back upon the whole question, because the scope of the reference is to be wide enough to permit question of organisation, general conditions, financial and otherwise of a certain Service, being gone into and for ensuring and maintaining satisfactory recruitment of such numbers of Indians and Europeans respectively as may be 'now' decided to be necessary." The go by is thus to be given if possible to the previous agreement—I shall not call it decision—about percentage and various other questions relating to the Services. What has happened since November that we are told now that for the purpose of maintaining the standard of administration in conformity with the responsibilities of the Crown and the Government of India, a new step has to be taken. Has anything happened within the last twelve months that this new departure is necessary, or has the Crown now had further responsibilities imposed upon it that it had not, when the Government of India Act was passed?

Then, Sir, we have a reference in this announcement about the necessity of promoting the increasing accession of Indians to every branch of the administration. It is put in a way that will prove acceptable from certain points of view. I do not know whether the Military Service also is going to be taken up by this Commission or not. It would depend on the actual terms of reference, but we have in the announcement a widely suggestive indication. There is certainly nothing according to this announcement to prevent even the Military Services being taken up, because there also we want increasing association of Indians. Sir, the right way of looking at the question, the practical way is as Lord Islington has put it. No inquiry will get rid of what is the real trouble in the mind of the people agitating for the Commission. What does Lord Islington say:

"It is inevitable that the gradual pruning of political power of the service shall come."

No inquiry can get rid of that possibility for that is in the day's work under the Reforms. Whoever suggested or can suggest that the pay or prospects or even the status in the ordinary sense of Indian Civilians are or will be in jeopardy, unless the Government of India become absolutely Bolshevik and revolutionary,—who is going to say that section 96B of the Government of India Act is to be inoperative? Time will not permit my drawing the attention of the House to the details of the guarantee provided in that section—every possible safeguard is there, when Parliament or Government in England or here is powerless in enforcing these statutory regulations there will be more than chaos. What jeopardy, earnestly and seriously speaking, does the Superior Civil Service as it is called in the announcement apprehend that it requires to be protected against? I desire to associate myself with every word that Mr. Seshagiri Aiyar has said with regard to the members of the Civil Service and with feelings like those animating the Legislature, no harm can come to it. We have our differences. We have our grievances. We are trying to put them right and square; there are, I believe, many who will remain with us and earnestly and loyally co-operate with us. What is the good of upsetting all this friendly and amiable feeling and why should the situation be forced upon them and upon us which will put us on the defensive. (An Honourable Member: "What about their convictions?") They will take care of their convictions whatever that may mean. We are here to speak upon our convictions and to put the case before the country and the Government here and the Government and the public in England in the best of our light.

Sir, it will take a whole sheet of foolscap paper to enumerate the various Commissions and Committees we have had of late. Lakhs and lakhs of rupees have gone on the Decentralisation Commission, the several Financial and Exchange Commissions, Public Service Commissions, Railway Commissions, University Commission, Industrial Commission and Fiscal Commissions. What has come of them? What will come of this Commission particularly. I repeat if the Retrenchment Committee does its duty and lays down dicta that no Royal Commission will be able to reconcile themselves to? If any revision was necessary and it is undoubtedly necessary in some ways why could not they do it by the machinery permissible under the Act? Supposing—I am assuming it—Lord Ronaldshay comes out as the President of the Commission, does he not know all about the situation? He was a member of the Public Services Commission; he was a very successful Governor of Bengal; he knows Indian conditions and Service conditions; his articles in the Magazines show that he is in touch with the country. Supposing he comes as President—I am only supposing it—would he advance matters here—would he not have been able to help the Secretary of State with advice which would be in addition to what a Commission under section 96C of the Government of India Act would have and had to secure? Therefore on constitutional grounds, on financial grounds, on grounds of public opinion, on grounds of expediency, on grounds of the need of keeping up the status and prestige of the Government of India, we oppose, if we can oppose, a Royal Commission. Certainly we protest against its appointment, and its appointment in the way that has been indicated. We shall be doing less than our duty if this House as far as possible, unanimously—because we cannot expect the Government to vote with us—if this House does not unanimously voice the opinion of the country that this Royal Commission is unnecessary, unfortunate and undesirable.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I should like to take the House through a few facts for the purpose of demonstrating to it not only the utter futility of the Royal Commission but of its intrinsic and inherent illegality considered in its unconstitutional aspect. Honourable Members will remember that only two days back the Honourable the Home Member read out the Secretary of State's despatch on the subject of further reforms. In that despatch occurred these pregnant sentences:

"The new constitutional machinery has to be tested in its working as a whole. Changes have been made as the results of the Act of 1919 in the position, powers and responsibilities not only of the legislature but also of the executive government."

Then later on His Lordship says:

"It is clear that sufficient time has not elapsed to enable the new machinery to be adequately tested."

This was written on the 2nd of November 1922. And now mark the language of the Communiqué published to this House yesterday by the Honourable the Home Member:

"It is contemplated that the Commission will be required, having general regard to the necessity of maintaining a high standard of administration in conformity with the responsibilities of the Crown for the Government of India, and to the declared policy of Parliament in respect of the increasing association of Indians in every branch of the administration and having particular regard to the experience now gained of the operation of the system of Government established by the Government of India Act."

The experience had not been gained on the 2nd of November when the Secretary of State dated his despatch. Within six weeks the experience has been gained and has so accumulated that a Royal Commission has been appointed. I ask, Sir, is this not a contradiction in terms? The Secretary of State assured this House that the reforms cannot be re-examined until sufficient time elapses and experience is gained, and within a few weeks we have the announcement of the decision of His Majesty's Government to appoint a Royal Commission to re-examine the question of the superior Civil Services. Honourable Members will note the wording of the Communiqué:

"Having general regard to the necessity of maintaining a standard of administration in conformity with the responsibilities of the Crown."

[Dr. H. S. Gour.]

Now, Sir, I ask the Honourable the Home Member what are the responsibilities of the Crown, and are not the responsibilities of the Crown in a state of transition? We have been told that the reforms are an experiment, and it was explained that the experiment means that it is in a state of transition. Further reforms will be conceded to this country after the statutory period. If so, I ask, is it not a fact that the responsibilities of the Crown to this country will vary from time to time, and has not the Secretary of State himself pointed out that we have not yet fully exploited the existing Reforms Act? If further progress under the Reforms Act is to be achieved, the responsibilities of the Crown must correspondingly diminish. How is a Royal Commission, then, to inquire into the condition of the Imperial Services without at the same time inquiring into the responsibilities of the Crown? How is the financial question to be dissociated from the political question? That, I submit, is the crux of the whole question. The Secretary of State says that so far as the political side of the question is concerned it is not time yet, but when it comes to the question of the pay and promotion of the superior services, he says the time has arrived for a further inquiry.

Then, Sir, I said at the outset that I have a shrewd suspicion that this Royal Commission has not only been forced upon the people of this country but also upon the Government of India. Only the other day, I think only yesterday, the Honourable the Home Member was challenged to deny a statement that the Government of India had opposed the appointment of a Royal Commission.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): The Honourable Member will, I am sure, excuse me in interrupting him. No such challenge was made to me.

Dr. H. S. Gour: If such a challenge was not made, Sir, in another place, I make it here and now. Is the Honourable the Home Member prepared to deny that at no time and at no stage the Government of India resisted the appointment of a Royal Commission?

I say, Sir, I shall assume, till a direct categorical contradiction is given by the Honourable the Home Member, that the Government of India did resist the appointment of a Royal Commission. If that is so, it raises a grave constitutional issue. It imperils the reforms. When these reforms were inaugurated, we were told by high personages of authority that the reforms will be worked alongside of the report of the Joint Parliamentary Committee which annotates them. In clause 33 of the Joint Parliamentary Committee's Report it has been said that, whenever the Government and the Legislatures are in agreement, the Secretary of State should not ordinarily interfere. Now, Sir, the Government of India are not unaware of the strong feeling in this country against the appointment of a Royal Commission. They could not have been unaware of the strong feeling in this House against such an appointment. I take it, therefore, that the Legislature and the people of this country were opposed to the appointment of a Royal Commission. And I further state, Sir, the Honourable the Home Member has not yet contradicted me,—I further state, Sir, that the Government of India were opposed to the appointment of a Royal Commission. There being, therefore, an agreement between the Government of India and the Legislature on the question of the appointment of a Royal Commission, the appointment by the Secretary of State of this Commission is unconstitutional and contravenes the recommendations of the Joint Parliamentary Committee. This, I say, Sir, raises a grave constitutional issue. And I further submit that it is not really a question of necessity, expediency or of general policy—it is a question which cuts at the very root of the fundamental principle upon which the Reform Act is based. Then, Sir, passing on to the question of the utility of the Royal Commission, we have had Royal Commissions galore. We have had Royal Commissions after Royal Commissions, but what is their result? Is it not, in fact, ordinarily said, if you wish to shelve a question appoint a Royal Commission? And I ask Honourable Members in this House what are the Royal Commissioners to do? The grievances of the Civil Services in this country are known and well known. If you wish to redress them, redress them. If you do not wish to redress them, do not appoint a Royal Commission. We have been told that the appointment of a Royal Commission is a costly luxury. One Honourable Member of this House has lent me a copy, Sir, of a communication he received from the Home Department, the purport of which is that, though they have no figures showing the cost of Royal Commissions, they can say (1) that the cost of the Royal Commission of 1912-15, debited in the accounts of the Accountant General, Central Revenues, was Rs. 5,91,874—roughly speaking six lakhs. And that was a smaller Commission. This is going to be a much larger one. And we shall be told that the cost of a Royal Commission—we may safely say that the cost of a Royal Commission will run into several lakhs. This raises another grave constitutional issue. Who is going to pay for it? Is it to be included in the Indian Budget? Will it be submitted to the vote of this House? If it will be submitted to the vote of this House, it would be adding insult to injury. You have not been consulted on the subject of the appointment of a Royal Commission and you are made to pay for it. I submit, Sir, on every conceivable ground the people and the representatives of the people of this country should oppose the appointment of a Royal Commission, and I have no doubt that the Government of India must be sympathising with the people of this country in this year of financial stress when every effort is being made to economise in national expenditure. It has been said . . .

Mr. Chairman: Is the Honourable Member intending to proceed to another point? His time is very nearly up.

Dr. H. S. Gour: My speech also is very nearly over. We have been told Sir, in another place that we should welcome this Royal Commission, because the terms are large and liberal. We have been told that it is not merely to inquire into the general condition of service, financial and otherwise, but it will also inquire into the "best methods of ensuring and maintaining the satisfactory recruitment of such numbers of Indians and Europeans respectively as may be decided to be necessary in the light of the considerations above referred to." I beg to ask, Sir, how is this reconcilable with the statement made in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report which lays down the programme of progressive Indianisation of the superior services for the next ten years? Are we to go back upon that report? Are we to scrap it? Are new problems to be presented to the Royal Commission, and if they are, they would be inconsistent with the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, inconsistent with the Government of India Act, inconsistent with the recommendations of the Joint Parliamentary Committee. I therefore support the motion on the ground that the appointment is unconstitutional, it is unnecessary, it will serve no useful purpose and will unnecessarily antagonise the people.

Mr. R. A. Spence (Bombay : European): Sir, the need for Englishmen in the various services of the Government, not merely in the Indian Civil Service, but in the Public Works, the Police, and the other Services of Government, and the necessity of securing to them due recognition of their services and security of tenure, are, I think, recognised by every thinking man in India. The Secretary of State has full power to appoint a Royal Commission for any purpose which the Government at Home considers right, but if this is not desired by the Government of India, if it is not desired by the people of this country, one can but deprecate the appointment of a Royal Commission which is bound to disturb public opinion. The various tributes, the various just tributes which have been paid to-day and which are daily paid throughout India to the work done by Englishmen in the services in this country are surely a justification to us that their services will be recognised and looked after by the Government in this country without the appointment of a Royal Commission.

Mir Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur (South Madras : Muhammadan): Sir, it is my policy, that I should not speak on every subject in or out of season except when there is need for it. Now, I think, Sir, that it is essential to say a few words on this occasion. After hearing the best speeches of the Presidents of the Democratic and National Parties and the case made by them, and after hearing Mr. Spence's speech, there is very little for me to say on this subject. As one of the representatives of the Mussalmans of Madras, it is my duty to join with the sentiments expressed and to protest on behalf of myself and my community against the Provincial Royal Commission on the services.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney (Nominated : Anglo-Indians): Sir, it was last year when I entered into the discussion of the Budget, I likened this House to a married couple, the Legislature as the husband and the Government of India as the wife and I foresaw in the Sessions of 1921, evidence of family disturbance which almost ended in a divorce in 1922 and I also said to this House, "what the Honourable Edwin Samuel Montagu had joined together, let no Budget put asunder." It seems as if the marriage bond is being put asunder by that very man who brought it about and I am very doubtful which way to view this proposition which involved the appointment of a Royal Commission; whether it spells the obituary notice of Mr. Montagu, or the I. C. S. or the Indianisation of the Services. I think it will be viewed from this triangular point. There is no doubt, Sir, that it has dealt a severe blow to Mr. Montagu, for the idol of this House seems to have fallen. I have heard the views expressed to-day by some of the leading Members and it seems to be very unnecessary for me to offer a wail in the wilderness opposing those views, especially after hearing what my friend, Mr. Spence, said. There may be something more than meets the eye in the case of this Royal Commission. The Indian Civil Service has certainly a lot to complain about. We accept that and one Member said "Why not institute an inquiry in this country so as to remedy these grievances?" How can you institute that inquiry and at the same time dissociate from that Committee the official element? There is no doubt that the Indian Civil Service has not been viewed as it should have been since the last Public Services Commission of 1913. There is not the faintest doubt also that in the minds of many members of this Service there exists a feeling of insecurity mainly in regard to their pension. It is very nice to publicly state here that no fear need be entertained on that score. But has the Government made that pronouncement? Have the Government at Home made that pronouncement and allayed this fear? Then there are certain other difficulties which present day living has forced upon the Civil Service. Has that Service been treated in the same generous way as other Services in this country? I submit with all respect we must prove in this House that it has not been treated with such generosity. If that Service needs certain revision, is it the duty of this House to oppose the appointment of a Commission that is going to remedy it? And again is it the duty of this House to oppose a Commission whose object may be—the furtherance of Indianization, or may not. We have nothing to go upon. The point is that it may decide for greater Indianization, or it may say it is against it. Nobody knows. It may be that the intention of this Commission is to seek out the root of the dissatisfaction that exists—and it does exist to a large extent among the members of the Indian Civil Service—and it may be that this Commission will be more productive of good to India than anything else. I desire to ask in this House why are we afraid of the Commission coming out? If the Commission is going to investigate the condition as it exists to-day in contradistinction to what it existed in 1913 when the last Commission sat, why should we as a body oppose it simply on the ground of not having been consulted, in the first instance. It must be remembered that the Home Government has the power to appoint a Royal Commission. I repeat why are we not prepared to give it a chance? Let us see what it is going to do. Rs. 5 lakhs 6 lakhs is nothing, is nothing if it gives you Indianisation. Whatever it costs, if it is going to do any good to India—and I should like to see whether it is going to do any good to my community,—why object? I therefore, Sir, do not oppose this, but at the same time I think there is another side to this picture. Honourable Members may say it is the wrong side, but I say it may be the right side, and therefore I do not oppose it.

Sir Montagu Webb (Bombay : European): Sir, I desire to join my voice to that of those who have protested against the appointment of this Committee. I cannot myself understand at present the necessity, or even the desirability, of the appointment of a Commission of this kind. I find it still more difficult to conceive that the Government of India can possibly have demanded the appointment of a Commission of this character; and that being so, it seems to me that the appointment of this Commission merely lends a weapon to those hostile and adverse critics who suggest that the Government of India and the Legislature are being discredited, or overruled by the Secretary of State. It seems to me, Sir, that the appointment of a Commission at this particular juncture is particularly unfortunate. It can but create suspicion in more directions than one, and I myself cannot see that it can possibly do any good, at this stage. Reference has been made to the anxiety which some members of the Services may feel with regard to their position or their pensions. Well, to me, Sir, I confess it is inconceivable that any Legislature in this country, or that Government here or at Home could do otherwise than carry out Government's obligations to all the Services strictly and to the very last letter. In these circumstances, Sir, I agree with the previous speakers, that the appointment of this Royal Commission is inopportune and ill-advised, and I have no hesitation in supporting the motion now before this House.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): I recognize that I have at this moment a difficult task, for I have to meet not arguments but an atmosphere, not facts but suspicions: not definite statements, but insinuation based on no surer ground than prejudice. See the words in which Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar described the object of this Commission. Its avowed object, he said, is the improvement of the conditions of the Civil Service. The House has heard the terms of the announcement: is that statement of the scope of the Commission within even measurable distance of the truth? Again; the consequence of the appointment of this Commission, he says, will be that the pay of the services will be fixed by an outside body, and as a result, that Ministers will have no control over them. So then, a Royal Commission is appointed to advise as to conditions of services, as Royal Commissions have been appointed to advise in the past; and his conscience actually allows him to describe it as an outside body which will exercise authority over the transferred subjects. That is his suggestion, and it is the atmosphere created by unfounded suggestions of that nature which I have to meet;—an atmosphere further vitiated by imputations that the Government of India itself has been, aye, and still is opposed to this Commission. Dr. Gour vociferated a demand that I should state categorically, here and now, whether the Government of India had or had not opposed such a Commission. Yet Dr. Gour knows as well as I know, and as well as the House knows, that as a matter of practice we never do, and I would add that we never ought, to yield to demands to reveal either difference of opinion, or consensus of opinion between ourselves and the Secretary of State on topics which can be held to be controversial. For if on demand we reveal a consensus of opinion, we expose ourselves to the implication that in other cases such consensus of opinion does not exist. It is for this reason, proper and sufficient in itself, that we habitually maintain the practice of refusing demands for information whether we do or do not agree with the views of the Secretary of State on any particular topic. But because I will not break a long-established and a most reasonable practice, because I have no intention of revealing to him what the Government of India said on this occasion and what it did not say, because I am as equally impervious to his request that I should state that the Government of India disapproved as I am to his demand that I should make confession if the Government of India approves of this proposal, he proceeds to raise a monstrous fabric of his own concoction, and, standing on the pedestal of that unsavoury and unreliable structure, he preaches to me that His Majesty's Government are breaking a constitutional convention; he states that the Government of India and the Legislature being in full accord and against this proposal, the Secretary of State is guilty of an illegal breach of the constitution in overriding them by the appointment of this Commission. I say, Sir, that this breach of convention is a figment of his own imagination. He is as little entitled to raise prejudice by this assumption, as he is to declare that this Commission is the creation of an ultra-conservative Government and a reactionary Secretary of State. Is Mr. Montagu also now among the reactionaries? For Mr. Montagu has endorsed if he did not actually anticipate the demand for this inquiry.

The limits of time allotted to me by the Rules of the House are narrow; I cannot attempt to destroy the whole unsubstantial fabric of prejudice that we have heard to-day. I must limit myself to speaking of the necessity or otherwise of an inquiry of this nature, and the question of the agency which it is intended to employ. I cannot touch on more than bare essentials. But I must remind the House that the history of India for the last hundred years has been the history of an administration—of a great administration—far more than the development of a political entity. Activities which in other countries have been left to private enterprise or which have matured under the impetus of individual effort, have in India depended for their development on the activity of the State. In every sphere of life, material, scientific, educational, or intellectual, the main impetus or development has come from the administration. History may be left to say whether that development has been on right lines or not; I am not now on that point. Nor am I concerned with the causes which have produced this result; the fact remains that Government activities have penetrated into every sphere of life and work; and the State acts, and can act only through the vast body of servants which those manifold activities have called into existence. Further, because in India there has not hitherto been a ready recruiting ground, from which we could engage State servant on a temporary or contract basis, we have everywhere had to engage them on practically a life tenure; in other words to create a vast and organized system of Services. Now India was still at that stage when the reforms were inaugurated; we are still indeed at that stage; but the reforms will have the effect of changing a purely administrative Government into one of another type. I am not here speaking of the adequacy of the advance already made. Those who stand upon the bank and watch the running of the waters are perhaps better able to judge of the direction of the current than we who are swimming in it; they realize that the new channel is every day widening and deepening and that every day the new current is taking a more definite and determined course. A new development of this nature, though primarily political in its aspect, nevertheless in a body constituted such as the Indian administration connotes much more than a political change. It involves an adjustment of the administration itself and consequently an adjustment also in the services which are so integral a part of the structure of that administration. Looking back, I think it might have been well if when the constitutional change was carried out, an inquiry had been made at the time as to the changes which would be necessary in the structure of the services. But there were difficulties; at that time attention was focussed on the character of the impending political changes. There are references to the matter in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report; and there were at the time doubts expressed in the services whether we could safely proceed without consideration of this question for it was felt by many that the political changes involved as a corollary changes so great in the whole structure of the services that the organisation and future development of the latter should come under review. But if inquiry had then been made, it would inevitably have had the disadvantage that its decisions would have been taken on a priori grounds; and again we might in any case have been compelled to revise its conclusions by the light of our subsequent experience. But as to the necessity of such an inquiry, either at the time, or later in the light of the experience we have gained of the Reforms; I have no doubt, and I believe that few people who consider the question earnestly and soberly will differ from that view. I have heard references to the late Public Services Commission; but it is one of our misfortunes that its conclusions, arrived at in a different atmosphere and envisaging different developments, were already becoming out of date at the moment at which they were introduced. Admitting, then that such an inquiry is necessary, what is to be its proper scope? Let me begin only with a minor problem. It will be necessary to decide in regard to our services whether the continuation of the services at all is necessary in many technical departments; whether you could not, that is, substitute short-term service or contract officers, particularly in departments controlled by Ministers. I emphasise these because it is there if financial conditions permit, that progress must be most rapid, and novel experiments most quickly worked out. That, as I say, is a minor point. But I come to more important question, less one of organization than of personnel. I need not dwell on the insistence of the demand for further Indianisation of the services. If I deal with it here, it is not to argue its merits, but to state some of its implications, which have perhaps escaped some of those who have voiced the demand most strongly. It is not a mere question of arithmetic. It is not a question of taking a present rate of 33 per cent. of recruitment and increasing it to 50 or 60. It goes far beyond that. Everywhere in India the question is now being discussed whether in view of a larger recruitment of Indians, we ought any longer to recruit them on an all-India basis. The growing sense of provincial independence and individuality, the necessity for satisfying Provincial aspirations, seems to demand that they should be recruited by the Province for service in the Province and at Provincial rates of pay. Burma has already made this demand in the most emphatic form; I see an equally emphatic demand coming from other Provinces in their turn. Here is a question to find the solution of which you will have to dig deep into the roots of our present system, and I say you cannot do this, and you cannot solve the large question of what numbers of Europeans and Indians respectively are required in the light of experience of the Reforms without a thorough, an independent and far-reaching inquiry. Let me pause for a minute; I pause because I remember, as no doubt the House will remember, what Dr. Gour said on the latter subject. He suggested that this Commission is likely to go back on the proportions laid down in the Montagu-Chelmsford Report. Well might I refer to the creation of an atmosphere of prejudice, and the difficulty of my task in meeting it. I ask anybody here whether they feel themselves honestly able to join with Dr. Gour in such a suggestion? We have already gone far beyond what the Montagu-Chelmsford report laid down. Our percentages are far higher; not only are our percentages far higher, but our rate of recruitment is in excess of those percentages. (Mr. Jammadas Dwarkadas: "Because you cannot get candidates in England.") I shall come to that presently. Yet Dr. Gour finds it in his conscience to suggest that the Royal Commission may now go back on the Montagu-Chelmsford percentages.

Here then are two outstanding questions which you must solve before you can make progress with the consideration of the Indianisation of the services. The consideration of those questions will involve an inquiry far beyond the scope which has to-day been assigned, but wrongly assigned, to the reference to a Royal Commission. I do not say that it will not also have to consider the question of the conditions under which the services are now working. It is not true, as was stated, that the sole purpose of the Commission was to go into the pay and prospects of the services. I claim emphatically to have proved that this is not the case. But, equally, the circumstances regarding the services must be considered. I take, for I must be as brief as I can, one or two points only. In the debate on the Indianisation of the services, more than one speaker declared that he and his friends did not wish to exclude entirely the European element in the services. For my own part, I sincerely believe that in thinking India at large there is on the contrary a firm determination that a strong European element in the services should be maintained. But what are the facts at present? We are failing to obtain recruits. I could support that statement with figures, but I do not desire to take up the time of the House, and the House may safely take the fact from me. There are two reasons. The first is the economic condition of the services out here which re-acts on recruitment at Home; secondly, the doubt that exists in the minds of those who might be candidates as to their future in India. Now, I agree with Sir Montagu Webb that it is unthinkable that any Indian Parliament would seek to repudiate its obligations in respect of pensions and the like. I welcome the recent declaration made by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, speaking on behalf of the largest party in this House that they regarded any such suggestion as damaging and pernicious. But that is not the whole of the case. The case is that men who are entering on life now desire to know what is to happen to them if, as a result of the recommendations of the first Parliamentary Commission, it should be necessary for Government to dispense with their services, some six or seven years hence. I do not think they ask for funds to be set aside in trust to provide for such a contingency. They merely desire to know, and it is a reasonable request, what the conditions of compensation will be if, after some years' service their careers out here are brought to a close. Then again, as regards the economic conditions under which present servants of the State are suffering and which, as I say, are re-acting on recruitment. There is no more tangible proof of these difficulties than the heavy list of premature retirements which are every month depleting our services of some of their best men. It has been admitted here to-day by Dr. Gour—and I thank him for the admission—that the services have difficulties; it was admitted by others to-day; it was stated in our Indianisation debate that India was prepared to see those difficulties adjusted. I desire to say nothing more than to refer, Sir, to your own Resolution, which stated that those difficulties should be inquired into though you preferred to have them inquired into here. But there is a final factor in regard to the services which I am bound to mention. If one can accept what one hears here, what one sees in the reports of Provincial Retrenchment Committees, or what one hears again in such bodies as our own Standing Finance Committee, it is clear that we now have to face a different atmosphere in regard to Indian pay to that which was represented before the Public Services Commission. Everywhere now we hear Indians complain that we have left them an onerous legacy; we have fixed the pay of our services on a European basis and on European requirements, and, insensibly, the pay of Indian members of those services has crept up towards the European standard. It is suggested that we must revise the whole scheme of emoluments from a different aspect. We have to lay down a basic pay which will be appropriate to India, to Indian requirements, and Indian conditions. We are told that if India has to employ Europeans, it is prepared to face the necessity of paying them their market value, but is not prepared to pay Indians emoluments in excess of those which a man should expect who is serving his own country and in his own country. We hear that view expressed, everywhere, and I think I can claim that I have stated the proposition fully and fairly. But, Sir, that proposition is not an easy one either for the Indian Government, or for Local Governments to investigate or to carry into effect, for they would have a very powerful body of vested interests against them. Yet, unless, that can be investigated fairly and, independently, unless the body which investigates is so authoritative as to carry the utmost weight, any new basis of remuneration cannot be carried into effect; and if so, what becomes of the Indianisation of the Services—at all events as an economic proposition? It may be well enough to satisfy national aspirations or national feelings by Indianising your services, but unless that process is carried out on a purely Indian basis of pay, you will lose the whole of the financial saving which has been held out as a principal attraction to the scheme.

Mr. Chairman: Your time-limit is up.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I ask indulgence for one minute more. I claim that at all events I have established the necessity for an authoritative investigation of these grave problems on wide and liberal terms of reference. And if it is admitted that such an investigation as I have outlined is necessary, then three-quarters of the opposition to the Royal Commission should go. For let us face the facts. It is admitted that we need an enquiry. It might be that an inquiry undertaken entirely by the Government of India might be more rapid, less expensive and perhaps under influences which would appeal to this Assembly as more suitable. But would it carry the necessary authority? I say again, there is no use shutting our eyes to the facts. You have to meet two influences, and satisfy two elements. You have not only India to consider. It was Parliament that was associated at every stage with the inauguration of the Reforms. Parliament has an equal right—nay, an equal duty—to associate itself with an inquiry into those changes in the structure of the administration which the Reforms have necessitated. The Indian public can safely banish any suspicion that this inquiry has been dictated by unworthy motives, that its sole object is to retard the Indianisation of the Services—to me an unthinkable suggestion; or that its sole or main purpose is to satisfy the existing members of the services. And so far from the appointment of this Commission being unconstitutional, I take the opposite ground. Parliament, I say, initiated the Reforms; His Majesty's Government equally has a duty to associate itself with an inquiry into administrative changes which are corollary to the Reforms; and it has a duty to ensure not only that the development of our services shall comply with the requirements of the Government of India Act, but that the constitution and conditions of service for all branches shall be such as to give members of our great services, so far as the new conditions permit, as full opportunities as in the past of exhibiting the character, the independence and the high sense of duty which have done so much for India.

Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag (Surma Valley cum Shillong: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I move that the question be now put.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): I rise, Sir, further to support the motion for adjournment so ably placed before the House by my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar; and I feel bound to say that the splendid advocacy of my Honourable friend, the Leader of the House, has left me absolutely unconvinced as regards the necessity and wisdom of the appointment of this Commission. I do not find fault—no one in this House or outside can find fault—with the splendid advocacy of the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey but in this case he had the misfortune of adventuring a very, very bad cause. What has Sir Malcolm Hailey told us to justify the appointment of this Commission? Sir Malcolm Hailey says the terms are wide and liberal. They may be wide, but there is not the slightest doubt that the terms are vague also, and the existence of this vagueness makes us suspect that the vagueness is due to the fact that a lot of harm may be done to the interests of this country by raising the emoluments of the services and a set-back may be given to the cause of Indianisation. My Honourable friend, Colonel Gidney, suggests "Who knows? The Commission may make a recommendation which might accelerate the pace of Indianisation." Is it likely, Sir, I ask, that a Commission appointed by the reactionary Government of Great Britain at the present moment could ever help the acceleration of the pace of Indianisation? Why, Sir Malcolm Hailey himself said one of the reasons why a Commission is being appointed is that you cannot get recruits in England; you cannot get away from that fact; Sir William Vincent replying to my own Resolution here said it was a fact that you cannot get recruits in England to-day. The reasons assigned by Sir Malcolm Hailey are in the first place economic and secondly that a doubt exists among the present incumbents as regards their own and their successors' prospects. Colonel Gidney says the pace of Indianisation may be accelerated. In order to attract recruits for the Indian Medical Service this very reactionary Government has just given out special terms and thirty appointments have been made on special terms in the teeth of the opposition of the whole country. In answer to a clamour for further advance, this very reactionary Government through the Secretary of State for India has given us a Despatch which is—although it pretends to have been written after very careful consideration—hardly worth the paper on which it is written; and we are told that we should expect that a Commission appointed by this Government is going to accelerate the pace of Indianisation. Sir Malcolm Hailey has given two reasons for not being able to find recruits in England. May I give a more substantial reason, not a reason which is a concoction of my own imagination, to us: his words, but a reason given in the letter of Mr. Montagu himself to the London "Times"? This is the reason that he assigns. He says: "Some of those who lament the difficulties of recruitment most vociferously are apt to forget how much a bearing the altered circumstances of the day have on this question. Commercial enterprises are enlisting more than they ever did before the assistance of University graduates. For those who seek Government employment the opportunities for such employment have increased at Home and the over-riding factor of all this is to be found in the destruction of a generation as the price that was paid for victory in the war."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Nevertheless he advocates a Commission.

Mr. Jamnadas Dvarkadas: That may be, on that we differ from him; this is the last paragraph of his letter that he sent to the "Times." Let us not forget that of all the reasons the greatest reason why you cannot get recruits in England to-day is that the flower of your community has yielded to the necessities of the war, and perished fighting for its country. Those that are left they have the best prospects in England itself and no one while he has prospects at Home would ever like to go out to a foreign country under the present circumstances. Then, Sir, is it merely the economic reason that prevents recruits from coming to India, to appear as candidates for the Services? There is one more additional reason and that reason is this: after the establishment of representative institutions in accordance with the Government of India Act, however much you may increase the salaries of the Services, you can never give to the Civil Servant in future that amount of power which he enjoyed in the pre-reforms days. Is not that perhaps the reason? Can that reason be remedied by any one, and if it is the intention of the Commission to remedy that reason, then, Sir, our protest against the appointment of the Commission is all the stronger than it ever can be. For, while we do not in any way run down the Services,—we appreciate, and we have never failed to appreciate in this House the services they have rendered in the past and are still rendering. We fail to understand how, consistently with our demand for self-Government at an early date, we can ever again restore the power that they used to enjoy in the pre-reform days. In this very House many Members including myself have re-asserted that if the present incumbents of the Civil Services have any grievance with regard to lack of social amenities or have economic grievances, the reasonable among them will be handled sympathetically and generously, if I may say so, by the Members of the Legislature. What other grievances can there be? Sir, the cause of Indianisation can never prosper at the hands of a Commission appointed by a reactionary Government. So far as the grievances of the Services are concerned, they can never be remedied except by the Members of the very Legislature who are prepared to go into the legitimate grievances of the Services and remedy them. So far as their political power is concerned, it is beyond any one, even the Royal Commission, to remedy it. So far as the recruitment of Englishmen is concerned, you have the solid reason given by the late Secretary of State himself that it is difficult to find recruits in England now, that the war has taken away so many, and of the others that are left, many are attracted to the Services in England, and others to commercial enterprises. What, then, Sir, I may rightly ask, is this Commission going to do? What is the use of appointing this Commission in the teeth of the opposition of the whole country? Is it not because the forces of reaction have been triumphing ever since the resignation of Mr. Montagu? You have a demand made by the whole country, represented to the Government through its Legislature for a further advance. That demand is summarily dismissed. You have another blow thrown at the country in the appointment of those 30 men to the Indian Medical Service on special terms, and now, here is a third. I ask if the Home Government is helping those that have stood by the Constitution at the most critical moment to carry out their duties in the face of the strong opposition that prevails in the country? I submit, Sir, as one who has always spoken plainly in this House, and as one who has always stood for the maintenance of the British connection, at any cost, I feel that it is acts like those that render our task most difficult; it is colossal blunders, political blunders of this character resulting from ignorance of men who sit six thousand miles away that will make the position of constitutionalists difficult. Sir, I support this motion.

(Loud cries of "The question be now put" from all sides of the House.)

Khan Bahadur Zahiruddin Ahmed (Dacca Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I oppose this Resolution moved against the appointment of a Royal Commission tooth and nail, fully knowing that my Honourable friends, the intelligentsia of the country, the Honourable Non-Officials of this Assembly will call "shame" on me. Here is my humble explanation for my conduct. To me the truth, however unpleasant, is very dear and must be told, the duty, however thankless, must be done. It is imperative, in my opinion, that a Royal Commission is most needed to find out the reasons why these lions' cubs are not coming or refusing to come to the Indian jungles as they used to do before. It is better that the Majestic lions' cubs should be the masters of the Indian jungles rather than the pack of wolves or that of the wild dogs. I boldly assert that misgovernment by my countrymen is no proper substitute for good Government by the Britishers. Some of my Honourable friends argue: "Let us fail one hundred times and even after that, if we succeed, that is something." But I humbly submit that each failure may end in a great catastrophe to the country, may bring endless sufferings to countless millions. I shudder to think of it.

I emphatically say that any extravagance on the British portion of the Indian Civil Service at the present moment is the greatest economy for the country at large in the interests of the millions of the masses. Even for the success of these reforms we need the services of the British portion of the Indian Civil Service. I may admit that Indian-born Civil servants may be suitable in some respects but a poor substitute for the British-born ones, just as a square peg will suit as nearly as may be a round hole, just as a wooden leg suits a legless man.

I appeal again and again to the good sense of my countrymen composing the Honourable Non-Official Members of this Assembly not to sacrifice the interest of the masses in the interest of a few intelligentsia of the country, though that intelligentsia may be our kith and kin.

It was my sad experience for years that in whichever district an Indian becomes a District Magistrate and Collector, the efficiency in the administration suffers, the bribe and corruption increase. This is very, very unfortunate, but this is a fact. Honesty compels me to admit this sad truth and I do so in the interests of the millions of the dumb masses.

May I quote in conclusion a Persian proverb Khatāi bojurgan gireftan khatā est which means "To find fault always with superiors is also a great fault."

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member): Sir, I came down to the House this evening without the slightest intention of intervening in any way in this debate. I would not have done so had it not been for Mr. Jannadas Dwarkadas' intervention—his intervention, I may say, in his very best style. He stood up and he tore his passion to tatters before us. He flung his papers about and in his usual way he appealed to the emotions of the House. But, Sir, in the excitement of the moment, he made just one or two statements which I should like to contradict. He referred to the reasons why we cannot get Englishmen to come out to the Indian Services. He explained the reluctance of the Englishman to come out to the Indian Services to his own satisfaction and he quoted Mr. Montagu. He stated that one reason was that England had lost practically a generation in the war. He stated that the flower of the English youth was now going in for commerce and was refusing to enter the Services in the way that they used to. And he said also that another reason why the young Englishman could not come out to India was owing to the changed conditions under which the Indian Civilian works and the fact that he does not now exercise the same power as he used to exercise before the war. Now, Sir, let me state my views on this point. I come from a family which has served India from father to son for over 3 hundred years. (Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: "May the race go on.") My grandfather joined the Madras Presidency about 1830. My father served in this country for 20 years. I myself have served in this country for 4 and 20 years. And I have got four sons. One of these sons is now at Oxford. He is just the sort of boy who in the ordinary course would have followed in his father's footsteps in the Indian Civil Service. He writes out to me and asks me: "Shall I go into the Indian Civil Service?" And he tells me what they are saying about the Indian Civil Service at Home. He has no desire—there are many other lads at Oxford in like case—no desire at all to go in for commerce. They would like to do as their fathers have done before them and serve the country and serve India in accordance with the traditions of their family. But there are the obstacles in the way. What do they know about the position of the Civilian out here? They know absolutely nothing. What they do know is that India at the moment is in a transition stage. As Sir Malcolm Hailey pointed out, in 1929 there must be a Commission and there may be great changes and they want to know. "Supposing I come out to India, am I going to lose my appointment five years hence?" That is the obstacle which is keeping these young boys from coming out to India. That is what paralyses them, and that is the feeling which is common in Oxford and Cambridge. That is the main reason why you cannot get the English boys now to come out to the Indian Civil Service. It is common, and that is one of the reasons why it is not sufficient merely to have an inquiry out here, either an inquiry by Members of this House or of the Indian Government. You must have the sort of inquiry which will carry conviction to the people at Home, and I assure you that that is the only reason—to remove these fears and to get the English boy of the right stamp to come out to India in the future in the way that he has done in the past, and I think that I may assume that every one in this House does want the English boy of the right stamp to come out and serve India in the service of this country.

[Mr. C. A. Innes.]

There is only one other remark. I do not propose to traverse all the grounds which have been so ably covered by my Honourable friend, Sir Malcolm Hailey. There is only one word, there is only one remark that I wish to make. Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas referred more than once to this reactionary Government at Home. He tried to create again that atmosphere which I had hoped, fondly hoped, Sir Malcolm Hailey had succeeded in dissipating. What is all this cry about a reactionary Government? Reactionary Government merely because they have appointed this Royal Commission? (Cries of "No, no.") Why? Mr. Montagu himself, a friend of India—Mr. Montagu also asked for a Royal Commission of this kind. (Cries of "Let the question be now put.")

Mr. Chairman: The question is that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Chairman: The motion before the House now is: "That the House do now adjourn."

The motion was adopted.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Monday, the 29th January, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Monday, 29th January, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock.
Mr. President was in the Chair.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): I hope, Sir, that you will allow me to draw aside for one minute that veil which hides the personality of the Chair and to express, as I am sure I may do on behalf of the House, its great pleasure at your return to your duties. (Hear, hear.) It is not, Sir, that we have not had in your absence able lieutenants, trained in the traditions which you have inaugurated in this House, and to them our gratitude is due. Nevertheless, we feel the keenest pleasure in your return. We feel pleasure in your return not only because you are our President, but because, since you are also the friend of the House, we have to congratulate you on your recovery from an illness which at one time filled us with grave anxiety. (Hear, hear.)

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, on my own behalf, and on behalf of my friends, I very wholeheartedly join in what has fallen from the Honourable the Leader of the House. We welcome you back here and hope that there will not be occasion for the same anxiety again. In the strenuous times before us good sense and good temper, of which good health is always the basis, should prevail all round. The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey has told you of the anxious time that we had and we do not want it repeated.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I beg to associate myself with everything that has been said by the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey in welcoming you back amongst us. He has told you, Sir, that, during your absence, we have been served by very able lieutenants. That, Sir, is a compliment not only to their ability, but is a compliment to yourself for having trained them to lead us in your absence and for the atmosphere which you have created in this House. Therefore, Sir, we are happy to see you back once again amongst us and, as Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary has said, we hope the occasion may not again arise of welcoming you back in the way in which we have done, but you are always welcome and we are always glad to see you amongst us.

Mr. President: Gentlemen, I need hardly say that the words used by the Leader of the House and by my two Honourable Colleagues have greatly touched me and I have to thank them and the Assembly for the manner in which they have received me on my return from what was, after all, though a somewhat prolonged, yet not in any sense a dangerous illness. I have followed with great interest the proceedings of the House from a distance and I am glad to have the endorsement by the Leader of the House himself of the opinion which I had myself formed that my presence here was not in the least necessary. (Cries of "No, no.") And though of course duty compels me to return to the Chair, I should very willingly have returned in the form and habit of a private Member in order to sit under those able Chairmen whose services you have all enjoyed.

Gentlemen, once more I thank you.

MEMBERS SWORN:

Captain Ellice Victor Sassoon, M.L.A. (Bombay Millowners' Association: Indian Commerce).

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

" INDIAN RAILWAYS " BY RAI SAHIB C. P. TIWARY.

282. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Has the attention of Government been drawn to the remarks relating to the meagre details presented with the railway budget, appearing at page 398 of the book called Indian Railways by Rai Sahib Chandika Prasad Tiwary? If so, do Government propose to furnish the members with copies of the establishment rolls and working estimates referred therein?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Government have seen the remarks referred to. They regret that Members cannot be furnished with copies of the establishment rolls and working estimates, as these can be got ready only after the grant of sanction by the Legislature and after the Budget orders thereon are communicated to individual railway administrations.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government be pleased to furnish us with copies of the establishment rolls of the previous year?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I am afraid, Sir, that that would be a very expensive business. Here is a copy (shown) of the establishment rolls and working estimates for a single railway.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: May I ask, Sir, how many copies are printed when the copies are printed for the use of the office?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I am afraid I do not know, Sir.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government inquire?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Yes, Sir.

LIGHTING ON B. & N. W. RAILWAY.

283. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hosain Khan: (a) Are the Government aware that some of the compartments of the passenger trains on the Bengal and North-Western Railway are not usually provided with light?

(b) Do the Government propose to advise the authorities to make proper arrangements for light in all the passenger trains of the Railway?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (a) The Government of India understand that all compartments of passenger trains on the Bengal and North-Western Railway are provided with lights and their maintenance receives the continual attention of the Railway Administration. Specific cases of complaint in this respect brought to the notice of the Administration will receive attention.

(b) Government do not consider that any instructions to the railway authorities are necessary.

Mr. J. Ohaudhuri: Is the Honourable Member aware that there are no adequate arrangements for refreshments along the same line?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I do not see how that question arises out of the question I have just answered.

Mr. J. Ohaudhuri: Because the railway exists for the convenience of passengers and food is a greater necessity than light.

Mr. President: That question does not arise.

PRESS FINE FUND.

284. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hosain Khan: (a) Do the Government maintain a fund called the Press Fine Fund in the interest of the employees of Government Presses?

(b) If the answer to the above question be in the affirmative, will the Government be pleased to state:

(i) The total amount of the fund up to December last?

(ii) The total number of press workmen who have got relief in their distress?

Mr. A. H. Ley: (a) Yes.

(b) (i) Rs. 2,592-6-0.

(b) (ii) Two grants have been made from the fund in the Delhi Press. No application for grants has been made in the Calcutta or Simla presses.

ADVANCE OF PASSAGE MONEY.

285. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hosain Khan: Is it a fact that the Imperial Services have recently been granted the privilege of obtaining advance of passage money for themselves and their families to enable them to go home on leave, whereas the European members of the Provincial Civil Services have not been allowed this privilege?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: Orders are under issue extending the concession to Provincial Services.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Does the Government intend to extend the privilege to the Indian Members of Council who may desire to avail themselves of it?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I think that question does not directly arise out of this answer.

ATTENDANCE AT MEETINGS OF THE LEGISLATURES.

286. Maulvi Miyan Asjad-ul-lah: (1) Will the Government be pleased to state the names of the members who have not attended a single meeting of any session or more sessions than one of the Indian Legislatures held between February, 1921, and the September session of 1922, and the respective constituencies they are returned from?

(2) Are the Government aware that there are no provisions of rules enforcing attendance of members except for those who will be absent for a period of two consecutive months while going abroad (out of India)?

(3) Do Government propose for the benefit of the country to make necessary provision in the rules to compel members of the Legislatures to vacate their seats for not attending the meetings of the Council and the Assembly regularly?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: (1) Government has no certain information as to the Members of the Indian Legislature who have not attended a single meeting of any Session or who did not attend more than one Session between February, 1921, and the September Session of 1922, but the number of such Members so far as is available, is given in the Statement which is laid on the table.

(2) and (3) The Honourable Member is obviously aware of the provisions of Section 93 (2) of the Government of India Act. That section empowers the Governor General to declare that the seat of a Member has become vacant if, for a period of two consecutive months, such Member is absent from India or is unable to attend to the duties of his office as a Member. There is no other statutory provision having the effect, directly or indirectly, of enforcing the attendance of Members. The Government do not propose to take any action in the matter as they are of opinion that under the reformed constitution an elected Member of a Legislature is primarily responsible to his constituency for the due performance of his duties as a Member. In any case where a Member fails to attend meetings regularly, it is open to his constituency, should it feel itself aggrieved by his absence, to move the Governor General to exercise the power vested in him by Section 93 (2).

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

COUNCIL OF STATE.

Number of Members who did not attend the second Session from September 1921 to March 1922.	Nil
Number of Members who were absent throughout the September Session, 1922.	7

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Has the Government asked any non-official nominated members who have been regularly absent to resign their seats and nominated others in their place?

Sir Henry Moncreiff Smith: No non-official nominated member has been asked to resign his seat; but I think the Honourable Member will have seen recently that one seat previously occupied by a nominated non-official member has been declared vacant.

POLICE SUPERINTENDENT ON FOREIGN SERVICE.

287. Sir Montagu de P. Webb: (a) What is the rate of contribution levied by Government from a foreign employer on account of the pension only, of a District Superintendent of Police transferred to foreign service?

(b) Does the rate of levy represent the value, expressed as a portion of his pay, of the transferred officer's pension?

(c) If not, what does it represent?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: (a) The revision of the rate of contribution is under consideration, recoveries are at present being made provisionally at the rate of $\frac{1}{4}$ of pay, foreign employers being told that the amounts are liable to alteration.

(b) and (c) The rate is intended to represent the ratio that the cost likely to be incurred by Government in respect of an officer's pension bears to the cost of his pay.

PAY AND PENSIONS OF SERVICES.

288. Sir Montagu de P. Webb: What is the actual annual increase in the charge upon public funds since the 1st August, 1914, under each of the heads (a) pay and allowances, (b) pensions, including refund of contributions, and (c) family pensions, in respect of each of the following cadres:—

(A) The Indian (Imperial) Police.

(B) The Indian Civil Service.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The information is being collected and will be supplied to the Honourable Member. I may explain that it will not be available for some time as we shall have to ask Audit Officers, the India Office and the High Commissioner for figures.

TRAVELLING FACILITIES FOR 3RD CLASS PASSENGERS.

289. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government be pleased to state what steps they have taken to give effect to the resolution passed by the Legislative Assembly on 7th September 1922, regarding the improvement of travelling facilities for 3rd class passengers?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The Railway Board have been in correspondence with the principal Railway Administrations on the subject and have asked them to submit special reports on the principal points of complaint relating to third class passengers. The reports are being received and when they have been examined, the question of publication will be considered.

COAL MINE ACCIDENT AT PERBELI.

290. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government be pleased to state (a) the cause of the accident in a coal mine that recently took place at Perbeli, (b) the total number of persons killed and injured in the accident, (c) what steps Government propose to take to prevent such accidents hereafter and (d) whether compensation will be paid to the families of those who were killed and to those who will be permanently disabled?

Mr. A. H. Ley: (a) Government have not yet received information as to the cause of the accident beyond the bare statement that it was the result of an explosion of gas.

(b) So far as known, seventeen persons were killed outright and 58 injured, of the latter all save one have succumbed to their injuries.

(c) An official enquiry under section 18 of the Mines Act has been ordered by the Government of Bihar and Orissa, and, until a report of that enquiry is received, it is impossible to decide on the steps to be taken to prevent the occurrence of such accidents hereafter. Government will give the question their most careful consideration.

(d) There is at present no statutory obligation on employers to compensate the families of the killed or the injured. But Government are confident that a Company of the high standing of the Bengal Coal Company will do all in their power to relieve the hardship and suffering caused by this most lamentable accident.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Is it a fact that these accidents due to gas explosions have been on the increase of late? If so, what are the reasons? And when Government receive this report will enquiries be made as to whether that is a fact and whether steps cannot be taken for preventing them?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I cannot give the Honourable Member a categorical answer to that question, but I may point out that our mines are now beginning to get deeper and as coal mines get deeper the danger of gas becomes worse. The whole question of safety lamps and other preventatives against these accidents has, I believe, been for some time under the consideration of the Mining Board. I am afraid that is the only answer to the question that I can give.

CATERING DEPARTMENT, B. N. RAILWAY.

291. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government be pleased to state (a) the functions and activities of the Catering Department of the Bengal Nagpur Railway, (b) the amount spent during the year 1921-22 on the Indian Branch and the European Branch of the Department separately and (c) the amount of profit or loss made on each branch during the year 1921-22?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (a) The functions of the Catering Department of the Bengal Nagpur Railway are:

- (i) to ensure the service of good meals and refreshments for the benefit of the travelling public;
- (ii) to provide the staff with meals when on the line and with facilities for readily obtaining their provisions and stores at reasonable prices.

(b) The amount spent during the year 1921-22 on the Indian Branch of the Department was Rs. 33,289 and on the European Branch Rs. 2,79,700.

(c) The net profit made on the Indian Branch including licence fees aggregating Rs. 27,460 was Rs. 28,319 and on the European Branch Rs. 20,558.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Considering these figures, will the Government see the necessity of increasing the amount spent on the Indian Branch and decreasing that on the European Branch as the European Branch does not pay so much as the Indian Branch?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: They both pay, but I should like to point out that the European Branch is a misnomer, as the European Branch provides not only for Europeans but for all Indians who live in the European style.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Does the Government consider this sufficient reason for their spending money on a Branch which does not pay so much, neglecting another Branch which pays more?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Both Branches pay and Government consider that Railways must consider the comfort and convenience of all classes of passengers.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Is there a similar department in connection with the East Indian Railway or the Eastern Bengal State Railway? If so, what is the result of working there?

Mr. President: I think the Honourable Member must give notice of that question;

X'MAS CONCESSIONS ON RETURN TICKETS.

292. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government be pleased to state the reasons why the X'mas concession on return tickets is not extended to the Intermediate and third class passengers?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Government understand that the reason for limiting the X'mas concession to 1st and 2nd class passengers is that there is ordinarily more accommodation available in these than in the other classes.

As already stated in the reply to question No. 145 on the 17th January 1923 Government are bringing the matter of extending these concessions to the notice of Agents who will no doubt act in this direction as circumstances and conditions permit.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Am I to understand from the answer that in the case of first and second class carriages there is a surplus available always?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The intention of the answer is to bring out the fact that railways are commercial undertakings and that they give these concessions in order to increase traffic.

PUBLICATIONS OF PUBLICITY BUREAU.

293. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government be pleased to state (a) whether copies of the publications of the Publicity Bureau of the Government of India and of the annual report relating to the moral and material progress of India will be given free to all the members of the Indian Legislatures and (b) whether any copies of such publications are distributed free outside India and if so, what is the number of copies thus distributed of each publication?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) Copies of the Moral and Material Progress will in future be supplied free of cost to Members of the Indian Legislature. It is not considered necessary to provide copies of other publications free of cost.

(b) Yes. Twelve hundred copies of the Moral and Material Progress Report are sent to the Secretary of State for submission to Parliament. No copies of other publications are distributed free outside India.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: May I ask if the other publications of the Government of India are sent free to people who are not members of the Legislative Assembly?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The question referred to copies of publications of the Publicity Bureau of the Government of India. If the Honourable Member will subsequently ask me about the other publications I shall be able to supply the information asked for.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Am I to understand from this answer that these publications are given free to members of the Assembly?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Which publications?

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Publications of the Publicity Bureau?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I have said, Sir, that copies of the Moral and Material Progress Reports will be given free. It is not considered necessary to give other publications.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: My question, therefore, is whether Government is aware that copies of the other publications are distributed free to Members of Parliament in England.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: No, Sir; I do not understand that; my answer was that copies of the Moral and Material Progress Report are distributed free but not other publications.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: My question is about other publications also and I want a reply about the other publications.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: And I cannot reply to a question which does not refer to the subject matter of the original question. The Honourable Member asked me about copies of the Moral and Material Progress Report issued by the Publicity Bureau of the Government of India. I am not at present prepared with information regarding other publications.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Please look at my question; it is whether copies of publications of the Publicity Bureau of the Government of India and of the Annual Report are distributed free; I want to know whether publications besides the Annual Report are distributed free.

Mr. President: Order, order; the Honourable Member has had his answer; if he looks at it when printed he will find that it is full and sufficient.

INCONVENIENCES AT RAISINA.

204. Rai Sahib Lakshmi Narayan Lal: Are Government aware of the great inconvenience to which the residents of Raisina, Delhi, are put to owing to the want of (1) a high school for boys, (2) schools for girls (both European and Indian), and (3) recreation grounds, (i.e., football, tennis, etc.), for Government servants and their children? If so, do they propose to take necessary steps at once for the construction of the buildings required for the above institutions, etc.

The Honourable Mr. A. O. Chatterjee: For some years primary schools for Indian boys and girls have been located temporarily in clerks' quarters at Raisina, while during the winter season accommodation has been provided for a private school for European children of both sexes whenever asked for and whenever available. The construction of a high school will be begun in February next, while that of two primary schools, one for boys and the other for girls is nearing completion.

There are three clubs in Raisina which between them provide recreation for all classes of Government servants, except the artisans and menials. At all of these tennis can be played. There are also temporary public recreation grounds for football and hockey. The laying out of permanent grounds is now in progress.

ASSAULT ON A MEMBER OF LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY AT CAMPBELLPUR.

295. Mr. Mohammad Yamin Khan: (a) Is it a fact that a Member of the Legislative Assembly while getting into a first class compartment of the Bombay Mail at Campbellpur Junction of North-Western Railway on the morning of the 7th January, 1923, was insulted and assaulted by the Guard in charge of the train and the said Member made a report to the Station Master?

(b) What action, if any, has been taken by the Government?

(c) Do the Government propose to make an inquiry if the matter has not reached the Government as yet?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: A report has been called for from the Agent, North Western Railway, and it will be decided what action has to be taken, if any, on receipt of that report.

SEARCH LIGHTS ON TRAINS.

296. Mr. Mohammad Yamin Khan: (a) Has it been suggested to the Government that there should be a powerful search light at the head and at the back of every passenger train to avoid collision in night time?

(b) If suggestion of this nature has been made do the Government propose to consider this question?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) and (b) The question of the provision of electric head-lights on engines to ensure greater safety has been under consideration for some time and some Railway Administrations have already introduced them on certain sections experimentally. The question was informally discussed by the Indian Railway Conference Association at their meeting which was held in October last and the matter is now under correspondence between the Railway Board and the different railway administrations.

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

GRATUITIES ON RAILWAYS.

112. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Will Government be pleased to say (a) whether the order regarding the gratuities of the Railwaymen passed by the Secretary of State for India and His Excellency the Viceroy in the Government Gazette of 12th July, 1922 (Order No. 571-F.-17), has been communicated for action to the different Railway administrations; and if so, (b) whether it is being acted upon by them?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) and (b) The orders referred to have been communicated to the different Railway Administrations and as far as the Government are aware, are being acted upon.

REDUCTIONS ON RAILWAYS AND IN POSTAL DEPARTMENT.

113. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Are Government aware that reductions in low-paid sections of the establishments are made on the several Railways and in the Postal Department without any consideration whatsoever, of their long-standing and loyal service and throwing them out of employment practically with nothing to depend upon?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The Government regret that they are unable to consider sweeping statements of this nature. If any railway establishment is reduced, endeavour is invariably made to provide in other departments of railway working for those members of the permanent staff of long and loyal service whose appointments are abolished.

I would, however, remind this House that when the Railway budget for 1922-23 was being considered, great stress was laid, especially by non-official members, in the interests of economy, on the necessity for reducing ordinary working expenses.

All Agents have been giving this matter very close attention.

The principal means, in fact almost the only one, of securing such reduction is by getting rid of staff who are considered to be not absolutely indispensable.

These reductions have only been made after very careful investigation often by an officer specially appointed for this purpose.

No existing appointments in the Postal Department have so far been abolished, but the Director General, Posts and Telegraphs, has recently issued orders that permanent vacancies at the lowest points of chains of arrangements due to retirements, deaths, etc., in certain postal establishments should be temporarily left unfilled as far as possible and when this can be done with due regard to efficiency. Officials, therefore, have not been thrown out of employment, nor have their prospects been affected. Should it be found necessary to abolish appointments in the interests of economy special care will be taken in selecting the officials for discharge in consequence.

CHINAMEN IN RAILWAY WORKSHOPS.

114. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Are Government aware that while Indian workers are discharged from Railway workshops, their places are given to Chinamen on much higher wages?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Government do not admit the truth of the allegation contained in this question.

" G. I. P. WEEKLY NOTES."

115. Mr. N. M. Joshi: Is the paper called the G. I. P. Weekly Notes intended for the highly paid officials only; if not, why is it not supplied to all who ask for it though some of the notices appearing therein also affect the welfare of the workers?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Government has no information on the subject.

NICKEL EIGHT AND FOUR ANNA PIECES.

116. Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: (a) Are nickel-made eight-anna and four-anna pieces current coins at present?

(b) Is it not a fact that Delhi merchants refuse to accept them on the allegation that a prohibitory order has been issued in this respect by the local authority?

(c) What action do the Government propose to take in the matter if any?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: (a) and (c) I invite the Honourable Member's attention to the answer which I gave on the 23rd instant to a question on the same subject by Mr. K. N. Mitra. Nickel eight and four-anna pieces are current coins; the former are not now coined and issued by Government, but coins already issued are current like any other coin.

(b) There is no foundation for the allegation that a prohibitory order has been issued in this respect by any local authority.

CATTLE DETERIORATION.

117. Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: Has the attention of the Government been drawn to a letter issued by the Honorary Secretary, Marwari Association, Calcutta, on the 10th December, 1922, on the subject of cattle deterioration? If so, will the Government be pleased to lay the same on the table for the information of the House and state whether any action has been taken or is proposed to be taken in the matter?

Mr. J. Hullah: A copy of this letter has been received by Government and is appended. The attitude of Government in the matter was defined by the Honourable Mr. Sarma in his speech on the 19th September, 1922, in the Council of State in reply to the Honourable Lala Sukhbir Sinha's Resolution regarding the appointment of a Committee to enquire inter alia into the condition of grazing lands and the Government of India see no reason to depart from that attitude.

THE MARWARI ASSOCIATION.

100, HARRISON ROAD.

Calcutta, the 10th December 1922.

FROM

THE HONORARY SECRETARY,
MARWARI ASSOCIATION, CALCUTTA,

TO

THE HONOURABLE RAO BAHADUR B. N. SARMA.

DEAR SIR,

In view of the grave economic situation which has been created by the gradual but steady decline and deterioration of the cattle stock of the country, I am desired by the Marwari Association to address this appeal to you on the urgency of providing pasture land for the grazing of our draught and dairy cattle.

The villages in the interior where the nation lives furnish unmistakable proof of the awful decline and deterioration that have taken place in the number and quality of our cows, bulls and bullocks. In most of the rural homes, cows, bulls or bullocks are now conspicuous by their absence, the few that can be seen in others are mostly famished animals with visible ribs which can hardly be expected to be either good milkers or good plough cattle, and milk and milk products are scarcely available and extremely dear in consequence. But it is a matter of common knowledge that only a few decades back, cows, bulls and bullocks formed part of the possessions of almost every householder, many people used to keep large herds and milk and milk products were to be had in plenty and at a cheap price.

Ample evidence of their falling off in number and quality is available in the official records also. According to the live stock statistics recently published by the Government of India, the total number of cattle which was 147 millions in 1914-15 came down to 145 millions in 1919-20, in other words, there was a decline of more than 2 per cent. in 5 years. Is it necessary to point out that if the decline continues at this rate, the time is not far distant when the whole race of cow will be extinct in India?

As a result of this decline, the number of cattle per hundred of population now comes to 59, while it is 74 in Denmark, 79 in the United States of America, 80 in Canada, 120 in Cape Colony, 160 in New Zealand and 259 in Australia. The proportion is still higher in some other countries. If it is remembered in this connection that all the above countries are industrially far more advanced and economically far more prosperous than India and their people are not dependent mainly upon agriculture for their livelihood or upon milk and milk products for their nourishment like the people of India, it will be clear that the proportion of cattle per 100 of population is far too low in India.

In fact, the number of cattle now available in the country is inadequate for its needs. According to the official records, the area of arable land in British India is 228 million acres, but the number of plough cattle is only 49 millions. Leaving aside 25 per cent. of this number as sick, old and infirm and 25 per cent. for other works, 24½ millions only are available for purposes of cultivation. It means that a pair of cattle which, as every one knows, cannot properly till more than 5 acres of land in a season, has to till 19 acres, in other words, has to do the work of 4 pairs. It also means that India has only one-fourth the number of cattle required for the cultivation of its arable land. No wonder that cultivation in the country has become extremely inefficient and the rate of outturn of even the staple crops, such as wheat and rice, extremely poor compared to that of other countries. While the outturn of wheat is only 11·5 bushels per acre in India, it is 32 in Japan, 33 in Denmark, 30 in Great Britain and 32·5 in Switzerland. As regards rice, while India produces 35 bushels to the acre, Spain turns out 101 bushels. No wonder that although India requires about 9 crores tons of food grains for the consumption of her people every year, she is unable to produce much more than half that quantity and crores of people have to drag on a miserable existence, living on one meal a day or on semi-liquid food like rice water from years end to years end and many have to starve.

More deplorable is the condition in regard to our stock of milch cattle. The country does not possess more than one-eighth the number required to supply the people with a fair quantity of milk. There are said to be 50 millions of milch cattle in the country but ill fed and flimsied as they are, they have mostly lost their characteristics as good milkers. How greatly our milch cattle have deteriorated in quality will be evident from the fact that while only a quarter of a century back, the daily average yield of milk per head of cattle was 5 seers, it is 1 seer now. But where is the wonder? Can we expect milk from mere bags of bones? In England and Denmark the average yield of milk per day per head of cattle is 20 lbs. Could deterioration of Indian cattle go further? But this is not all. According to official publications, some of the finest breeds are in danger of total extinction. Where is the wonder that milk and milk products have become extremely scarce and dear, the rich man's luxury, beyond the reach of the middle and the poorer classes? While the price of food grains has risen 5 to 7 times during the last 60 years, that of milk has risen more than 40 times and even at such high price pure milk is not available.

The above figures reveal a terrible state of things from the point of view of the country's economic future and the health of the people and necessitate serious reflection.

Having regard to the fact that the cattle problem of the country is inseparably linked up with its health and bread problem, it is not a moment too soon now to find out the causes and to take necessary steps to remove them. One of the main causes which have contributed to bring about this serious decline and deterioration of India's cattle stock is the utter inadequacy of grazing grounds which, according to expert opinion, tells severely upon their health, and is the most important circumstance adverse to cattle breeding. What generally happens is that the owners, who are mostly poor and cannot afford the expenses of sufficiently feeding their cattle at home are compelled to sell them at a young age as they become too weak and emaciated to be of any service. None but the butchers care to buy such cattle and so, after serving their masters ill fed and ill nourished, throughout the few years of their life, these most useful domestic animals ultimately but prematurely go to the butchers' knife. Statistics show that about 10 millions of cattle are slaughtered every year in India. Who knows how many millions more find relief in death otherwise?

From official publications it appears that gradual encroachment on grazing lands both by the State and the people has led to the present awful want of pasture land and, as in other respects so in this, the condition in India is now the worst of all countries in the world. The area of land available per head of cattle for grazing is only ·17 acre in Bengal and a little more in other parts of India, while it is 1·6 acres in the United States of America, 1·35 acres in New Zealand and 1·44 acres in Germany though the price of land in those countries is far higher than in India. Cultivation of fodder crops is also very scanty, being only a little over 1 per cent. of the cropped area while in America it is 3.5 per cent. The prevalence of infectious diseases like rinderpest which carries off a large number of cattle every year is said to be due to no small extent to this cause.

The foregoing paragraphs show unmistakably that the miserable condition of the cattle stock of the country, their awful decline in number and deterioration in quality, —is due chiefly to neglect on the part of the Government and the people. It is very much to be regretted that in a country where, in the olden days, the laying aside of a tenth part of every village for pasturage was the law, where the keeping and rearing of cow was regarded as an act of merit and entitled the owners to titles of distinction, the people should forget themselves so far as to neglect the cow, the bull and the bullock. But the result of this neglect has been terrible. The inefficiency of cultivation, poor outturn of crops, scarcity and unparalleled rise of milk and milk products which constitute the chief nourishment of the people, insufficient supply and dearth of food and the consequent deterioration of the physical stamina of the people which makes them subject to frequent attacks of all sorts of diseases, heavy mortality among women of the child bearing age and among infants for want of nutrition and the gradual but steady advent of wasting diseases like tuberculosis are all attributable, in a large measure, to the depletion and deterioration of the cattle stock. To continue to neglect these animals is to invite irretrievable economic disaster to the country.

It is therefore high time that Government were approached for legislation on the subject authorising the District Boards and Municipalities to spend some portion of their income to acquire land for the free grazing of cattle till sufficient land has become available for the purpose in their jurisdiction, permitting free grazing in specified areas of Government forests and on the sides of public roads and providing for pasture land in Government Khas Mahals. My Association feel that while pressing the need of such a law on the attention of Government, if the Maharajas, Rajas, Nawabs and other big landlords, members of legislatures and the self-governing institutions of the country, such as the District Boards and Municipalities, will strive heart and soul and with a harmonious singleness of purpose to do what can be done independently of Government aid, it is yet possible to minimise the difficulties of the situation and to avert that otherwise inevitable disaster, at least to a large extent. All that is needed is to prevent encroachment upon pasture lands and where there is no land set apart as such, to see that all the available land is not brought under the plough every year, but that some portion is left uncultivated for two or three years at a stretch to be utilised for cattle grazing. When in due course that area is taken up for cultivation, an equal portion may be similarly left out elsewhere. While removing the want of pasture land, it will also increase the fertility of the land to the great benefit of the cultivators themselves. The fact cannot be ignored that by bringing every inch of available land under the plough every year and by depriving the household cattle of their grazing, more harm than good is done to the country.

It is therefore the earnest hope of my Association that in the best interests of the motherland you will do all that lies in your power to see that the existing inadequacy of pasturage is removed.

Yours faithfully,

(Sd.) DEBI PRASAD KHAITAN.

Honorary Secretary.

AUTUMN SESSION OF THE LEGISLATURE.

118. Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: Will the Government be pleased to state whether they contemplate holding a session of the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State during August or September this year? If so, when approximately and where (Simla or Delhi)?

Sir Henry Moncreiff Smith: The Government are not in a position to give the information asked for by the Honourable Member. I would remind him that under sub-section (2) of section 63-D, it is the Governor General and not the Government who has power to appoint such times and places for holding sessions of either Chamber as he thinks fit.

INTERMEDIATE AND THIRD CLASS PASSENGERS.

119. Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: On what Railways are intermediate and third class passengers not allowed to travel by mail trains (except servants)?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The Honourable Member is referred to the time-tables and guides published by railways from time to time in which he will find the information he requires.

INTERMEDIATE & THIRD CLASS PASSENGERS ON MAIL TRAINS.

120 Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: Are the Government reconsidering and revising the rules so as to allow intermediate and third class passengers holding long journey tickets to travel by mails uniformly on all Railways?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The rules in this respect vary necessarily with the conditions of traffic on different railway systems, and Government do not interfere ordinarily in a matter of this kind. If there are any special cases where the present rules cause serious inconvenience Government have no doubt that the railway administrations concerned will be prepared to listen to representations on the subject.

SERVANTS TRAVELLING BY RAIL

121 Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: Do the Government propose to modify the rules with regard to travelling of servants accompanying their masters on mail trains on Indian Railways by doubling the maximum number of servants in the case of first and second class passengers and also allowing one servant to travel with intermediate class passengers?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Government do not consider that the present is a suitable time to take up this question in view of the limited accommodation for servants on mail trains

3RD CLASS BOOKING OFFICE AT GHAZIABAD.

122. Mr. Mohammad Yamin Khan: Is it a fact that the 3rd class Booking Office at Ghaziabad station is outside the station and far removed from the 3rd class waiting hall and passengers suffer great inconvenience during rain and heat?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The question was referred to the Agent, East Indian Railway, who reports that the third class Booking Office and waiting hall at Ghaziabad station are contiguous.

FANS ON R & K. RAILWAY.

123. Mr. Mohammad Yamin Khan: Does the Rohilkhand and Kumaon Railway line provide fans in the 1st and 2nd class compartments during hot season? If not, will the Government be pleased to ask the Company to provide them?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Fans are provided, during the hot season, in 1st class compartments on the Rohilkund and Kumaon Railway. Hitherto 2nd class compartments on this railway have not been provided with fans but these are now being fitted.

SECOND GUARD ON O. & R. RAILWAY.

124. Mr. Mohammad Yamin Khan: Is it a fact that there used to be a second guard on the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway who was generally an Indian? Does he still continue in addition to the Conductor?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: On grounds of economy Conductor Guards were taken off mail trains in November last.

Mail and passenger trains on the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway carry either a Second Guard or Brakesman in addition to the Head Guard.

THIRD CLASS WAITING SHEDS.

125. Mr. Mohammad Yamin Khan: Is the Government aware that the 3rd class waiting sheds at Lucknow, Moradabad and Bareilly are occupied mostly by the stall-keepers to the discomfort of the passengers?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The question was referred to the Agent, Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway, who reports that steps are being taken to reduce the number of vendors in third class waiting halls at Lucknow and Bareilly, and that similar action will be taken in the case of the waiting hall at Moradabad, if necessary, on completion of investigation.

WATCHMEN ON BRIDGES.

126. Mr. Mohammad Yamin Khan: Does the Government appoint watchmen on all bridges during the rainy weather after the incident near Amroha?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Bridge watchmen are posted only where special circumstances render it desirable, and it has not been considered necessary to make any alteration in the arrangements for watching bridges owing to the Amroha accident. Railways are however usually patrolled during the rainy season.

BASAL STATION, N. W. RAILWAY.

127. Mr. Mohammad Yamin Khan: (i) Is there a raised platform on the Basal Junction station, North-Western Railway?

(ii) Is there a waiting room on the said station?

(iii) If the answer to (i) and (ii) is in the negative, will the Government be pleased to erect them?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (i) No.

(ii) No.

(iii) These facilities are provided according as the number of passengers using the particular station justifies them and it is generally left to the Railway Administrations concerned to decide whether such facilities are or are not required at individual stations on their systems.

REGISTRAR, REVENUE AND AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

128. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) Is it a fact that the Registrar, Department of Revenue and Agriculture, Government of India, is on extended service?

(b) Is it a fact that his two predecessors were also granted extensions of service?

(c) Has it become a practice in the Department to grant extensions of service to every Registrar?

(d) When is the present Registrar of the Department due to retire?

(e) Is it contemplated to grant him further extension of service, and is the approval of the Honourable Member in charge of the Department required under Departmental rules to the grant of such extension of service?

(f) Do the Government intend to consider the desirability of discontinuing the practice of granting such extensions of service as these block promotions?

Mr. J. Hullah: (a) No.

(b) Yes.

(c) No.

(d) On the 1st July 1927, when he will attain the age of 60.

(e) The first part of the question does not arise. The orders of the Honourable Member are taken on all cases of extensions of service to gazetted officers of the Department.

(f) There is no such practice and such extensions are given only for special reasons.

REGISTRAR, R. & A. DEPARTMENT, AS ASSISTANT SECRETARY.

129. Mr. K. O. Neogy: Does the Government contemplate appointing the Registrar of the Department of Revenue and Agriculture as Assistant Secretary in the near future? If so, on what pay?

Mr. J. Hullah: The Registrar has been appointed temporarily as Assistant Secretary in addition to performing his own duties. The change was necessitated by the fact that the Under Secretary in the Department has gone on leave and it is not proposed to fill up the post pending consideration of the Incheape Committee's proposals. In addition to his pay as Registrar he draws a duty allowance of Rs. 250 per mensem for carrying on the dual duties. The net effect is a saving of Rs. 1,600 per mensem.

SUPERINTENDENTS IN R. & A. DEPARTMENT.

130. Mr. K. O. Neogy: (a) Is it a fact that no Indian has been appointed as a permanent Superintendent in the Department of Revenue and Agriculture since that department was created?

(b) If the reply to part (a) be in the affirmative will the Government please state the reasons for the same?

(c) Will the Government now promise to give effect to the policy of Indianisation by appointing permanent Indian Superintendents as several other Departments have done?

Mr. J. Hullah: (a) Yes.

(b) The reason is that only a few Indians were recruited in the early days of the Department, and the only two Indians who have so far become eligible by seniority for permanent appointment were both declared unfit to hold the post of Superintendent after being given a trial in that appointment.

(c) Promotion is by seniority subject to the test of efficiency and Assistants will be promoted on this basis regardless of the fact whether they are Europeans, Anglo-Indians or Indians. No promise can be given that Indians will be promoted out of their turn.

. OUTSIDERS IN REVENUE AND AGRICULTURE DEPARTMENT.

181. Mr. K. O. Neogy: Will the Government kindly state:

- (a) as to how many outsiders have been appointed in the Department of Revenue and Agriculture to the ministerial staff since 1916?
- (b) how many of them were placed in the seniority list above other Assistants?
- (c) what were the educational and special qualifications possessed by such outsiders?

Mr. J. Hullah: (a) The question is not understood. All appointments to the Department are necessarily made from outsiders.

(b) One.

(c) He passed the High School Examination for European Schools and studied up to the B.A. standard and was specially recommended as a good clerk and fit for a Superintendentship.

THE MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadian Itural): Sir, before we proceed to the legislative business I have to ask your permission to move that the name of Mr. Rangachariar be added to the Select Committee which has been appointed to consider the Married Women's Property (Amendment) Bill. The rules provide that when the Law Member is not a member of this Assembly, one of the Chairmen shall be a member of the Select Committee. I wish to make this motion for the consideration of the Assembly.

The motion was adopted.

* STATEMENT OF BUSINESS.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: I wish to place the House in possession of any plans we have for the disposal of business for the remaining days of the week. The House will see that they will be in the hands of Mr. Hullah and Mr. Innes and Mr. Burdon for to-day and probably to-morrow. If there is any business remaining over from the motions which will be put forward by those Honourable Members, we shall continue that business and finish it on Wednesday, and shall then proceed with the Criminal Procedure Code (Amendment) Bill. On Thursday there are two important Government Resolutions which will be put forward by Mr. Hullah. I hope to-morrow morning to make a statement regarding the business on Friday or Saturday. I cannot at present state whether our free day will be Friday or Saturday, but we shall be working on one of those two days.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadian): Will the Honourable the Home Member inform the House of the two important Resolutions coming on for discussion?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: Resolution regarding emigration.

Mr. J. Hullah (Revenue and Agriculture Secretary): Resolutions moving that the notifications already laid before the Assembly in respect of emigration to Malaya and to Ceylon be approved.

THE INDIAN COTTON CESS BILL.

Mr. J. Hullah (Revenue and Agriculture Secretary): I beg to move, Sir:

"That this Assembly do recommend to the Council of State that the Bill to provide for the creation of a fund for the improvement and development of the growing, marketing and manufacture of cotton in India, be referred to a Joint Committee of this Assembly and of the Council of State and that the Joint Committee do consist of twelve Members."

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, before the House commits itself to the principle of the Bill I wish to make a few observations. I do not in any way wish it to be understood that I rise to oppose the Bill; but I wish to point out one or two dangers against which I hope the Select Committee will make a provision. The first danger is this: the Fiscal Commission has unanimously recommended that there should be no export duty on cotton, for this reason—that if an export duty existed middlemen would take advantage of the existence of an export duty and try to get cotton from the growers at very cheap rates. Now, a cess is justified when the revenue derived from the cess is used for the purpose of benefitting the industry itself. I wish that the Select Committee would provide against the danger of middlemen exploiting this cess for the purpose of deceiving the grower of cotton into selling him cotton at cheap rates. That is the first danger. The second danger against which also a safeguard may be provided is this: as the Fiscal Commission has unanimously condemned the principle of export duties I wish the Select Committee to provide specifically that the instance of this cess may not at a future date be used as precedent for levying an export duty. These are the two dangers against which I hope the Select Committee will provide safeguards.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, as one primarily interested in agriculture and one personally interested in the growing of cotton, I am afraid this cess will eventually fall upon the producer. The primary objects in view which the Central Cotton Committee had are for the benefit of the industry; but to levy this cess on exported cotton is sure to fall upon the producer. The example of the import duty levied in Bombay for the Town Improvement Trust has already shown that the producer suffers by the addition of these cesses and duties, for the prices fall down and the buyers take advantage of these cesses and duties and reduce the price which the producer eventually gets. Almost all the objects which the Central Cotton Committee have in view are for the benefit of the spinner and the industry will have to pay for such improvements which are to be effected on the recommendations of the Central Cotton Committee and not the producer. Sir, the producer will profit, if for instance the marketing conditions are made better; but I find very little trace of any attempt being made in that direction. On the other hand, most of the objects in view are for improving cotton so as to be available in finer quality for the spinner and the industry. Therefore, Sir, I ask whether it is at all necessary, having regard to the objects in view, that you should tax exported cotton, whether you should put this cess on exported cotton, whether you will not get enough amount by merely imposing a cess on the cotton consumed in the mills in the country. I think, Sir, you will readily realise that, after all, the recurring expenditure which the Cotton Committee have in view is about 2 lakhs per annum. One lakh goes to the expenditure of the Committee itself, and one lakh for the Technological Institute which they propose to establish. In allowing a good margin a return of 2 to 3 lakhs will be ample for carrying out the purposes which the Cotton Committee have in view, and so far as I am able to see from the papers placed before us, I do not see what other objects there are on which this money is going to be spent. They expect to raise between 8 and 9 lakhs, and I am sure it will go up to more than 10 lakhs in good years, and what they are going to do with this money is rather problematic. I therefore think, Sir, having regard to the immediate needs, it is enough if the cess is imposed merely on the cotton consumed in the mills in the country.

Then, Sir, the persons who are going primarily to profit by the efforts of this department will be the persons who will not pay for it and the producer will suffer thereby. The example of the Empire Cotton Growing Association in England is to be kept in view in this connection, as they propose to levy an import duty on all cotton imported into England. There, Sir, it will fall on the industry and not upon the producer, but here by imposing the cess on the export of cotton the burden will fall on the producer who, in many cases, are poor ryots and who cannot afford to lose the 4 annas or 8 annas as the case may be per bale. It may be said, for instance, that there are such violent fluctuations in the price of cotton that this cess will not really affect the price which the producer will get. But, Sir, past experience has shown everywhere that the imposition of a duty or a cess like this really falls on the producer, and I do not think therefore that it is right to impose this cess on exported cotton. That is the first point that I wish to make.

Another matter which I wish to mention is this, at this rate I am afraid the agriculturist in this country may have to face further legislative measures in view of the scientific improvements which are to be effected in this country for the benefit of agriculture. Take for instance the sugarcane industry, tobacco industry or any other industry in this country. If the Government are going to find departments and institute research work for the purpose of improving those commodities, are we going to have cesses like these imposed upon every kind of crop grown in the country? Are not the general revenues to meet the requirements in this connection? Is the present cess going to be a precedent in other directions? Therefore, Sir, I want to sound a note of warning that, these cesses, although they may sound small individually, when piled up will fall heavily upon the producer. Therefore this is likely to be a bad precedent, and I am not sure whether the Government of India's decision in 1919-1920 which they have now reviewed at the instance of the Central Cotton Committee, whether their first decision was not the right decision in this matter, whether the Government of India did not come to a right conclusion when they refused to accept the recommendation of the Central Cotton Committee in the first instance. They have now reviewed that decision because the Central Cotton Committee has asked for a reconsideration of the matter. I am aware, Sir, in this connection that the Local Governments have not raised any opposition to this measure, but at the same time I do not know, agriculture being a transferred provincial subject, whether we are not trenching upon the provincial fields, and I feel that when we impose a cess like this it is really a cess on agricultural products.

Again, there is a difficulty in the administration of the fund which is going to be raised. There will be provincial jealousies created in the application of the funds. I am aware that a Committee is being constituted, but, Sir, look at the composition of the Committee. It is far too large. I have counted about 29 in the enumerated list, and the Government are going to add to it by nomination. An unwieldy Committee of this size, a miniature Central Legislative Council as it were, for the purpose of improving cotton is being constituted by this Bill. Look at the travelling allowances and other expenses which you will have to pay for all these Members to come here; when you have expert Agricultural departments in almost every province which are now working with great credit, what is the object of instituting a Central Cotton Committee of such unwieldy dimensions? When are they to meet, how often are they to meet, how far are these committee meetings going to be of any real use that it should spend one lakh of rupees by raising this cess, I mean the advantages to be derived are rather problematical, the inconveniences rather large, and I am not sure whether really we are doing a wise thing in perpetuating this Central Advisory Body as it were. Is it not enough if the heads of the Agricultural department in each province meet, as they do meet? Why should a Committee be constituted for this purpose? Could not the Government of India be trusted to distribute the funds in this matter, and the local representatives here in the Legislative Assembly to give advice on the disposal of the funds thus raised? Why should this Committee be created for this purpose—a costly machinery—I fail to see.

Sir, there is one other matter which I wish to mention, and that is the question of the employment of experts when once this fund has been raised for the Technological Institute or for research work. Sir, the experience of the past has shown that, when we have other expert departments where experts are employed, Indians have not been given the full benefit which they ought to have been given. When I asked a question the other day whether the Indians who were trained in the Dehra Dun Institute had become sufficiently fit to be appointed as experts, I was told that they were not yet fit. So similarly, where you import costly foreign experts, I hope they will be imported only on contracts limited to a short period and you will make it a condition precedent that they should train Indians and that speedily and without any delay or hesitation in that matter. In this connection I may point out, Sir, that the progress of creating Indian experts in these matters has not been as rapid, as sound and as satisfactory, as it should have been. I do not oppose this Bill, but I do think these matters require to be carefully considered in the Select Committee, and I hope when the Central Cotton Committee comes into existence, it will be one of its primary functions, if it is really going to profit the country, to see that more facilities are created in the shape of marketing the commodity for the producers. I therefore, hope, Sir, in according my support to this Bill, the Government of India will take it that we are not likely to encourage such further measures as this if the attempt is made to tax other agricultural products, because already land revenue in this country is a crushing burden, and why with all this land revenue especially in provinces where ryotwari settlement prevails where we have got periodical revisions and all sorts of cesses are raised on the land, should the producer again be called upon to pay this cess? After all, although these cesses are indirectly levied on the produce exported, as I have said, they are bound to fall on the producer. I therefore, Sir, make these remarks in order that the Select Committee may consider them carefully.

Mr. B. H. E. Jatkar (Berar Representative): Sir, I wish to offer some remarks about this Bill before it is sent to the Joint Committee. I entirely agree with my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, in saying that, whatever cess is imposed upon cotton would ultimately fall upon the producer and the grower of the cotton. And, if this Bill is to do any good to any person, it should be to the grower and not to the trading classes. The entire fund would be coming from the pockets of the grower of the cotton and it should be the principal aim of this Bill to provide for agricultural research and agricultural research only, and also for the improvement of the marketing of cotton. But the title of the Bill refers also to the improvement of the manufacture of cotton. The improvement of the manufacture of cotton should not be the aim of this Bill. Even the Indian Cotton Committee, while recommending that a cess should be imposed, has distinctly stated that the funds should be utilised for agricultural research, so as to increase the production of long staple cotton and also to increase the yield and ginning percentage of cotton. That also is embodied in one of the recommendations of the Central Cotton Committee, where it is stated that an improved yield per acre and the production of suitable types of plant combining long staple with high yield and hardiness are essential to real progress and this can only be achieved by provision for agricultural research on a scale not yet attempted. So that, whatever funds should be raised out of the cess should be solely utilised for agricultural research and not for the improvement of the manufacture of cotton or for the benefit of the trading classes. Our friend, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, has given the view of the manufacturer of cotton. In the constitution of the Central Cotton Committee we find that only four persons are stated to be the representatives of the growers and these four persons are to be nominated, one from each of the provinces of Madras, U. P., C. P. and the Punjab. The part from which I come—I mean the four districts of Berar only—yield not less than 1/6th of the total produce of India. That, of course, can be said to be included in the Central Provinces, but the representation given to the growers is very poor. I think cotton growers have got some organisations in my part of the province at least, and these representatives should be elected by those cotton growers' organisations, like agricultural unions, seed unions and agricultural societies.

About marketing not a word is said in the Bill. There are cotton markets in Berar under a special law which are not found in any other part of the country. That has been praised by the Indian Cotton Committee, it is true, but a cotton market is also for the benefit of the trader and for the purchaser of the cotton. There is nothing to encourage the organisations of growers themselves who bring to the cotton markets thousands of carts and are completely at the mercy of the purchasers who are either mill-agents or the agents of the exporters. It would be much better if this Bill would provide for creating such organisations and encouraging them so that the growers of cotton who bring their cotton to the markets for sale should be enabled to withstand the caprices of the purchasers. If anybody has experience of these cotton markets and the prices of the cotton, which are telegraphed every day from Bombay to all the outlying stations, he will find that the rates prevailing in the various cotton markets are far below what are prevalent in Bombay itself, and these cotton growers who bring their carts of cotton have got no other alternative but to sell them at whatever price they are offered by cotton purchasers. They are entirely at the mercy of the purchasers. But if there are better organisations and if they are encouraged, I believe the growers can withstand pressure of the purchasers and get better prices for their cotton. So that I would only suggest that in the Bill itself this aim of the improvement in the manufacture of cotton should be taken away and the provision for spending funds for technological research should also be omitted, and the Bill should be confined only to the improvement and development of the growing and marketing of cotton. With these remarks, Sir, I join wholeheartedly in the remarks made by my friend, Mr. Rangachariar.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, when this Bill was introduced we thought that it was going to be an absolutely uncontentious and innocuous measure. It looks as if it is going to be otherwise. We from Bengal have a small, but not negligible, interest in the matter, which, I think, ought to be pressed on those who, in the name of avoiding the bogie of provincial jealousies, are really fostering them. The question arose some time ago, Sir, in this House about the steady deterioration of Bengal cotton for which we wanted a remedy and we were told that that was a matter for the provincial Government as Agriculture was a transferred subject. Evidently that opinion has not found support in the movement represented by this Bill, for it seeks to promote research from the point of view of all Provinces. I therefore welcome it. Bengal cotton, which at one time was good, is not what it used to be, and we are therefore much interested to see that steps are about to be taken by which Bengal cotton may get back something of its old lost place. Steady research, no matter benefitting which province, is necessary in that direction. I do not agree, Sir, that the cess should fall only on consumption in the mills in this country. There is no reason in that. That would indeed make it a worse excise than prevails at the present moment. Nor do I agree with Mr. Jammadas Dwarkadas, that it is entirely in the nature of an export duty which has to be guarded against with regard to the possibility of future contingencies. It has partially that character, no doubt, but, as the cess is to be on the local industries as well as on exports, the objectionable character of both will be taken away and there will be a balancing which, I think, ought to be welcomed both by the industrial element as well as the exporting element. Whatever you may do, the producer has in the first instance to pay. Mr. Rangachariar's apprehension is well founded so far. But does he think that the mills, with some of which I am concerned directly, in making their purchases will try to exploit the producer in the same way as the man exporting cotton and will he not take it out of the grower in the first instance? But it must fall on the consumer in the long run. And the grower is ultimately benefitted as was pointed out by the last speaker. Therefore, we should not grudge that possibility of advance in the science of cultivation. I quite agree that marketing and manufacturing ought not to claim the place that has been given in the Bill to the producer's point of view. The producer ultimately gains and so does the industry and so does the country more or less. I do not want in this connection to go into other apprehended contingencies about other agricultural produce having to be taxed in future. It may or may not be taxed. We are crying out for retrenchment in many directions which cannot be resisted. At the same time we cannot neglect these researches which Central Finance cannot any longer pay for. Therefore somebody will have to pay for them. If the country at large out of its revenues is not prepared to pay for research, the interest concerned will have to pay. You have an admirable illustration in the case of the tea cess. Not exactly for the purpose of promoting the growth but for propaganda work this tea cess is of much benefit to the tea industry. The tea industry willingly and cheerfully submitted to it and welcomed it. They have other arrangements for carrying on research in the Indian Tea Association apart from the tea cess which is utilised for propaganda work. Therefore if the industry or the agriculture concerned understands its real interest it will welcome and promote research even at its own cost. Somebody will have to pay for it. I should very much like that the Central revenues or the Provincial revenues as occasion required should pay for it, but if in the lean times that we have this is not possible, the interest concerned directly will have to pay.

Regarding the Central Committee, mentioned in the Bill, Sir, I share Mr. Rangachariar's apprehensions and I am sure ways and means may be found by which the working expenses may be cut down as far as possible. But it is too late in the day after assenting to the principles of the Cotton Transport Bill to resist this measure, because. . . .

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: What has that got to do with this? What has cotton transport got to do with the cess on cotton?

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: It has. The Transport Bill is necessary because inferior cotton has to be dealt with and we want to get rid of that possibility altogether or at least in a large measure by better production. Therefore, if not immediately and directly, the question of controlling cotton transport has more than indirectly to do with this question. As soon as we are in a position to minimise the deterioration in product in every province the question of vitiated transport will ease of itself and the rigorous measures in the Transport Bill will not have to be extended in future to the same degree. It has therefore that bearing. For all these reasons it appears to me, Sir, that the Bill is in the main on proper and acceptable lines, and the questions that have been raised will undoubtedly be dealt with in the Select Committee. Out of the Select Committee a very acceptable measure ought to emerge. I therefore give the measure my support.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, although he accorded his support to this Bill, gave it in a very grudging manner, and while doing so expressed certain fears regarding this Bill. I am sorry I have to differ from my friend Mr. Rangachariar in his views. Mr. Rangachariar was actuated, I think, by very orthodox views about taxation in this matter. I am not so rigid, I mean not so rigidly orthodox in my view of taxation. Taking a broad and a very large view of the matter, the only way to look at this measure is whether this cess will in the long run benefit the country and produce more wealth for the country. I believe if the staple of the cotton and the quality of the cotton is improved by research, it will bring in from foreign markets far more wealth into the country in the shape of better prices both for the producer and for the industrialist; if that is so, I believe we ought to support this Bill wholeheartedly. I do think from what I know of the agricultural aspect of cotton growing that a cess like this, if it is utilised well, is likely to improve cotton and thereby bring much larger wealth for the producer and also for the industrialist. Mr. Rangachariar expressed the fear that this Bill would prove a bad precedent. That depends upon this House. Each Bill has to be considered on its own merits. This Bill need not necessarily be a precedent. When the next Bill levying a cess comes before us if it is vicious in its principle, we can throw it out and we need not be carried away by the idea that this is necessarily a precedent. Regarding the unwieldy character of the Central Committee I have to point out to Mr. Rangachariar that after all the expenses of that Committee will be met from the proceeds of this cess. If this cess defrays the cost of that Committee, if the Committee pays its own way and if it does not prove an additional burden on the general revenues of the country, well, we need not be very much particular about it. As long as this fund is self-contained and is able to pay for the expenses of the Committee, I think we need not grudge the unwieldy character of that Central Committee.

Mr. J. Hullah: Sir, the points raised by Honourable Members will of course receive the careful attention of the Joint Committee but I should like to make a few remarks upon them. Mr. Rangachariar has told us that a cess on exports will fall upon the producer. I confess that I do not know on whom the burden of the cess will fall. The opinions in the papers circulated to Honourable Members are extremely divergent. The Bombay Chamber of Commerce, for instance, is of opinion that the cess will not in any way fall upon the producer. It occurs to me that when Indian cotton is of such very great importance in the world market, the purchaser of that cotton will be bound to pay the whole of the cess or at least a part of it. The position is very much the same as in the case of rice. The surplus available from the Indian and Burma rice crops bears so great a proportion to the surplus available for the world generally that it is admitted on all hands that the small export tax of three annas a maund on rice has not been felt in any way by the producer.

More important is the attack that has been made on the Bill—a sympathetic attack, I think—on the ground that it does not do enough and will not do enough for the cultivator. When I introduced the Bill I attempted to lay special emphasis on the fact that the Indian Cotton Committee, the Central Cotton Committee and the Government of India placed in the forefront of their proposals measures for the benefit of the cultivator, and we do not in any way intend to let this Bill operate as a measure for the benefit of the milling industry and the milling industry alone. The Central Cotton Committee itself has rejected a proposal that part of the scientific work of the proposed technologist should be the testing of yarns and cloth for the mills. When I introduced the Bill I gave a very brief account of the definite measures of agricultural improvement that we propose to undertake and which have already been approved by the Central Cotton Committee. But the Honourable the Deputy President, who was in the Chair, was constrained to call me to order because I was exceeding the time usually allowed to a Member in introducing a Bill, and that is why I gave only a very brief description of the measures that we have in view. I have before me now here and I could, except that I again do not wish to take up too much time, tell the House of about a dozen definite proposals in different provinces for definite schemes already approved by the Central Cotton Committee. The cost of those schemes altogether runs up to more than 17 lakhs. The proceeds of the cess, as I said before, we anticipate will be from 8 to 9 lakhs. I refrain again from setting forth these schemes in detail, but no doubt the Joint Committee will require to be satisfied about them when they consider the very important point of the amount of the cess,—whether it is to be, as we propose, four annas per bale. Are we going to have cesses on everything, asked Mr. Rangachariar. I see 12 Noon. no objection to a cess if it is paid by the industry and the industry is ready to bear it. In all cases where we have cesses, the lac cess, the indigo cess and the tea cess, the cess has been imposed on the industry itself and is paid by the industry. Mr. Rangachariar once told me that he was in favour of restricting the export of oil-seeds. What about the burden occasioned in that case? I do not say that the burden of a tax on the export of oil-seeds would fall on the cultivator, but Mr. Rangachariar's present attitude at any rate is hardly consistent with that which he adopted then. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "The cultivator will be benefitted by the manure.") We are told that the Committee is too large. We rather feel that ourselves. It is a very big Committee. But there are so many provinces and interests to be represented and there has been so marked a feeling that the agricultural interest has not been sufficiently represented that we have added four agricultural representatives. But I may say that the power of nomination given to the Governor General in Council is intended to be very sparingly used, if used at all. Lastly, Mr. Rangachariar mentioned the question of Indianisation. That is in the forefront of everything, and I, for one, do not deny that it should be so. As I remarked to an Honourable Member this morning we have even Indianised the temperature of this room. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "You cannot Indianise India.") That is not for me. It may be of interest to the Assembly to know that in the Agricultural Department, at any rate, Indianisation is proceeding apace. So far as it is possible for the provinces to fill up vacancies in their sanctioned posts, these are being filled by Indians. Out of 12 appointments in the Imperial Service made in the last eighteen months, 11 have been given to Indians. Among the proposals which are before the Central Cotton Committee regarding the purpose to which the proceeds of the cess will be devoted is a scheme of research studentships, for six students in the first place, who would be selected from among distinguished graduates of Indian Universities and placed under experienced research workers to be trained in agricultural research. The object of the scheme is gradually to build up a corps of trained Indian research workers.

I now commend my motion to the House.

The motion was adopted.

THE INDIAN BOILERS BILL.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member):
 I beg to move:

"That the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill to consolidate and amend the law relating to steam-boilers be taken into consideration."

I have already explained fully in this House the reason why we wish to get this Bill passed. Briefly, that reason is this. There are at present 7 different Boiler Acts in 7 different Provinces, and the Acts and Regulations differ in material respects. The result is that measures designed to secure the safety of human life are not the same in all Provinces. Under the Devolution Rules the Government of India, the Central Government, is charged with the duty of all-India legislation with regard to boilers and we want by means of this Bill to enforce, all over India uniform regulations and uniform procedure in regard to boilers which, as I have already stated, are very dangerous vessels. The Bill which I submitted to the House last September has been examined very carefully by the Joint Committee, and the Joint Committee has submitted a very full report. That report has been in the hands of Honourable Members for the last seven days and I have no doubt that it has been studied with the care and attention that it deserves. In the circumstances, I do not propose to delay the House any further, especially as I have been given notice of certain amendments. I move that the Bill be taken into consideration.

The motion was adopted.

Clauses 1, 2 and 3, as amended by the Joint Committee, clause 4, clause 5, as amended by the Joint Committee, were added to the Bill.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 6, as amended by the Joint Committee, do stand part of the Bill.

Mr. B. H. R. Jatkar (Berar Representative): Sir, I have sent in an amendment to this clause 6. In clause 6 (c) I propose that the following amendment be made:

"Omit from the words 'where the Local Government etc.' to 'certificates of competency', and substitute 'of competency' for 'required by such rules'."

That is the amendment that I have sent in.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I am afraid I have received no notice of this amendment. I must take a point of order Sir, because this is a very technical Bill and I think I am entitled, at any rate, to some notice of the amendment. I cannot be expected to deal with amendments suddenly raised on the floor of the House to the Bill.

Mr. President: No notice has reached me. Therefore, I am afraid I cannot allow the amendment. I uphold the point of order raised by the Honourable Mr. Innes.

Clauses 6 and 7, as amended by the Joint Committee, were added to the Bill.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 8, as amended by the Joint Committee, do stand part of the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhamadan): The amendment I move is:

"In clause 8 in proviso to the sub-clause (4) substitute the words 'for reasons provided in sub-clauses (b), (c), (d), (e) and (f) of sub-section (1)' for the words 'owing to making of any structural alteration, addition or renewal'."

Sir, under this clause 8 a person is also required to send along with the application for renewal, a certain amount of fee, and this fee has been exempted in certain cases. That exemption has been provided in the proviso to sub-clause (4). There it is laid down that in the case where the certificate has ceased to be in force owing to the making of any structural alteration, addition or renewal, the fee may be excused. The certificate ceases to hold good in certain cases that have been provided in sub-clause (1). It may be on the expiration of the period or it may be on account of any accident to the boiler or some structural alteration or addition or renewal or some other causes. These have been provided there. I would like to have put in this proviso that the exemption should also extend to all those cases except to such cases where the period for which the certificate was granted has expired. It is not proper that the person should be required to pay the fee over again where the period of certificate has not expired. If the period has expired, then the fee may by all means be charged, but when the period has not expired and only some alterations or renewals have been made, as provided in clauses (b), (c), (d), (e) and (f) I think the fee should not be charged, as there is no good reason for charging it. The fee once paid continues up to the end of the period for which the certificate was granted; why should it then be necessary that a further fee be charged? If it is said that the renewal, alteration or construction or addition might require the Chief Inspector to inspect the boiler, and this inspection will entail some waste of the time and energy of a public servant, so the person who makes the renewal, etc., should be made to pay for it. But this argument fails when you exempt the person who makes some alteration or renewal. In that case also the Chief Inspector will have to inspect before renewal of certificate; and so if there is an exemption in that case there should be an exemption in other case too if the period of the certificate has not expired. If the period has expired you should certainly charge an additional fee, but not otherwise. Therefore I commend my amendment for consideration.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I should first like to point out that this proviso does not provide that exemption shall be given. It merely gives the Chief Inspector power to remit the fees if he thinks fit. The next point I desire to make is this. We have to remember now that we are dealing with a matter which closely affects Local Governments. The theory of course is that they charge sufficient fees in order to recover the cost of the services rendered. Now if there is an accident to a boiler, or if a steam pipe of a boiler is found to be in a dangerous condition, and the certificate has to be renewed, what does it mean? It means the Chief Inspector may have to go a long way and spend a long time in making a very careful examination of that boiler, and surely, as this is a business department rendering a very useful service to the boiler owners, the Local Government should be entitled to charge fees for those services. In England the Government undertakes no responsibility in regard to the inspection of boilers; it is left to the Insurance Companies with whom the boilers are insured. Out here, owing to the fact that the Insurance Companies do not do that business, we have to undertake the work ourselves, we have to undertake it because it is very important in the interest of human safety and human life, and if we do undertake that work, surely the Local Government which provides the inspection staff should be entitled to charge fees for the valuable services that inspection staff renders. . . .

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muham-madan Rural): What is the amount of the fees so charged?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The amount of fees is regulated by the Local Government under the rule-making power.

The motion was negatived.

The motion that clause 8 do stand part of the Bill was adopted.

The motion that clauses 9 and 10 do stand part of the Bill was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, the amendment which I propose to move in this clause is to the effect:

"That in sub-clause (a) of clause 11, omit all the words after the word 'obtained'."

Sub-clause (a) of clause 11 runs as follows:

"(a) if there is reason to believe that the certificate or provisional order has been fraudulently obtained or has been granted erroneously or without sufficient examination; or."

My amendment will make the sub-clause read:

"if there is reason to believe that the certificate or provisional order has been fraudulently obtained."

Sir, the object of clause 11 is to provide for revocation of certificates or provisional orders, and it has been provided that if a certificate has been erroneously given, or given without any sufficient examination, that certificate may subsequently be revoked or cancelled. Now this will make all the certificates that are given before that uncertain and a man may not be certain at what moment the Chief Inspector may come round, and say, 'Well, it was a mistake I committed as I did not make a proper examination and your certificate is revoked.' Such a state of affairs is undesirable. They will always be in terror and fear of the certificate being revoked at any time at the sweet will and mercy of the Inspector or Chief Inspector. There are other remedies provided and certificates cease to hold good, under circumstances provided in clause 8, and there seems to be no necessity to provide such a drastic provision in addition. If the Chief Inspector finds that in any way the boiler is in a dangerous state or some other things have happened, he may proceed under clause 8, and the certificate will cease to hold good. Why then should you allow him to turn round at any moment to say that the certificate had been erroneously granted or given without sufficient examination? Therefore to safeguard the interests of the boiler owners and managers, I put before the House my amendment for acceptance.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, the object of the words which the Honourable Member suggests should be omitted is to enable the Chief Inspector, if he finds a mistake has been committed, to correct that mistake. The words are taken from the existing Acts. They occur in the Central Provinces Act, from which Province the Honourable Member comes. As far as I am aware, the existence of those words in the Act has never given rise to any of the results to which the Honourable Member has referred. As I have said, we are merely continuing the existing Act and the existing practice. It is a useful power for the Chief Inspector to have because it enables him to correct a mistake if one has been made. In these circumstances I hope the House will leave the words as they are.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, the amendment I move is:

"In sub-clause (d) of clause 11, after the word 'who' insert 'does not hold a certificate of competency, and'."

[Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri.]

Clause (c) refers to such Provinces where a Local Government has prescribed a condition that only that person can hold charge of a boiler who holds a certificate of competency; and clause (d) lays down that in Provinces where there is no such provision and where the Chief Inspector finds that the man in charge of a certain boiler was not competent under certain circumstances to hold charge of the boiler, the certificate be revoked. My submission is that in those Provinces in which the Provincial Governments have not prescribed such rules, there may be engineers in charge of boilers who may be holding certificates of competency obtained from other Provinces. If there be such persons who hold such certificates they should not be declared to be incompetent under sub-clause (d) but if they hold a certificate and are declared to be incompetent then the certificate might cease to hold good, not otherwise. Therefore I put my amendment before the House for acceptance.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: This clause, Sir, was the result of very careful thought and examination on the part of the Joint Select Committee. The facts of the case are that both the Indian Industrial Commission and the Boilers Law Committee examined very closely this question of certificates of competency and they condemned the system root and branch; they said it was not useful for the purpose for which it had been devised. Consequently, in the first draft of the Bill which we sent out we made no provision for certificates at all on the ground that we did not regard this system of certifying boiler attendants in any way as essential to the safety of human life. After all, that is the main thing we have in view in this Act. When the Bill was circulated, we found that in one province, namely, Bombay, there was a strong opinion both among the mill owners and also in the Bombay Government itself that that system was useful there and should be continued. That being so, we said that any Local Government which might wish to continue this certificate system should be allowed to do so, and we have provided accordingly; but we have no intention of prescribing or enforcing a certificate system in every province in India. Bengal, Madras and Mysore also have never gone in for a system of certificates; they have never found the use of it, and we do not want that any province which does not believe, as we do not believe, in the certificate system should be compelled to recognise certificates given by another province. There is nothing to prevent a man who has got a certificate from another province from obtaining employment as a boiler attendant in a province where the system is not in force, but, if the Chief Inspector, having regard to the condition of the boiler, considers that that man is not competent, then he will be able to exercise the powers under sub-section (d) subject to the reservations in the proviso to that sub-section. In provinces where the certificate system is in force, the Local Government can withdraw a certificate, if it so thinks fit. In provinces where the certificate system is not in force, the Local Government will have no power to withdraw a certificate given by another Local Government. In these circumstances, I do not think it is necessary to make the change suggested by my Honourable friend. If a man, who has obtained a certificate, say in Bombay, goes to Madras and obtains employment as a boiler attendant there, then I consider, if the Chief Inspector finds his boiler in a bad condition, the Chief Inspector should be entitled to withdraw that certificate for the boiler, unless the attendant is removed.

I oppose the amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 11, as amended by the Joint Committee, was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move the following amendment :

Sir, under clauses 12 and 13 the owner or person in charge of the boiler is required to do certain things before he can make any alteration, addition or renewal to the steam boilers and to the steam pipes. In clause 12 it is laid down that he should obtain the sanction in writing of the Chief Inspector before he undertakes any structural alteration, addition or renewal in or to a boiler. In clause 13, which deals with steam pipes, it has been laid down that the requirements of this Act will be satisfied if he simply sends an information to the Inspector, of his intention to make such alteration or renewal. What I beg to move is that in either case, whether in the case of steam boiler or in the case of steam pipe it should not be necessary for the man to obtain the sanction of the Chief Inspector before he undertakes a structural alteration, addition or renewal of either the steam pipe or the steam boiler. My reasons for this are that, if the owner or the person in charge of the steam boiler makes any alteration, renewal or addition, then the certificate ceases ipso facto to hold good. And where the certificate ceases to hold good, the person has to apply for a renewal of the certificate and the Chief Inspector has to go, inspect and examine the boiler and, if he finds that it is in a satisfactory condition, then only will the certificate be renewed, otherwise not. Therefore, it is not necessary that the man should obtain the sanction in writing of the Chief Inspector before he undertakes any structural alteration, renewal or addition. This provision 12 seems to be superfluous in view of clause 8 which we have just passed. Therefore, the person in charge of the boiler and the steam pipe should be left at liberty to make any alterations, additions or renewals which he thinks proper or desirable in his interest. The certificate will cease to be in force and he shall have to apply for renewal. If the renewal, after the certificate has ceased to hold good, the Chief Inspector finds that it is not in a proper condition, or is in a dangerous condition, then he can stop the renewal of the certificate. When we have got one provision which is sufficient for all purposes, why should we add this superfluous provision which may lead to delay in factories.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, clauses 12 and 13 should be read with the definition of "structural alteration" in clause 2 (g) of the Bill. A structural alteration for the purpose of these two clauses is really a major alteration, addition or renewal. I am quite prepared to admit that clause 12, as at present drafted, seems somewhat drastic, as compared with clause 13, but it was drafted in this form deliberately and after taking expert opinion all over India, primarily in the interests of the boiler owners themselves. This House has got to remember that these boilers are extremely dangerous vessels, they are extremely intricate vessels also, and, if a person, only after merely giving notice to the Chief Inspector, proceeded with an important structural alteration, addition or renewal to his boiler, then, as Mr. Agnihotri correctly pointed out, his certificate would immediately lapse. That boiler would then require examination by the Chief Inspector, and the owner might then find, either that his boiler would not get a certificate of renewal at all, because the Chief Inspector could not approve of the additions, alterations or renewals that had been made, or he could get a certificate only for working at a much smaller maximum pressure than had hitherto been allowed. It was for that reason that we put this clause in a somewhat drastic form. The Bill has been circulated to all Local Governments and all over India, and I think it is possibly a sufficient answer to the Honourable Member when I say that we have had no objection to this clause from any province or from any commercial body in India.

I oppose the amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 12 was added to the Bill.

Clause 13, as amended by the Joint Committee, was added to the Bill.

Clauses 14, 15, 16 and 17 were added to the Bill.

Clause 18, as amended by the Joint Committee, was added to the Bill.

Clause 19 was added to the Bill.

Clause 20, as amended by the Joint Committee, was added to the Bill.

Clauses 21, 22 and 23 were added to the Bill.

Clause 24, as amended by the Joint Committee, was added to the Bill.

Clause 25 was added to the Bill.

Clause 26, as amended by the Joint Committee, was added to the Bill.

Clauses 27 and 28 were added to the Bill.

Clause 29, as amended by the Joint Committee, was added to the Bill.

Clause 30 was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move :

" That in clause 31 add a proviso to sub-clause (2), namely :

" Provided that no regulations or rules so made shall be published unless the same has been laid in draft, in case of regulations, before the Indian Legislature, and in case of rules, before the provincial legislature and have been approved by a Resolution of the Legislature or the local Council, as the case may be; either with or without modification or addition, but upon such approval being given the regulations or rules, as the case may be, be published in a form in which they have been so approved."

Sir, under clauses 28 and 29 of the Bill the Central Government and the Provincial Governments are empowered to make regulations and rules consistent with this Act. It has become a practice for some years to take away many points from the Acts and to embody them in the rules. The rules are very rarely put up before the Legislatures before publication and the Members do not have any chance of offering suggestions or modifications to those rules or to any rules which may not be proper. I suggest that a provision similar to that in the Cotton Transport Bill—which is to come before us shortly, should also be made under this Bill to the effect that whatever rules and regulations be made under this Bill they should all be put up before the Imperial and Provincial Legislatures and the Members thereof should have a voice in the shaping of those rules before they are published. I beg to move, Sir, that this provision which seems to be a wholesome one should be incorporated under clause 31 in this Bill, so that the Provincial and the Imperial Legislature may have a hand in the framing and publication of the rules.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: Sir, the Honourable Member referred to the Cotton Transport Bill which I hope the House will read to-day. It is perfectly true that we have given certain powers to the Legislature in regard to that Bill. The local Legislature has been given power in that Bill to decide whether the provisions of the Bill should be applied to the province or not. But that is an entirely different matter from rules and regulations under this Bill, and I object to the Honourable Member's proposal that these rules and regulations should be laid in draft before this Legislature and the local Legislature before they are made effective. The reason why I object is this. In the first place, as regards the regulations, I think I may say without disrespect that no useful purpose would be served by laying these regulations before this House. The regulations are most extraordinarily technical. No layman can understand them in the very least. I do not pretend to understand them myself. The Honourable Member will find a draft of the regulations in the Appendix to the Boiler Committee's report.

Now, Sir, is it any use laying rules of a highly technical nature before a popular Assembly of this sort? It is not our job to go into technicalities of that sort. What we propose to do is to publish these rules for general information in order that those who understand the rules and the formula, that is to say, engineers, may object to them if they think fit. I assure the House it will cause great delay and would otherwise be entirely useless if we adopt the Honourable Member's suggestion. And further I should like to point out that the Assembly and the local Councils have other and more important work to do than to deal with the details of rules and regulations of this kind. I think that in matters of this kind the Assembly and the local Councils will do well to trust the Government. We have provided the safeguard that these rules and regulations shall not become effective until they have been previously published.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 31 was added to the Bill.

Clauses 32, 33, 34 and 35 were added to the Bill.

The Schedule was added to the Bill.

The Title was added to the Bill.

The Preamble was added to the Bill.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: I move, Sir, that the Bill, as amended, be passed.

The motion was adopted.

THE INDIAN MINES BILL.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member): I beg to move, Sir:

"That the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill to amend and consolidate the law relating to the regulation and inspection of mines be taken into consideration."

Here again, Sir, the report of the Joint Committee has been in the hands of Honourable Members for several days and as notice has been given of a number of amendments, I think the best plan will be to get at once to those amendments, and therefore I do not propose to delay the House by making a speech on the motion that the Report be taken into consideration. I move, Sir, that the Bill be taken into consideration.

[Mr. C. A. Innes.]

Mr. N. M. Joshi (Nominated: Labour Interests): While supporting this motion, Sir, I would like to make a few remarks on the principle of the Bill as it has emerged from the Joint Committee. The House will remember that when this Bill was last discussed in the Legislative Assembly I laid special emphasis on the necessity of prohibiting the employment of women underground. I am glad, that the Joint Select Committee has made some improvement in the Bill although I am not fully satisfied with what they have done. The Joint Committee has recommended that the power of prohibiting the employment of women under certain conditions should be transferred from the Local Government to the Government of India. So far as it goes, I think it is an improvement. The Joint Committee has also accepted the principle of the prohibition of employment of women underground and they have recommended to the Government of India to take up this question with the Local Governments in order that the total prohibition of women on underground employment should be accomplished within five years' time. So far as this goes I think the Committee has also done a great service to the women workers in mines. But, Sir, I would like to make one or two remarks on this question. In the first place the Joint Select Committee came to the conclusion that if they had recommended the total prohibition of women or even prohibition of women after five years in the Bill it would have been necessary to recirculate the Bill. Sir, I differ from this view taken by the Committee. The Joint Committee knew very well that when the Bill was discussed last time I myself laid great emphasis on the point during the discussion that took place on the appointment of the Joint Committee. Therefore, the Local Governments as well as the mine owners had sufficient notice that this point might be raised in the future discussion on this Bill. If they, the Local Government and the mine owners, did not give sufficient consideration to this point, it was their fault; and therefore I feel that the view taken by the Joint Committee on this question was not the correct one. Then, Sir, in the report of the Joint Committee I think the figure of women workers involved is somewhat exaggerated, or is put there by mistake. The Joint Committee says that the number of women workers involved by the change is 90,000. I think the number of women workers who work underground in Indian mines is about 50,000 and not 90,000

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadian Urban): 90,000 does not relate to those who work underground; it relates to the total number that are at present working in the mines.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: The question with which I am dealing now is the prohibition of the employment of women underground. Therefore I say that the number of women involved is not 90,000 but 50,000. Now, if we consider how plentiful cheap labour in India is, is it a very difficult problem for the mine owners as well as the Government to replace the labour of 50,000 women in India? We are now sending thousands and thousands of people from our country to outside countries because they do not find sufficiently remunerative labour in India.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): How are the women to live?

Mr. N. M. Joshi: How are the women to live? I see; the women ought to live on the wages of the men. Sir, that is a different point altogether. My point was that in India it is not difficult to replace the labour of 50,000 women at all. But, Sir, I do not propose to deal with this question any further. I feel that although the solution arrived at by the Joint Committee is not wholly satisfactory, it is a good working compromise; it is at least a step further and I am quite satisfied with that further step. The next question about which I should have liked the Joint Committee to have taken some further steps was to protect the young boys that will be employed in the mines, boys between the ages of say 13 and 16. In the English law there are provisions to protect such young persons as well as women. Their employment is restricted; they are not, for instance, allowed to be employed in moving waggons. Again in the English law there is provision that young persons who are novices . . .

Mr. President: Order, order. I have allowed the Honourable Member to go into considerable detail because I was not quite sure what his intention was. The intention of a motion of this kind is, I think, obvious—not to provide an opportunity for the discussion of each clause in detail, because that opportunity comes at the next stage, but for the House to decide whether the Bill as returned by the Joint Committee has been returned in such a form as they can conveniently take into consideration, clause by clause. The Honourable Member may reserve his remarks upon each separate point which he has been raising for the clauses as they will come up seriatim, when we have passed this motion.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I never intended to go into all the clauses at all. I simply wanted to refer to the employment of children because these clauses do not at present exist in the Bill. I should have liked the Joint Committee to have introduced these clauses and safeguards for the protection of young persons. Then, Sir, lastly I would only touch upon one point, namely, this Bill as it has emerged from the Joint Committee does not make sufficient provision for safety against accidents and the Bill leaves everything to the rules instead of taking some important points as regards safety in the Bill itself. This is a great drawback in my opinion in the Bill; and although I have not attempted to send in amendments on this point, because the task of sending amendments on such a point is indeed a very great one, still I feel it is my duty to point out that Government, when they make rules on this point, should provide sufficient protection against accidents. With these remarks, Sir, I support the motion.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill to amend and consolidate the law relating to the regulation and inspection of mines be taken into consideration."

The motion was adopted.

Clauses 1 and 2 were added to the Bill.

Mr. B. N. Mishra (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, my amendment* relates to sub-clause (c) of clause 3. In this sub-clause 'child' is defined to be a person under the age of thirteen years. It appears to me, Sir, as if this Honourable House is going to prepare a dictionary or to give meanings to words which are ordinarily understood in another way.

* "That in clause 3, sub-clause (c) for the words 'under the age of thirteen years' the words 'between twelve to fifteen years of age' be substituted.

[Mr. B. N. Misra.]

Generally, a child in India means a person below the age of 16; that is, up to the age of 15 we generally take them to be children; in law we have minor and major; and a child or minor would mean any person up to the age of 18; above that age he will be a major. In England a child or infant would mean any person up to the age of 22 and after that age . . .

Mr. President: Order, order. The Honourable Member has apparently neglected to provide any description for a person up to the age of 12 years. I cannot allow an amendment to be moved which makes nonsense.

Mr. B. N. Misra: I am sorry, Sir, but this has reference to section 26, and so I have put in this amendment to this section. The law provides that no child shall be employed in a mine or be allowed to be present in any part of a mine which is below ground . . .

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: What about the child under twelve?

Mr. President: The Honourable Member is attempting to make nonsense of the clause. I do not propose to allow him to do it.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: May I, Sir, point out that unfortunately I do not take the view which you have taken of the definition of a 'Child'. Take for instance the Factory Act, in which I think the child is defined as between the ages of 12 and 15 years. My impression is that in that Act when the prohibition is laid against the employment of children below 12, the section simply says that persons who are below 12 are prohibited and the word 'child' is applied to persons between certain ages. That is my view.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I may point out that in the Factory Act the word 'child' is defined as one who is under the age of 15 years.

Mr. President: If the Honourable Member cannot draft his amendment so as to express what he means, he cannot expect to move it.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I beg to move:

"That in sub-clause (e) of clause 3 omit all words after 'under this Act'."

Sub-clause (e) of clause 3 defines an "Inspector", and it says "Inspector" means an Inspector of Mines appointed under this Act and includes a District Magistrate when exercising any power or performing any duty of an Inspector which he is empowered by this Act to exercise or perform". Sir, I beg to submit that this provision of including a District Magistrate as an Inspector is not desirable, in this way, that the District Magistrate is the head of the executive and judicial functions in the district. Under this Bill the duty has also been laid on him as an Inspector, to institute prosecutions. Therefore, the District Magistrate shall have to institute prosecutions in the courts subordinate to himself and that may not be desirable in the interests of justice and the owners. I therefore submit, Sir, that "District Magistrate" may be excluded from the term "Inspector" and other Inspectors may be provided instead of "District Magistrate". The District Magistrate being the head of the district can have the powers of supervision and will be the head of the Department in the district but he should not be made to perform all the functions of the Inspector. The Inspector is also required to be an expert in mining matters and must also possess some practical experience in mining. The District Magistrate has already got much to do in the district, and has his hands always full, and so he cannot be expected to be such an expert as to properly look after the mines as well as to the interests of the public and workers in the way in which an expert Inspector is expected to do. Therefore, Sir, I submit that the District Magistrate should be excluded from the definition of the term "Inspector". It might perhaps be argued, Sir, that there are many districts in which there are very small mines and the employment of Inspectors is not possible and may not be desirable on the ground of cost and so the District Magistrate is required to work as an Inspector under this Bill. My submission in that case would be that if there are such mines in a district and the appointment of separate inspectors for such districts is found too costly, then one Inspector may be put in charge of mines in those districts also instead of District Magistrates being made to perform the duties of Inspectors in their districts. Therefore, I move, Sir, that the word "District Magistrate" should be excluded from the term "Inspector" under this Act.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: Sir, in this sub-clause we have merely followed the existing Act. The existing Act gives the District Magistrate such powers as an Inspector may have and as may be vested in him by the Local Government. This sub-clause read with clause 4 (8) says that the District Magistrate is expressly debarred from exercising such powers conferred by section 19 or section 32, but otherwise he performs the duties of the Inspector subject to the general or special orders of the Local Government. As the Honourable Member indicated in the last part of his speech, it is necessary because of the very large size of India and the large number of mines that are in India with a very small inspecting staff. We have 1,700 mines under the Mines Act situated in different parts of India. We have only 4 Inspectors, and it is quite impossible for those 4 Inspectors to exercise their powers as an Inspector all the year round over all these mines. Now this Mines Act is intended very largely for the safety of workers down the mines, and if we cannot provide technical Inspectors for the supervision and control which is necessary in various parts of India, it is absolutely necessary that we should have the District Magistrate, who is the head of the District, to exercise those powers. It is specially necessary in provinces like Madras where there are not very many mines, and where the most convenient course is to let the District Magistrate exercise the powers of an Inspector. The only objection taken to the practice is that the District Magistrate may in the course of his inspecting duties have occasion to order prosecutions. The fear has been expressed that the subordinate magistracy of the district will always convict if the District Magistrate has ordered a prosecution. Well, Sir, we have safeguarded that, because you will find later on in the Bill that no case under this Act may be tried except by a first class Magistrate. I have been a first class sub-divisional Magistrate myself, and I cannot imagine any Magistrate of the first class allowing his judgment on any case which comes before him to be swayed in any way at all by the fact that formal sanction of the prosecution has been given by the District Magistrate. The present practice is convenient, it is the existing practice, and I submit, Sir, that no reason has been shown why it should be changed.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. B. N. Misra: Sir, I move:

"That in clause 3, sub-clause (k), for the words 'the enforced absence of the injured person from', the words 'inability to attend to' be substituted."

[Mr. B. N. Misra.]

Because "serious bodily injury" is defined as injury which involves or in all probability will involve the permanent loss of the use of, or permanent injury to, any limb or the permanent loss of or injury to the sight or hearing, or the fracture of any limb or the enforced absence of the injured person from work for a period exceeding 20 days. I submit, Sir, in this the term "enforced absence" is not quite clear, because who will enforce? Will really the mine owners enforce the labour to absent from work? Certainly they are not going to do that. Their interest is to bring the injured person to work and to show that he has not received any serious bodily injury. I think it is rather meaningless, because in the Indian Penal Code we have got the term "grievous hurt" defined as "inability to attend to work for 20 days, etc." The words "the enforced absence of the injured person from" is rather meaningless, and if we substitute the words "inability to attend to" it would be quite all right. It would mean the inability of the person to attend to his work. So I move this amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I also beg to move an amendment to 1 P.M. sub-clause (k) of clause 3. My amendment is to the effect:

"That between the words 'from' and 'work' the word 'his' be inserted."

Sir, as the definition in sub-clause (k) stands there seems to me some ambiguity in the interpretation of "serious bodily injury." It is just possible that my interpretation may not be the proper one. It may be due to the lack of a proper knowledge of English on my part that I may not be able to properly interpret the clause or to suggest a proper amendment. But I find that similar difficulties have arisen in the courts of law in interpreting sections 325 and 326 of the Indian Penal Code and from the little experience that I have, I have ventured to put in my amendment. As the sub-clause stands, it may mean that, if a person who has suffered the bodily injury were to be able to work in a different department of the mine or in a different place or if he were able to do the work of a different nature, then that injury may not fall within the purview of this definition. And my object by this amendment is to restrict its meaning in the way that only such injury be regarded as serious bodily injury if a man were to suffer an injury of a nature that he could not attend to the work for which he was employed, that injury shall be deemed to have been a serious bodily injury. For instance, he may be working in a mine for raising loads and a load may have fallen on his leg so that he could not do the loading work himself, but at the same time he could be employed by his master in watching the persons going into the mines, or as a watchman. May I know if such an injury is the injury referred to in such a definition or is it not? As the clause stands, probably it will not be included in this definition and the man shall not be said to have suffered a serious bodily injury. But, if we were to so amend this clause that, where a man suffers from any injury the nature of which is such as to disable him to do that work which he ordinarily did before he received such injury, that injury should be deemed to be a serious bodily injury. I do not know whether or not the amendment which I propose will solve my difficulty but I simply put before the House the object of my amendment. If the Legislative Department or the draftsman in the Government of India think that my object will be served by the insertion of the word "his" so much the better. If not, I would request them to suggest a wording which will make the meaning clear and be in conformity with the object.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I do not pretend to be a lawyer nor yet a draftsman and I must confess that my Honourable friend's speech left me in some doubt as to what his difficulty was. All I have got to say is this; this definition of "serious bodily injury" was taken from the rules existing already in Bengal and Bihar and Orissa, and that is the reason why we adopted it. Secondly, I should like to point out that the exact wording of the definition is not a matter of any great importance. We are not discussing the Workmen's Compensation Bill; we are discussing the Mines Bill. The object of this clause is to explain the clauses later on in the Bill, clause 20 for instance, which required notice to be given of accidents, causing serious bodily injury, and clause 40, which prescribes a slightly higher penalty in cases which serious bodily injury results from the contravention of the inspection rules. I submit that the matter is of no importance at all and I hardly think it worth while making the amendment suggested by the Honourable Member.

The motion was negatived.

Clauses 3, 4 and 5 were added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, here I am in the same difficulty as I was in while considering the definition of "serious bodily injury."

My amendment is:

"In clause 6, sub-clauses (a) and (b), substitute the words 'may be necessary' for the words 'he thinks fit'."

Clause 6 empowers the Inspectors to make such examination and inquiry as they think fit in order to ascertain whether the provisions of this Act and of the regulations, rules, etc., have properly been complied with. The words used show that the discretion lies with the Inspector. The Inspector may think fit even an absurd inquiry, an absurd examination even though it may or may not have any connection with the provisions of this Act. That is to say that the words "he thinks fit" depend on his personal opinion rather than depend on the object of the inquiry which he may have in view. So, if we were to substitute the words "as may be necessary" this clause would be governed by and will be dependent on the object of the inquiry. The Inspector will not have any personal discretion at all. The Inspector shall have to judge about the necessity of the inspection from the object which he has in view and that could also be found out by superior officers whether a particular inquiry of a particular nature was essential under the particular circumstances or not. If there is any objection made to the examination of the inquiry by an Inspector, the Inspector can say "well, it may or may not be necessary for that object but I think it fit to examine and make such inquiries and therefore I do so and am not liable for my acts under this Bill." Therefore, I think but I am not quite sure "as may be necessary" will be a better and more desirable wording than "as he thinks fit", and I beg to move that the substitution be made.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 6 was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, under clause 7 powers are given to the Inspectors to enter the mine for the purpose of surveying, etc., at any reasonable time by day or night. The amendment, which I beg to move is:

"To substitute the words 'during the working hours of the' for the word 'by' before the word 'day'."

That part of the clause will then read as follows:

"any part thereof at any reasonable time during the working hours of the day or night."

Sir, it may be said on behalf of Government that the words "reasonable time" will cover my amendment, but it is also likely that it may be interpreted in a different way. It may be said that "reasonable time" may mean during early portion of the night and in that case it may create some inconvenience and hardship to the owners and managers. So it will be better if you make it clear and lay down that the Inspector and the Chief Inspector will have authority to inspect and enter the mine or do all things mentioned in the clause only when the mine is working, that is, during the working hours and not when the work has been stopped. Therefore I submit that the words "during the working hours of the day or night" may be included in clause 7 so that the Inspector may have no right to go and enter the mine, take level or survey it at any time other than the working hours of the day and night.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"Substitute the words 'during the working hours of the' for the word 'by' before the word 'day'."

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I think that if there be anything in Mr. Agnihotri's amendment, he may be sure that mine owners throughout India would have taken the point. None of them have done so. No one has suggested it. The real reason is that in most mines, especially coal mines, work proceeds by day and night. There are no special working hours. The work always goes on.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhamadan Rural): There are the words "after giving not less than three days' notice to the manager of the mine" in the clause. This clause therefore provides that three days' previous notice should be given, and if the mine owners have any objection, they can take the objection within those three days. So I do not think there is force in the Honourable Member's contention.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 7 was added to the Bill.

Clause 8 was added to the Bill.

Clause 9 was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move that:

"In clause 10, in sub-clause (b), omit 'the Chief Inspector or an Inspector' and add 'any qualified and experienced mining engineer not being in the service of the Government and not being a Chief Inspector or an Inspector'."

Clause 10 provides for the constitution of the Mining Boards and it has been provided in the clause as it stands, that the Chief Inspector or the Inspector could also be a member of the Mining Board. My amendment is to delete this provision and to exclude the Chief Inspector or the Inspector from the Membership of the Mining Board. I have said before that the Chief Inspector or Inspector is practically the chief mining authority with whom the mine owners shall have to deal. He is the executive authority whose complaints and references may be put before the Board and who has to launch prosecutions against mine owners for the breach of the rules of contravention of the regulations. Therefore it is undesirable that such a person should be on the Mining Board formed or constituted by the Government. It is better that instead of a Government official in the form of a Chief Inspector or an Inspector, some other person, an expert in mining matters be nominated in his place. Therefore, I suggest that instead of the Chief Inspector or Inspector a non-official Mining Engineer who has an expert knowledge of the working of the mines be nominated as a Member of the Mining Board. With these words, Sir, I move my amendment.

Mr. President: Amendment moved :

" In clause 10, sub-clause (b), omit the words ' the Chief Inspector or an Inspector ' and insert the words ' any qualified and experienced mining engineer not being in the service of the Government and not being a Chief Inspector or an Inspector '."

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I think the Honourable Member has not fully apprehended what the functions of these Mining Boards are. The main functions of the Mining Boards are to scrutinise draft rules, regulations and bye-laws. These draft rules and regulations—regulations especially—will be drawn up in the first instance by the Chief Inspector of Mines. We also propose to lay down that they should be referred to the Mining Board before we published them for general criticism. The Board is practically an advisory body to the Chief Inspector of Mines or to the Inspector and to the Local Government, and I think the House will see that it is absolutely essential that the Chief Inspector of Mines should be a Member of that Board. He must be there to explain his draft rules, to answer criticisms and generally to discuss the rules. There is no need for the Honourable Member to think that the Chief Inspector of Mines is always up against the mineowners and the mine managers. From personal experience I can tell him that it is not so. Both the mine managers and the Chief Inspector and the Inspectors have one main object in view. They are anxious to get the regulations and the rules drafted in such a way that they provide in every possible way for the safety of the workers, and I think the House will agree with me that when you are discussing rules and regulations of this kind, it is very much better that they should be discussed by the Mining Board with the Chief Inspector there as a Member of the Board and able to answer criticisms and discuss the rules. It will be seen that he is only one out of a Board of six. I hope, Sir, that the House will not accept this amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Sir, I beg to move the following amendment :

" In clause 10, sub-clause (1) (c), omit the words ' of whom one shall be a person qualified ' and substitute in their place the words ' in consultation with the organisations of employees if such exist '."

There are two questions involved in my amendment in the first place, the original Bill proposed that there should be two persons nominated by Government out of whom one shall be qualified to represent the interests of the employees. The amendment which I propose is that the two persons to be nominated should be both appointed to represent the interests of the employees. My reason is this. Under this clause, the employers are given two representatives on the Mining Board, and if the employers are to have two representatives on the Mining Board, it is but fair that the employees should also have an equal number. Sir, I believe that the stake which the employees have in the industry is as much as the employers have, if not more, than the stake of the employers. This is true particularly of the mining industry. The House knows very well that the mining industry is a very dangerous industry. Every year this industry takes a toll of about 200 lives of the working classes. This is a great stake which the working classes have in this industry. If the mines are not properly worked, the mine owners suffer only loss in money. But if there is an accident and the regulations are not properly observed, the workers have to pay with their life. I therefore feel that the stake which the employees have in the proper working of the mines is as much as if not more than, the stake which the employers have. Therefore, instead of having only one representative on the Board they should have two, representatives as the employers also have.

The second point involved in my amendment is that the persons to be nominated by Government on behalf of the employees should be nominated in consultation with the organisations of the employees where they exist, or if such exist. Sir, in the case of employers this clause provides that the representatives of the employers should be appointed by the employers themselves. If there had been well organised organisations of the employees, naturally this power of appointment would have gone to them also. Unfortunately, there is no central well organised association of the employees. Therefore I admit the desirability of Government nominating the representatives of the employees on the Mining Board. But I want to provide that when such well organised associations of the employees do come into existence, they will automatically be given the power of appointing representatives of the employees on the Mining Board. Sir, we all know that these Acts are not modified very often. As a matter of fact, this revision of the Mining Act has come after about 22 years. I am quite sure the next revision may come after 22 years or 25 years. (The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: "No, no.") Within that period workers' organisations are bound to come into existence and grow very strong. I therefore think that we should provide in our Bill that as soon as workers' organisations come into existence they should have a voice in any nomination of their representatives on the Mining Board. I hope therefore that my amendment will find favour with the House.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Mr. Joshi has told the House that mining is a very dangerous industry. I agree. It is also an industry which requires a very great deal of technical expert knowledge. Mr. Joshi has also told the House that it is unfair that the workers should have only one representative on the Mining Board while the employers should have two. The difference between Mr. Joshi and myself in this matter is that Mr. Joshi is concerned with the rights of workers and I am concerned with their safety. As I have said, this Mining Board exists for scrutinising the regulations for the safety of the miners. If Honourable Members will turn to the rule-making power, they will find the sort of things which the Mining Board has got to deal with rules for providing for the ventilation of mines and the action to be taken in respect of dust and noxious gasses; for providing for the care, and the regulation of the use, of all machinery and plant and of all electrical apparatus used for signalling purposes; for requiring and regulating the use of safety lamps in mines; for providing against dangers arising out of the accumulation of water in mines; for prescribing the qualifications of managers of mines and of persons acting under them. We have got to look at where the labourers come from. The labourers are for the most part aborigines, Santhals, aborigines from the Santhal Parganas. On the Mining Board the people we want are mainly people who have sufficient expert knowledge to understand these rules and these regulations. That is why we have the Chief Inspector of Mines on it. That is why we provide two persons nominated by mine owners. Whom do the owners nominate? Their mine managers, all qualified certificated mining engineers, and I am quite sure that it would not help the workers if, on a consideration of what Mr. Joshi thinks their rights, we in any way weakened the technical power and technical knowledge on the Board. There are certain matters which come before the Board, matters connected with health, sanitation and so on in which the workers' representative may give some useful advice, and we endeavour to meet Mr. Joshi by providing that there should be one representative of the workers on the Board and I think that the House will recognise that it is a sufficient advance for the present.

Then, Sir, Mr. Joshi suggests that these representatives should be nominated by the Local Government in consultation with organisations of employees if such exist. Well, Sir, I am not a draftsman, and as I have said before, I am not a lawyer. It seems to me that in a law of this kind it is bad to put in a hypothetical clause of this kind. What we have to consider is there are no organisations of employees at present, there are no unions of any sort or kind. If they come into existence and if, as Mr. Joshi says, they become very powerful, I have no doubt they will compel us to give them a share in electing their representatives on this Board. It will not merely be a matter of nominating in consultation with the organisations, the organisations will claim and will get the right of electing their representatives themselves, and I suggest that, instead of putting in a clause of this kind which does not mean very much,—you do not impose any obligation on the Local Government at all except the obligation of consulting these organisations if they exist—the Local Government is not bound in any way to accept their advice,—I suggest that it would be wiser to wait until organisations come into existence and until we can provide for them in a proper way.

I have another objection. As I have said, Mr. Joshi is concerned here more with the rights of workers. He wants us to put in a clause in the Bill which will compel the Local Government to recognise organisations of workers of whatever kind. Now, I say, Sir, that by making this suggestion to the House Mr. Joshi has brought into it a matter which requires separate consideration, that is, the whole question of the registration of trade unions. That question, as the House probably remembers, is now under consideration and one of the most difficult questions connected with it is whether we should make registration compulsory or whether we should make it voluntary. If we make it voluntary, one of the incentives to registration will be this recognition, this consultation by the Local Government. Mr. Joshi prejudices the decision on that point. If we accept this, the Local Government will be compelled to consult a labour organisation or labour union whether that union has registered or not. On both grounds, on the ground of the interest and safety of the workers themselves and on the other ground which I have just given, namely, that Mr. Joshi is asking us to take a premature decision on what is really an important point of principle, I hope that the House will reject this amendment.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I have also given notice of a similar amendment and I think my amendment may be taken as an amendment to Mr. Joshi's amendment. Therefore, Sir, with your permission, I move my amendment as an amendment to Mr. Joshi's amendment. My amendment is:

"In sub-clause 10 (1) (c) after the words 'in mines' add the following:

'Provided that such nomination shall be based on the recommendation of organisations of employees where they exist';"

and with your permission, Sir, I add the words:

"and are recognised by the Government."

The Honourable Mr. Innes has put forward two grounds for opposing Mr. Joshi's amendment, one that Mr. Joshi's amendment puts in hypothetical words, and secondly, that there is a separate matter involving consideration about trade unions and their recognition. If my amendment be accepted, both these points would go away, because I do not provide a hypothetical word "if" but instead the words "where they are already in existence," and at the same time, to meet the Honourable Mr. Innes half-way I have added "and where they are recognised by the Government," say, after a consideration of the point whether trade unions . . .

Mr. President: I do not understand how the Honourable Member proposes to make his amendment, an amendment to Mr. Joshi's amendment.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: For Mr. Joshi's amendment, Sir, my amendment be adopted.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member is aware that his amendment comes at the end of the clause and Mr. Joshi's amendment in the middle. We must dispose of Mr. Joshi's amendment before we come to his.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, as I have said, I made those two points to the Honourable Mr. Innes. I think it would be desirable in the interests of the labour organisations to provide that they be authorised to recommend their nominees, and on that recommendation the Government would nominate such persons on the Board. If there be no labour organisations at present, my amendment would not come in the way of Government nominating any person, but will apply only where the organisations exist and are recognised by the Government and this will be a wholesome provision. The present Bill may not be taken up for revision, say for 20 or 25 years. Therefore I submit, that such a provision should be added to this sub-clause. With these words I commend my amendment to the House, namely:

"In sub-clause (c) after the words 'in mines' add 'provided that such nomination shall be based on the recommendation of organisations of employees where they exist';"

The motion was negatived.

Clause 10 was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"In clause 11, for sub-clause (a) substitute:

'(a) Two Judges of the High Court of the Province the senior of whom shall be the Chairman of the Committee.'

Sir, clause 11 provides for the constitution of the reference committees. In the English law on which this law is based, it is provided that two of the members of the reference committee should be Judges, similar to what I have provided in my amendment. I shall read to the House section 117 of the Coal Mines Act, 1911, which refers to the appointment of the reference committee. Clause (3) of section 117 lays down:

"The Reference Committee shall consist of the Lord Chief Justice of England, the Lord President of the Court of Session, and such person especially qualified by eminence in mining knowledge as the Lord Chief Justice and Lord President may select."

Sir, it is on the basis of this Coal Mines Act of 1911 that the clauses concerning the Reference Committee have been inserted in this Bill, and therefore it is desirable that, instead of any person being appointed by the Local Government as the Chairman of such Committee, we should have two Judges of the High Court on the Committee, and the senior Judge of the High Court should preside over the Reference Committee. These Reference Committees will have power under the Bill to settle disputes between the Government and the mine-owners. Therefore it is necessary that a Judge be appointed as the Chairman of such a Committee and another Judge be a member. As the Government happens to be one of the parties through the Chief Inspector, while the mine-owner becomes the other party, the person appointed by the Government will be no better than a person in Government service and so it will be better that an independent person be appointed as Chairman of the Committee. Therefore I suggest to the House that my amendment be accepted, and instead of a chairman being nominated by the Local Government or by such officer or authority as the Local Government may authorise in this behalf, a Judge be a chairman and the clause be made to read: "Two Judges of the High Court of the Province, the senior of whom shall be the chairman of the Committee."

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: Sir, the Honourable Member has evidently again failed to understand what the functions of this Committee are. He talked of disputes between the workers and mine-owners and he talked of the Local Government being a party to those disputes. Therefore he suggested it was wrong that the Chairman should be nominated by the Local Government. This Committee exists merely for the purpose of appeals against orders under section 19 of the Act. Section 19 gives the Inspector very drastic emergency powers. If he finds any practice which is not otherwise provided for by rules under the Act to be extremely dangerous, he can require that that practice be remedied, and where the practice is very dangerous, he can even order the removal of the workers from the mine. If the power is abused by the Inspector, an appeal is allowed to the Chief Inspector, and then an appeal is allowed to a Committee. Ordinarily I do not believe these Committees have often sat. Very rarely they will come into existence, but when they do, what are the sort of things they will have to inquire into? Probably it will be the sort of case where the Chief Inspector thinks that the robbing of pillars has gone to such an extent that a certain part of the mine or the whole mine has become so dangerous that the mine ought to be closed. The Committee may have to go to the mine and inspect it and decide the matter on the spot. It is a very technical work and not the sort of work which is suitable for two Honourable Judges of the High Court. I do not think they should be taken away from their Benches and taken down to the mines to report on matters of this kind. The provisions providing for the constitution of this Committee are precisely what they have always been. I think we have made one small change to provide for a representative of the employees, but substantially we have not altered the constitution of the existing Act which has worked very well, and I see no reason why we should change it now.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I wish to move the following amendment :

"That in sub-clause (c) of clause 11 (1) after the word 'nominated' the words 'in consultation with the organisations of employees if such exist' be substituted."

Sir, undeterred by the fate of my last amendment, I propose to move this amendment again in the hope that it will meet with a better fate. Sir, the objections taken to this amendment are likely to be the same which were urged against my previous amendment. It was said in opposition to my first amendment that the workers will not be able to select their representative, or select a proper representative for the Mining Board. It is said that the workers are Santhals and some such people and they have not got sufficient sense to elect a man who knows anything about mining. It is also said that if the workers are given the choice of electing, they will elect somebody that has only some theoretical knowledge of mining operations. Sir, I believe if workers are given the right of nominating their representative there are greater chances of their appointing a man who has got practical experience of mining operations than if the Government undertakes to do that work. Secondly, the question was raised that my amendments involve the question of the recognition of trade unions. I do not know whether this question is at all open to Government. Government does recognise trade unions, if not of the working classes, at least trade unions of the employers. After having recognised trade unions of the employers, are they going to say that they are not going to recognise the trade unions of the employees? I doubt if any Government at all will take up that attitude.

Now, Sir, this amendment also is much simpler than my previous amendment. In my previous amendment I had mentioned organizations. In this amendment there is no mention of organizations at all, so there need not be any organization of employees and there need be no fear of the recognition of the organization of trade unions. Before I request the House to accept my amendment, I want them to consider why these Committees will be appointed. They will be appointed when there is some trouble, some disaster, some accident, in a mine.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: No, that is a court of inquiry.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Yes, only about matters concerning one mine. The Committees are not going to consider the large questions of mining operations. These Committees will consider questions as regards only one particular mine. If my impression is wrong, I am open to correction. Now, when a matter concerning the safety of the employees of a mine is to be discussed, the representative to be appointed on behalf of the employees should be appointed in consultation with these employees, and, as the number of the employees would not be a very large one, it will not be difficult to consult their wishes. Sir, our Factory Act, in one of its sections at least, provides that the workers in a factory should jointly make a certain request and, when they make a certain request, that request should be considered. If the employees of a factory can jointly make certain requests and ask for certain changes in the rules, then certainly the employees of a mine ought to be entitled to do the same without difficulty. I therefore feel that whatever may have been the fate of my previous amendment, this amendment is free from even the objections which were raised to my previous amendment.

I therefore hope that this amendment will be accepted.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I am not going to follow the Honourable Member into any discussion re-opening the question of organizations. In this particular amendment all that Mr. Joshi asks is that, before a member is appointed to a Committee to represent the employees, those employees should be consulted. What does that mean? I presume it means that, before a Local Government can make a nomination, it has in some way to call together a mass meeting of the miners down a mine and try to ascertain whether they know of any person who will be competent to give an opinion upon the point at issue. That point is nearly always a technical mining point, a point as to whether it is safe to work down a particular part of a mine owing to the pillars being inadequately strong, or whether the fire area of a mine has got so much out of control that the whole of that mine should be closed down. I cannot see that it will be the least use to call together this mass meeting of employees and ask their opinion on a question like this. It will merely cause delay. And one has got to remember that it is a very urgent matter for the owner of that mine that he should get a decision on his appeal against the Chief Inspector's order. His mine during the whole of this time may have been closed down and the workers may have been removed. If this House will agree that no material advantage is to be gained by the procedure indicated by Mr. Joshi, I think we ought not to incur the further delay which will result from consulting the employees. Moreover, this particular amendment was brought up by Mr. Joshi in Select Committee. I mentioned it to a mine owner and he said "That would suit me very well, because I could get my men to nominate exactly the person I wanted."

I think, Sir, on every ground we should object to this amendment.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I am sorry to interpose, but there is a great deal in favour of the amendment moved by Mr. Joshi. It is admitted that these are merely Committees constituted for a particular dispute relating to a particular mine, so that it would be the employees of that mine whose interests would be involved. It is admitted in the Bill as it stands that the interests of the persons employed in a mine have to be protected, and it is supposed that this Local Government is so omniscient that they can find a person to represent their interests better than the persons themselves. How is a Local Government, situated hundreds of miles away, to know these interests. We know what it means. An Assistant Secretary or an Under Secretary will put up recommendations and the whole thing is done. The Local Government is supposed to know the interests of these employees better than the employees themselves. No doubt, Sir, where there is no will, you can exaggerate difficulties in the way. In a vast country like this people's opinions are gathered and, when they want to rely on people's opinions, they will say "the masses think otherwise, it is the educated minority who agitate for a thing which the masses do not want." I do not know how the Government know the opinion of the masses. But, here, if you were to consult the people themselves, I do not think it would be very difficult. The Chief Inspector or the Chairman of the Committee, by rules which you may prescribe, may hold a meeting of the employees and make a nomination. I do not think the difficulties are so great that you cannot find out the wishes of the employees as to who their representative should be.

I heartily support the amendment.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee (Education Member): With every sympathy for the object aimed at by Mr. Joshi and Mr. Rangachariar, I feel bound to oppose this amendment. I think my Honourable friend Mr. Rangachariar has not estimated the difficulties that will arise if the amendment is accepted and if we now legislate that, before a representative of the employees is appointed to a Committee, a mass meeting of the employees should be held. I do not know if either Mr. Rangachariar or Mr. Joshi is acquainted with the mine fields. I have some acquaintance with them, Sir, and I do not think it is realised that the mining population is shifting from day to day. How are you to find out who are the actual employees in a mine on a particular day or who are particularly interested in any matter which is referred to a Committee? Similarly, if there are two factions in the mine, it would often be extremely difficult for the Government to choose between the nominees of these two factions. The Honourable Mr. Innes has already referred to the very serious danger that will arise if the mine-owner gets round a large body of his employees and persuades them to accept a man who would really side with him. I see very serious dangers in accepting this amendment until the trade unions system is properly organised in the mines. I do not think, Sir, that an amendment to this Bill of the nature that Mr. Joshi suggests will be very difficult when the trade unions system is properly organised in the mine fields. Let us wait till then. Let us not prejudice the question and get into serious difficulties. Sir, I am as much in sympathy with labour interests as perhaps Mr. Joshi is, and I strongly oppose this amendment.

Mr. B. C. Allen (Assam: Nominated Official): Sir, I must protest against the description given by Mr. Rangachariar of the methods followed in appointing representatives of labour. I have some personal experience of the matter myself. There is in the Assam Council a representative of the garden coolies. I need hardly say that it is quite impossible to find any garden cooly who is capable of representing in the Council the interests of his fellow-workers. But when the duty was laid upon Government of selecting a gentleman to appear on behalf of garden coolies, all those who had any experience or who were in a position to give reasonable advice were consulted. The matter was investigated most carefully. There was no question whatever of merely asking an Under Secretary to submit a name. Divisional Commissioners and District Officers were asked for advice and ultimately a gentleman was selected whom everybody, I believe who has any cognizance of the facts would admit to be the most qualified representative of the labourers on whose behalf he was appointed to appear.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Sir, I support my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi's amendment. He says "in consultation." He does not say that the representative should be elected by the employees. We remember that in the Legislative Councils formerly public bodies used to nominate representatives and the Government accepted them. So pending the formation of the Union of employees, I do not see any harm in the Local Government consulting the employees and accepting their recommendation. That is why I ask the House to accept this amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): Sir, it has been proposed that an amendment should be made in the Bill. I do not intend to deal with the substance of the amendment. But from the drafting point of view I should like the House to consider what the proposed words will mean when they are in the Bill. Mr. Joshi will have the Member of the Committee nominated by the Local Government in consultation—that is to say, there is to be a consultation between the Local Government and the workers in the mines. How that consultation is going to be brought about, I for one entirely fail to understand, and I have not yet heard from Mr. Joshi or Mr. Rangachariar how the consultation is going to take place. Mr. Rangachariar suggested that the Chairman might be asked to intervene. That would not be a consultation between the Local Government and the coolies in the mines, because the Chairman is in no sense a representative of the Local Government. I think, Sir, purely from the drafting point of view, if this amendment were carried, it would be a blot on the Statute Book.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Sir, I have no right of reply but if you will permit me, I shall only make one remark with regard to the point raised by Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith.

If Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith finds any drafting difficulty in this clause, I would only draw his attention to the draft which he himself perhaps has made in the Factory Act, and it is this:

"At the request of the employees concerned periods of rest of not less than half an hour each, so arranged that for each period of six hours work done there should be periods of rest of not less than one hour . . . and that no person shall work for more than five hours continuously."

Here the words used are "at the request of the employees." There is nothing said there about who is to make the request or who is to decide.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: That is quite different from consultation.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: The employees in a factory may be in thousands. Take the case of Tata's Steel Works. They have got 30,000 employees. But nothing is mentioned in this section of the Factory Act as to how the request is to be ascertained, who is going to decide whether the request should be made or not or anything of the kind.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally (Sind: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I wish to add a few words to the remarks which have fallen from Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith. If one mistake has been made in the Factory Act . . .

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: No.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: I do not think another should be perpetrated in this Act. In my opinion, any system of consultation would be so unworkable that it would be impossible to come to any decision in the matter at all if the miners or the employees were to be consulted. Supposing, Sir, the miners were consulted by a District Officer and some voted in favour of one gentleman or gave their vote to one gentleman and the others gave it in favour of another gentleman. How is the vote to be taken, and how is it to be decided? If the body of employees are to be consulted, this means an elaborate procedure of voting, which must be gone into, and I think if the House is minded to have this 'consultation' brought in, a much more detailed system of voting ought to be put in to the Act so as to make the thing workable. Otherwise as the amendment stands, it will be entirely unworkable.

Mr. President: Clause 11. Amendment moved:

"In sub-clause (c) of sub-section (1), after the word 'nominated' the words 'in consultation with the employees' be inserted."

The question is that that amendment be made.

MESSAGE FROM THE COUNCIL OF STATE.

Mr. Chairman: I understand that a Message has been received from the Council of State.

Secretary of the Assembly: The Message runs as follows:

"From the Secretary of the Council of State, to the Secretary, Legislative Assembly:

I have the honour to inform you that the Council of State at its meeting of the 29th January has agreed without amendment to the Bill further to amend the Criminal Tribes Act, 1911."

THE INDIAN MINES BILL.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that clause 11, as amended by the Joint Select Committee, do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that clauses 12 and 13 do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that clauses 14 and 15 do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, in clause 16 I move to substitute the word 'or' for 'and' between the words 'agent' and 'manager' in sub-clause (1). Sir, this clause has more or less been taken out from the English Coal Mines Act, 1911, section 102. There the word 'or' is used between the words 'agent' and 'manager'; and I do not know why that has been changed to 'and' in this clause of this Bill. I think that if the word 'and' be allowed to stand in sub-clause (1) between the words 'agent' and 'manager' it is just likely that it may be taken to mean that the owner and agent and manager, i.e., all these three persons, will be liable for penalty under clause 16. I think that will not be proper and desirable and therefore it is better to put the word 'or', and to make the owner, or agent, or manager, whoever is found to have committed any of the breaches of the rules or regulations under this Act, him only to be held liable. Therefore, Sir, I propose that instead of the word 'and' the word 'or' be substituted between the words 'agent' and 'manager' in sub-clause (1) of clause 16.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: Sir, I must challenge the accuracy of what the Honourable Member has just said. He said that the English Act used the word 'or' between the words 'agent' and 'manager' instead of the word 'and'. I will now read section 101(2) of the English Coal Mines Act, 1911: "If a mine is not managed in conformity with this Act, the owner and agent and manager thereof shall be deemed to have been guilty of an offence under this Act." So the House will see that the Honourable Member is entirely incorrect in his main argument for his amendment. I should just like to explain that the first two clauses of this section are part of the existing Act. The whole matter was very carefully discussed in the Joint Committee, and the Joint Committee by a majority decided to follow the English Act by adding the proviso which is shown in italics. I may say that I was one of the minority, but at the same time the matter was very carefully discussed and we are quite prepared to accept the decision of the Committee. By that proviso we have brought this section into accord with the English Act except in regard to certain additions which the Honourable Member proposes to make later and which are the subject of his later amendments. In any case in view of what I have said and in view of the inaccuracy of the Honourable Member's remarks I hope the House will not accept this amendment.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: On a point of explanation, Sir. The Honourable Mr. Innes has said that the word used in the English Act is 'and' and he has read section 101(2) of that Act. But I referred to section 102 which provides for penalty and there you will find the word used is 'or' and not 'and'.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: You have got to read the two together.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I drop the amendment to sub-clause (2), and I do not wish to press it.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that clause 16 as amended by the Joint Committee

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I have got other amendments to clause 16, Sir.

Mr. Chairman: But you said you did not wish to move them.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: No, Sir, the portion I did not press was that which related to sub-clause (2). I have moved the amendment in respect of sub-clause (1) only and I said I did not wish now to move the amendment to sub-clause (2) as it was similar, but I shall move amendments, with your permission, Sir, adding other sub-clauses to clause 16.

' Sir, my further amendment to clause 16 is:

" Add the following sub-section to the proviso to clause 16:

' Nothing in this Act shall render the owner, agent or manager of a mine liable to a penalty in respect of any contravention of or non-compliance with the provisions of this Act if he proves that the contravention or non-compliance was due to causes over which he had no control and against the happening of which it was impracticable for him to make any provision '."

Sir, this amendment I have taken out from clause 102 of the English Coal Mines Act of 1911. The provisos (a), (b) and (c) and sub-clause (3) to clause 16 in our Bill have also been taken out from section 102 of that Act, while other provisos to that section have been left out by the Joint Committee. I wish to propose, Sir, that the sub-sections that have been left out by the Joint Committee should also be incorporated by the House in clause 16. This seems to me to be a very desirable provision because if the manager, owner or agent committed any contravention of the rules or regulations or of any provisions under this Act, and it is proved that such contravention was due to impracticable causes over which he had no control and it was for him to provide against its happening, then such owner, manager or agent be exempted from the penalty under clause 16. Therefore, Sir, I propose that this addition to clause 16 be made.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I received notice of this amendment only at 10-30 A.M. on Saturday morning, and I have not been able fully to consult my legal advisers upon it. I don't remember whether we actually considered in the Joint Committee whether we should add these two clauses. But the reason why, as far as I can see, we did not include in our Bill a clause corresponding to clause 4 of Mr. Agnihotri's amendment, that is, clause 102 (3) of the English Act, was that it was thought that it was sufficiently provided for by clause 16 (2) of the Bill, which is the existing law. Clause 16 (2) says:

"In the event of any contravention of any such provisions by any person whomsoever, the owner, agent, and manager of the mine shall each be deemed also to be guilty of such contravention unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means, by publishing and to the best of his power enforcing those provisions, to prevent such contravention."

We thought, therefore, that we provided for the substance of the English sub-clause by the existing clause 16 (2) of the Bill.

As regards the second amendment "Nothing in this section shall be construed"

Mr. Chairman: It is not before the House.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: That, Sir, is the reason why we did not include a clause corresponding to clause 102 (3) of the English Act in our Bill. As far as I am concerned, I am quite prepared to leave the matter to the House. I do not think it is a matter of much importance, but it seems to me that clause 16 (2) of the existing Bill sufficiently provides for what the Honourable Member wants.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: In that case, Sir, I may be permitted to withdraw it.

Mr. N. M. Samarth (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, as I was a Member of the Joint Committee I may say that I thought that in law all that was needed was that reasonable means should be taken by the manager, owner or agent; and "reasonable means" means necessarily that if the instructions are unreasonable he has a good defence and he can say 'These I cannot carry out; these are not reasonable,' and he gets out of it by these words.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly withdrawn.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"That the following sub-clause be added to clause 16 of the Bill, namely:

"If a boy or girl was employed on the representation of his or her parent or guardian that he or she was of an age at which his or her employment would not be in contravention of this Act and under the belief in good faith that he or she was of that age or if a person has been employed in any capacity or in any manner on his representation that he fulfilled the conditions as to age, experience and otherwise necessary for such employment and under the belief in good faith that such representation was true, the owner, agent, or manager of the mine and employer shall be exempted from any penalty and the parent or guardian or the person making such representation as the case may be, shall in respect of the misrepresentation, be guilty of an offence under this Act."

Sir, this is also a sub-section of section 102 of the Coal Mines Act of 1911. In the present Bill we have provided that children below a certain age shall not be employed in the mines. The amendment which I suggest to this section will have the effect, that if the owner, manager or the agent of a mine employs any person on the representation of the person himself or on the representation of the guardian or the parents of such children, then he (the manager, owner or agent) would not be held liable to penalty under this section. Secondly, the guardian or the parent or the person who makes such a representation will also be held liable for having made a false representation to the owner, manager or agent for such employment, and therefore I suggest that this provision of making the person who makes such false representations, liable under this clause, will be very salutary in preventing the employment of children in the mines. Therefore, I submit, that this amendment be accepted and added to clause 16.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I rise to a point of order, Sir. This is a complicated amendment, and I think it should not be allowed.

Mr. Chairman: Do you object to it?

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Yes, I object to it.

Mr. Chairman: As the amendment is objected to, and as Honourable Members have not been furnished with a copy, for want of notice, I think I should disallow it.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, may I point out that it will delay the whole Bill. I think I can explain the point to Mr. Joshi's satisfaction.

Mr. Chairman: If Mr. Joshi is willing to hear you.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I have taken my objection.

Mr. Chairman (to the Honourable Mr. Innes): You may address the House as to why the objection should not be allowed.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I think, Sir, the rules provide that two clear days' notice must be given for these amendments. These amendments reached me on Saturday evening, and from our point of view the objection can be upheld. I do not know why copies of the amendments have not been supplied to Members. The real point I want to make is that I am anxious not to delay this Bill on the ground that Members have not been given notice of an important amendment which I think I can dispose of quite easily.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I think Mr. Joshi will reconsider his objection.

Mr. Chairman: In the circumstances explained, I suspend the Standing Order and allow the amendment.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I think it is a very dangerous thing for us to try and transfer from the English Act a provision of law which may be and is entirely unsuitable to our own Act. In the first place, the form of Mr. Agnihotri's amendment is unsuitable. It talks about a boy and a girl. We have no definition in our Act of a boy or a girl. We have only got a definition of a child. In the second place, the intention of the amendment is to penalise misrepresentation as to the age of a child by the parent of that child. Now, everybody in this House, I think, will realise that the Indian miner will have the very greatest difficulty in saying definitely whether or not his child is or is not below 13 years of age and therefore in clause 27 of our Bill we have made a special provision to meet this very case. Clause 27 says:

"If any question arises between the Chief Inspector or the Inspector and the manager of any mine as to whether any person is a child, the question shall, in the absence of a certificate as to the age of such person granted in the prescribed manner, be referred by the Chief Inspector or the Inspector for decision to a qualified medical practitioner."

In all cases, therefore, where it is uncertain whether or not a child is or is not below 13 years of age, we make provision for the settlement of the dispute. It seems to be quite unnecessary to impose on these ignorant miners the obligation of telling the truth with regard to the age of their children when they themselves probably do not know what that age is.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Sir, I also oppose this amendment. It provides for a penalty on the parents of the children on the ground of misrepresenting the age of their children. I think, Sir, in the case of these illiterate people, anything can be proved against them, and therefore I think that such a provision is most dangerous. I therefore oppose it.

The motion was negatived.

Clauses 16, 17 and 18 were added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move that sub-clause (7) of clause 19 be deleted.

Sub-clause (7) is to this effect:

"Nothing in this section shall affect the powers of a Magistrate under section 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1848."

Sir, under this sub-clause we give authority to a Magistrate to stop the mines and take proceedings under section 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The House will remember that only a few minutes ago we have provided that the District Magistrate may be made an Inspector in a district. Sir, if the District Magistrate is declared to be an Inspector in the District, this clause becomes superfluous because, in his capacity as a District Magistrate, he could take action and in his capacity as an Inspector also he could take action; moreover, under this Bill, we have also provided that the Chief Inspector or the Inspector, if he finds that the mine is in a dangerous condition or something to that effect, can under clause 19, sub-clauses (1) and (2), close the mine. So this power under 144 will be superfluous when the same thing could be done by the Inspector or the Chief Inspector and by the District Magistrate. They can also withdraw the workers from the mines and they can stop the working of the mines. It might be said that there may be a likelihood of a breach of the peace and therefore the Magistrate's intervention may be necessary but this very thing could be done by the Chief Inspector and the Inspector under the other sub-clauses of clause 19 and therefore this sub-clause (7) is superfluous and unnecessary and should be deleted.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sub-section (7). Sir, is in the existing Act. As I understand the matter, it is as follows: "under section 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code a Magistrate has power to take certain action in an emergency—that is a general power. Under clause 19 of this Bill we confer upon the Chief Inspector and the Inspector special powers to take action also in an emergency. The object of sub-clause (7), as I understand it, is to make it perfectly clear that nothing in the special powers which have been conferred upon the Chief Inspector and the Inspector override or interfere with the general powers exercised by a Magistrate under the Criminal Procedure Code. It is by no means clear to me whether, if you remove this section from the Bill, you would in fact deprive a Magistrate of his general powers under section 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code. To take the question, on the merits, whether a Magistrate should be allowed to exercise these powers, I would point out, as I have just pointed out on an earlier amendment, that we have only got four Inspectors in all India. Quite conceivably, there might arise a case where a part of a mine becomes extremely dangerous, where a Magistrate has to take action on the spot without waiting for an Inspector to come down. It seems to me, Sir, whether it makes any difference or not if we remove this sub-clause, it will be a mistake to do so.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): I think Sir, the Government is not well advised in having a clause like this. If they once bring in a special act of reservation in respect of a particular section of the Criminal Procedure Code, it would mean that the Magistrate cannot exercise any of the other powers conferred by the same Code. For example, take section 133. Does the Honourable Member mean to suggest that, unless power is given by this Bill to exercise powers under that provision of the Criminal Procedure Code, the Magistrate could not exercise the power? I think, if he thinks the matter over, he will find that the introduction of this clause is likely to lead to a great many difficulties. If we specifically mention section 144, it would imply that the other powers are not open to the Magistrate; I do not think the Government would be well advised in having a clause like this. Once you mention a specific section you exclude the exercise of powers under other sections of the Criminal Procedure Code. Take section 133—taking precautions in respect of danger to property. If you leave out that and put in section 144, what would be the effect? It would be regarded as if you had made provision for exercising powers under section 144, but that the Magistrate cannot exercise powers under section 133. I think it is a dangerous innovation and is likely to lead to difficulties.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: It is not innovation: it is in the existing Act.

The Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): Sir, in reply to my Honourable and learned friend who has just spoken, I should like to point out that section 144 and this particular clause of the Bill that we are now considering deal with the same matter, deal with an emergency where speedy remedy is desirable. Section 133 is another matter altogether: that deals with the case of a nuisance. I would point out one mistake into which Mr. Agnihotri has fallen. I understood him to say that, as the District Magistrate has the powers of an Inspector under the Act, he can as an Inspector use his powers under section 19 to meet the emergency and therefore it is quite superfluous to allow him any power or any Magistrate any power under section 144. Mr. Agnihotri has, Sir, I am afraid, overlooked the clause of the Bill under which the District Magistrate gets his powers under the Bill. If he will look at sub-section (3) of section 4 he will find that the District Magistrate is not, and cannot be, invested with powers under this particular section 19. It is one of the two sections which is excluded from the scope of the Magistrate's action under this Bill. Therefore, Mr. Agnihotri's sole argument to support this amendment has disappeared. A District Magistrate cannot take action under section 19 and we make it quite clear that he can take action under section 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Mr. Chairman: Amendment moved:

"In clause 19 delete sub-clause (7)."

The motion was negatived.

Clauses 19, 20 and 21 were added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"That in clause 22, substitute 'in the local official Gazette' for the words 'at such time'."

Sir, clause 22 of this Bill is to this effect:

"The Local Government may cause any report submitted by a Committee under section 11 or by a court of inquiry under section 21 to be published at such time and in such manner as it may think fit."

My amendment will make it obligatory on the Local Government to publish it in the local official Gazette, in addition to the other modes that the Local Government may decide to give publication in as required. My reasons for this are, Sir, that the local official Gazette is practically the mouth-piece of the Government. Every event, order or piece of legislation, rules or regulations and every report that has to be published by the Government, unless it is of a very voluminous size, is generally published in the local official Gazette and every person including a mine owner is expected to know it and even the law presumes that whatever has been published in the Government Gazette is a proper communication to the persons who may be concerned. Therefore I suggest that it would be better that in addition to the other modes of publication the Local Government may think proper that the publication should also be made in the local official Gazette so that no person could complain afterwards that he had not the knowledge of it because the manner of publication under the Bill remains uncertain and may not probably be known to every mine owner or to persons concerned; while they are expected to know and actually know that there is a Government Gazette which contains these publications. Therefore, it will be better if the local official Gazette is inserted in this clause and the Local Government be required to publish the reports, etc., in the local official Gazette in addition to the other modes that they may think right.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I would just point out, Sir, as a point of form, that if this amendment is adopted, it would seem necessary to add before "manner" the word "such". Otherwise the clause will stand "in the local official Gazette and in such manner as it may think fit." That will probably amount to an injunction for the Local Government to consider whether it should be printed in small pica or big pica or whatever it may be. But apart from that, Sir, I do not think I need take the time of the House over this amendment. Surely in a matter of this kind we can leave it to the Local Government to decide what is the most suitable method of publishing a report of this kind and I do not see why we should tie them down in this Bill to any particular method.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 22 was added to the Bill.

Mr. B. N. Misra: Sir, my amendment runs as follows:

"(i) That in clause 23, sub-clause (b) for the word 'sixty' the words 'forty-eight' be substituted.

(ii) That in clause 23 (c) for the words 'fifty-four' the words 'forty-two' be substituted."

Clause 23 runs as follows:

"No person shall be employed in a mine:

(a) on more than six days in any one week;

(b) if he works above ground, for more than sixty hours in any one week;

(c) if he works below ground, for more than fifty-four hours in any one week."

My amendment relates to clauses (b) and (c). The first sub-clause says that no person shall be employed for more than six days in one week. Practically a labourer has to work sixty hours in six days, and if he has to work sixty hours in a week, it comes to this, that he has to work ten hours a day. I consider that this ten hours' continuous work is really very unwholesome and it will greatly tell upon the health of the labourers. The object of the Bill is to protect the safety and health of the labourers. Generally labourers go to work at about 7 in the morning, come at about 12, prepare their meals, have their bath and so on. They go to work at 3 P.M., come back at 6 P.M. An ordinary labourer works 8 hours a day. That is outside, in the open fields. In this case, if the present conditions are allowed, they will have to work 10 hours. For instance, if they go early morning at 7, they will complete their ten hours' work by 5 o'clock without any recess. If some recess is allowed for their bath and their food,—you must allow at least two or three hours,—even if you allow only two hours, they will have to work till night 7 o'clock. I think two hours' recess is absolutely necessary for their bath and other things. Practically they will have to work from morning 7 till night 7, if any recess is allowed. If no recess is allowed, as is not contemplated, they will have to work continuously from 7 A.M. till 5 P.M. I wish to point out to Honourable Members that we began just at about 11 o'clock and we went for our lunch at 2 P.M. That is, after three hours' work we had one hour's rest. I think Honourable Members will have some sympathy and some consideration for these hard working poor labourers. If two or three hours' work is sufficient for an hour's rest for us, don't you think that these labourers who have to work in pits deserve your sympathy! I am told sometimes these pits are 5,000 feet deep and some are 2,000 feet deep and they have to work at such depths underneath the ground that they do not get any free air, and the pits are very warm and very unhealthy. Do they not, as human beings, require some sort of concession and do you think it proper that they should be so much tormented and work for ten hours a day at such depths? Sub-clause (c) provides that they will have to work only fifty-four hours underground. That means that underground labour is required to be 9 hours a day and above-ground work 10 hours a day. There is no definition of what is above-ground work and what is underground. We do not know which they will call underground work—200 feet or 300 feet or 1,000 feet under the ground. In these circumstances, to labour for 9 hours or 10 hours a day is very unwholesome for these labourers. Probably my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, will tell us that we have to conform to the decision of the Geneva International Conference which has accepted 10 hours' labour to be the minimum. I submit that for this particular kind of work, which is really very difficult, and in a country like India where the weather is really so uncharitable or so specially hot in summer, it is very difficult for labourers to work for 9 or 10 hours a day. I think 5 or 6 hours will be really very tiresome for any labourer who really wants to work. If you simply want them to be there even till 10 o'clock, they might be idling away their time. In the interests of hard work you have to give them some rest. If you give less hours, they can work more energetically and more vigorously, and they can turn out more work than if you allow them to be there for 20 hours or 15 hours or any longer hours. The result that the mine owners will get by allowing these people to work more hours, will not be profitable to them, because we must imagine that the workmen are after all human beings and no man can do hard work continuously for more than 7 or 8 hours. If you keep him there for 10 or 15 hours I do not think it will be profitable to the mine owners. Probably, it may be said that these labourers will get more money. As a matter of fact, they do not get more money. The work is carried on on a contract system. Say, the cooly sirdar takes 10 or 12 coolies. He takes a contract and whatever extra money is got is taken by the cooly sirdar from the mine owner or his agent. The actual coolies do not get any profit, because the coolies continue to get the same daily wages. The gain goes to the sirdar, or headman or contractor. I submit therefore that if they work hard it will not benefit them. I do not think that such provision will really bring any benefit to these labourers. Then, probably, it may be said that in the Factory Act we have also 10 hours labour. I submit to this House that labour in a factory and labour in a mine is quite different. Labour in a factory is more comfortable where they have to work under buildings or in open air, whereas this mine work is really very tiresome and unwholesome work. Ten hours labour is very difficult even above ground and 9 hours a day or 54 hours in the week is really very very difficult to do. Of course, we are not making any provision that those who have worked 4 or 5 hours underground should be brought above-ground and another set should go underground. If there were some such provision, there might be reason in that, but there is no such provision. So, a man working underground will always be there continuously 9 hours which is very difficult. In these circumstances I move:

"That in clause (b) instead of '60 hours' '48 hours' be substituted and in clause (c) instead of '54 hours' '42 hours' be substituted."

Mr. Chairman: Amendment moved:

"That in clause 23, sub-clause (b), for the word 'sixty' the words 'forty-eight' be substituted."

Mr. N. C. Sircar (Bengal National Chamber of Commerce): The provision is that in respect of work overground it is 60 hours, that is, ten hours a day. Ordinarily, there are 12 hours in a day. I think my Honourable friend understands it. The practice in our coal mines is that the above-ground labourer gets two hours' rest from 12 to 2 P.M. In ordinary days, I mean in the summer season, the sun rises at about 5-30, and the labourer goes to work at about 6 o'clock. After working 6 hours he gets two hours' rest, and then he comes back at 2-30 or 2 and goes back home at 6 o'clock. We get 10 hours' work and at the same time they get two hours' rest. So, that meets the desire that a labourer should get a certain amount of rest. (A voice: "What about winter?") In the winter season, they get their two hours' rest all the same, but they cannot get to work before 7 o'clock, and they are always let off at 5-30 P.M. In the winter season we do not get 60 hours' work. (A Voice: "Why is it provided in the Bill"?) Then there must be two provisos that in the summer season it ought to be 60 hours and in the winter season it must be 54 hours. But in respect of underground work, the provision is for 54 hours and six days in the week which means nine hours a day. Of course, we have not at present the shift system in the mines, in fact, it is impracticable, because some miners come to work from a distance of 5 or 6 miles and therefore they cannot return home every day. Therefore they stop at the coal mine and they are expected in their own interests to work 9 hours. But the miners generally go down at 8 or 8-30 and sometimes at 9 o'clock. Whoever goes later is to come out later and from 8 o'clock they work up to 4 o'clock which means actually 8 hours and we do not get more than 8 hours' work. Of course, the provision is for 9 hours but we shall be quite pleased if we get 8 hours' work from the miners. As a matter of fact, we do not get more than 8 hours work. The same thing applies here as in the case of surface labour that in the winter season we get a certain amount of less work because they cannot go down until it is 9 o'clock and in the hot season, of course, they go down a bit earlier. At any rate, they do only 8 hours' work under the mines, and such being so, I do not see what effect the amendment is going to have on the practice already in force in the coal mines.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: My Honourable friend, Mr. Misra's speech contains so many startling mis-statements that it left me panting and breathless at the end of it. He referred to coal mines 5,000 miles deep. (A Voice: "Feet.") He referred to the Geneva Conference which was a conference which dealt with seamen. What he really meant to refer to was the Washington Conference, the conference which mainly dealt with factory labour. The whole of his speech indicated, I think, that he had never been to a coal mine, and that he had not even read the previous debates in this House in regard to this Bill. Mr. Misra evidently thinks that in the coal mines at 6 o'clock every morning you ring a bell and miners come out from neatly whitewashed houses and troop down the mine, and at five in the evening a bell is rung and the miners troop out of the mine. That is not so, for the mine labour in India, especially in the coal mine, is, I regret to say, very unorganised. It is difficult enough to get the labour at all. When the miner comes, he comes often from a long distance. The men come with their families. They go down the mines and come up whenever they like, they stay there as long as they like, and they are paid entirely by results. They do not do any fixed number of hours work. They merely cut so many tubs of coal. When they cut enough tubs of coal sufficient to maintain them for a week, up they come and away they go. That is why in making for the first time an effort to limit the hours of labour in a mine we have contented ourselves with fixing a weekly limit of hours, and in fixing that limit of 60 hours for labour above-ground, we have followed the desire expressed by this House, the mandate of this House. The Washington Conference recommended that in India the limit of 60 hours a week should be adopted for all workers in industries covered by the Factory Act and in mines. The House recommended to the Governor General in Council that that draft convention should be ratified and that is why we have adopted the 60-hour a week for labour above-ground. That is, we have adopted for labour above-ground in mines precisely the same limit as we have adopted for ordinary factory labour. Is there any reason why we should treat above-ground labour in mines with more consideration than similar labour in factories? As regards underground labour we have gone rather beyond the prescriptions of this draft convention. We have adopted a 54-hour week, and we did that for a special reason. At the Washington Conference there was a special Committee sitting. It did not go as far as recommending the inclusion in the Convention of a 54-hour week for underground labour in mines, but it made a special recommendation to the Government of India that we should consider that proposition. We embodied these two propositions in the Bill. We have addressed all Local Governments and all Local Governments except one, Burma, which objects to the limits and thinks they are too low, have agreed to them. At this stage it would be very difficult for us to go further and lay more drastic limits down. And since in this Bill we have carried out the mandate of this Assembly, I think that this Assembly should reject this amendment.

Rai Bahadur S. N. Singh (Bihar and Orissa: Nominated Official): Sir, I am afraid I think a further lowering of the maximum working hours will affect the growth of some indigenous industries such as mica and coal, and will reduce their output

Mr. Chairman: Will the Honourable Member kindly speak up.

Rai Bahadur S. N. Singh: Ten hours a day is not considered intolerable even for brain workers and there is no sufficient reason why a labourer should not put in 60 hours a week or 10 hours a day above ground, and 54 hours a week or 9 hours a day below ground, especially as it has been made clear that he must have absolute rest for one whole day in a week of seven days. In this connection I would venture to invite reference to the opinion of the Punjab Coal Company, which considered that the limitation of the hours of employment in mines and the enforcement of a weekly day of rest would be the death blow of the Punjab collieries. This provision has on the whole met with the approval of the Local Governments and the representative public bodies as the maximum limit reasonably enforceable, but even then, Sir, it is recognized that it will be necessary to make some rules to exempt the cases of firemen, pump-men and other labourers of an intermittent kind, at least for a considerable time to come, as it will not be an easy matter to provide specially qualified men of this class in the near future. Also, Sir, it is a matter of some significance that even the veteran hero of the labour classes in India (Mr. Joshi) favours the retention of this clause, as his proposed amendments to this clause would go to show.

In the circumstances, Sir, I think this amendment should be readily outvoted.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Sir, I have great pleasure in supporting this amendment. The hours of work suggested by this Bill are no doubt too long and I hope the House will accept the amendment proposed by my Honourable friend, Mr. Misra. I am of opinion that no man should be allowed to work for more than six hours a day and for more than six days a week and that for adequate wages. I do not think my friend, Mr. Sircar, really made out a strong case. He himself admitted that people do not work for more than eight hours. If they do not work for more than eight hours why should you not accept the amendment?

Mr. N. C. Sircar: I meant to say as regards sub-surface work.

Mr. H. M. Joshi: If they do not work very long and for more than two days, why should he object to the amendment? I think if the amendment is accepted, we shall be following the modern and latest European standards. I therefore feel that this House should accept this amendment.

Mr. J. N. Mukharjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I did not want to speak, but having heard my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi, I should like to say a word or two on certain aspects of this question. There is one thing to which I would like to draw the attention of the House particularly. It is that the clause in question merely lays down the outside limit. Clause 23 of the Bill does not compel every labourer to work for 10 hours or any other specified number of hours. What it says is that no person shall be employed in a mine (a) on more than six days in a week, (b) if he works above ground, for more than sixty hours in any one week, and (c) if he works below ground, for more than 54 hours in one week. Now, Sir, we have just heard one of the coal proprietors from Bengal, and we know now that physical laws and economic laws cannot be very often resisted, in spite of regulated hours of work. So that if at certain seasons of the year workmen are obliged to work shorter hours and at other times longer hours, these periods have to adjust themselves to the needs of surrounding circumstances. That is a point, Sir, we should not lose sight of. Therefore if the amendment proposed be accepted, and then on any occasion if somebody is required to work for 10 hours, and he does so willingly and even for his own gains he will be punishable under the law according to the proposed amendment. That is what the present law wishes to provide against. It does not require any labourer to definitely work for 8 or 10 hours. Unlike my Honourable friend from Orissa (Mr. Misra), I have been in a mine myself and have seen things as they are. Sunrise or sunset has very little to do there. Down there, it is pitch dark relieved only by electric bulbs and one has to move about there with difficulty. I may repeat, one has very little to do with sunrise and sunset in marking his hours, when working in a mine. Putting aside these questions, I submit that clause 23 of the Bill provides for the maximum limit only for the period of work for a labourer in connection with a mine, and bearing this in mind we should not raise objections which might interfere with the output of coal, or with the cost of the output of coal, and may bring about economic conditions which may place India at a disadvantage in the economic world. Therefore, Sir, I oppose the amendment.

Mr. Chairman: The amendment before the House is:

"That in clause 23, sub-clause (b) for the word 'sixty' the words 'forty-eight' be substituted."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move.

"That in clause 23, sub-clause (b) substitute the words 'fifty-four' for the word 'sixty', and in sub-clause (c) substitute the words 'forty-eight' for the words 'fifty-four'."

I do not think that this amendment requires any argument. The Honourable Mr. Innes gave us two grounds in opposing Mr. Misra's amendment. The first was that generally these people were not required to work for more than eight hours, and certainly not for 10 hours, as Mr. Sircar has pointed out. The second was that we have adopted the draft Convention which lays down 60 hours, and it is thus necessary to adopt that as a principle for fixing the maximum hours of work in the mines.

But, Sir, we have already deviated from the draft convention in adopting 54 hours as the maximum period of work underground, and there is no cogent reason why should we put a maximum of 60 hours and stick to the convention. Mr. Sircar has pointed out that the labourers generally work for only 8 hours. (Mr. Sircar: "I was not speaking of surface labour, Sir.") Say, 10 hours in summer and less in winter. But, Sir, even clerks and other people employed in offices whose work is not of such a fatiguing nature as that of the labourer are never required to work for more than six or seven hours in the day. (Voices: "No, no.") From 10 to 4 o'clock or 5 o'clock: what does that come to. (A Voice: "Till 10 o'clock.") Office hours generally are from 11 to 5 or 10 to 4. If a man works later than that, it is his own lookout. When therefore we people who have light work to do, work only for seven or at the most eight hours, why should we take more work from the labourer whose work is much heavier and tiresome and make him work for 10 hours a day as is being provided in this Bill. And if, as pointed out by Honourable Mr. Innes and Honourable Mr. Sircar, they actually work for less than 10 hours, then there should be no objection to fix the maximum of working hours at 54. Even that will amount to nine hours work a day, which is in itself too much. Therefore I suggest that by way of a compromise the Government should accept this proposal for the substitution of 54 instead of 60, in place of 48 which has just been thrown out. The Honourable Mr. Mukherjee has said that that is only the maximum period which has been fixed. I do, of course, realize that in the mines where illiterate labourers work, they are never expected to be punctual in attending to their work, and often they come late. But there is no necessity to keep the maximum at a figure which is not desirable, because that may give an excuse to some mineowners to extract 60 hours full work from them and the Government could not interfere. Mr. Sircar has said that if a labourer comes late, he has to continue late. Therefore I submit it is better to reduce the work from 60 hours to 54 and if a man has to do underground work, from 54 to 48. Therefore I move that this substitution be made.

The Honourable Mr. A. O. Chatterjee: I do not think the Honourable Mr. Agnihotri has advanced any new arguments at all. He has referred to the fact that men working in commercial and Government offices do not usually attend office for more than 6 or 7 hours, but have we ever passed any law preventing any man from working for more than 10 hours in a commercial or a Government office? I wish we had, because then I personally should have some relief from occasionally working from 6 in the morning to 8 o'clock at night. The whole principle here is different. We are preventing people from working more than a certain number of hours. Therefore we have to be extremely cautious. My friend, Mr. Mukherjee, has already emphasised the fact that we are laying down maxima. We are not laying down minima at all. I hope all the Honourable Members of this House will bear that fact in mind. Then the Honourable Mr. Agnihotri has utilised the statement made by Mr. Sircar that as a matter of fact these men in the mines do not actually work more than 8 hours underground. That is quite true. I would go further. From the statistics that we gathered, we learnt that as a matter of fact the hours they work underground are even less than 8 per day on the average but then there is no reason why we should restrict them from working hard and working fairly decent hours if they want to. The fact is, and I think Mr. Sircar will bear me out when I make this statement, that most of these people who work in the mines are also at present agriculturists. The result is that they devote a certain number of hours of work to the mines and devote the rest of the week to work on their fields. Therefore they do work rather shorter hours in the mines both above ground and below ground than they ordinarily do in the factories. But we all know that the standard of living in these mines among the mine workers is extremely low. Our aim should be to raise the standard of life amongst these workers and then and then only their condition will improve and the condition of the industry will improve. Therefore our aim should be to get as many men to work all the time in the mines as possible and not devote their time half to agricultural work and half to mines. When they do that, they will certainly be expected to work fairly long and steady hours in the mines and we should do nothing in our present legislation to prevent any such tendency. I think, Sir, everybody will admit that this House has been most progressive in the matter of labour legislation. Even in the very first Session on the motion of Government this House agreed to laying down a 60-hour limit for workers in mines and in factories. In the present case we have gone even further. Government have made the proposal that the labour of miners underground should be limited to 54 hours. This has been done (as the Honourable Mr. Innes has already explained) with special reference to a recommendation made by a Committee at Washington. Therefore we are not really deviating from the Resolutions that were passed by this House two years ago. We are only carrying out the further suggestion that had been made at Washington. Everybody agrees that that suggestion is a sound one. Therefore Government cannot be considered to have been inconsistent in having made this proposal. I do not think, Sir, that Mr. Agnihotri's proposal will tend to the well-being of the miners. I think, Sir, in their own interests they should not be prevented from working a decent number of hours above ground. I hope, therefore, Sir, that the amendment will not be accepted.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: I wish to add a few words, Sir, to what has fallen from the mouth of the Honourable Mr. Chatterjee. If I understood the Honourable Mr. Innes aright and if these miners are not paid by the day, it will make a very considerable amount of difference in their daily earnings if the time of working is further curtailed. That is the first point which must be taken into consideration. Secondly, I think that if there is a further curtailment of the hours of work for these miners, the price of coal must necessarily go up. That would cost a good deal to our industries. There is another point which has also to be considered in coming to a decision on this matter. We all want more coal and more industries. If we go on limiting the hours of work in this manner from time to time, I think our industries will not prosper so fast as we all wish. I therefore oppose the amendment.

Mr. Chairman: The amendment before the House is:

"That in sub-clause (b) of clause 23 substitute '54' for '60'."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. B. N. Misra: Sir,

Mr. Chairman: Is the Honourable Member formally moving it? He has already made a speech.

Mr. B. N. Misra: I have already made a speech, Sir; that is what I was going to express. I think I have dealt with both the clauses, and I submit that at least this amendment (42 hours a week) for underground work should be accepted. I therefore move:

"That in clause 23, sub-clause (c), for the words 'fifty-four' the words 'forty-two' be substituted."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move this amendment, vis.:

"That in sub-clause (c) substitute the words 'forty-eight' for the words 'fifty-four'."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move:

"Add the following sub-clause to clause 23:

"(d) for more than ten hours in a day."

Sir, we have provided 60 hours' work in a week, but we have not provided the limit of the hours for which a labourer is to work in a day. Therefore I propose, Sir, that a man may not be made to work for more than 10 hours a day.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: Sir, this point has been examined very carefully not only by the Government of India but also by a special Committee which sat on the Coal requirements in the coal-fields in 1919 and 1920. We have been advised on all sides that it is quite impracticable as things are at present in the coal-fields to impose any daily limit of hours. If the House will remember, we had a debate on this very subject in September last and I then explained in full detail this fact, namely, that it is not possible, as things are now in the coal-fields, to enforce a daily limit, and, since it is impossible to enforce a daily limit of hours, I think the House will agree with me that we ought not to impose one.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Chairman: I think it will be for the convenience of the House if we adjourn now.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Wednesday, the 30th January, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Tuesday, 30th January, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): We have proceeded further with the allotment of business. Honourable Members will find that Thursday's list has already been distributed to them. We propose to have no meeting on Friday. On Saturday we propose to ask that the Report of the Joint Committee on the Workmen's Compensation Bill be taken into consideration, and we anticipate discussion on this important measure will also occupy us again on Monday. On Tuesday we assume that there will still be some discussion left over on the Workmen's Compensation Bill, and after that we shall proceed with the further consideration of the Criminal Procedure Code Bill. On Wednesday we shall again proceed to the consideration of the Criminal Procedure Code. On Thursday there will be discussion on the private Resolution regarding Company versus State management of Railways. I shall subsequently announce the business that is fixed either for Friday or Saturday following. On the following Monday we propose to again consider the Criminal Procedure Code Bill and also on Tuesday the 13th. Wednesday is a public holiday. On Thursday the 15th we propose to consider the Resolution regarding the Fiscal Commission's recommendations.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): May I know, Sir, with regard to the business on Thursday the 8th, supposing the Indianisation of the Army question is concluded, will some other Resolution be allowed to be brought up on that day or is the whole day to be given to that question?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Thursday, the 8th, Sir, is a public day, which we have given up for the consideration of the question of Company versus State management of Railways. I think it is unlikely that we should be able to take any further business on that day.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): And will that be on a Government Resolution?—Company versus State management of Railways?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: It is a Government day but we have allowed a private Resolution to come forward on that day as it is a matter of great importance to the Assembly, and the Assembly will remember that they asked that I should bring this on as early as possible. I may say, of course, that it was open to us to use this public day for a Resolution of our own, but, as a private Resolution had been tabled on the same subject we propose instead to take the opportunity of discussing it on that day.

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

Mr. President: I have to acquaint the Assembly that I have received a Message from His Excellency the Governor General:

"In pursuance of the provisions of sub-section (3) of section 67A of the Government of India Act, I hereby direct that the heads of expenditure specified in that sub-section shall be open to discussion by the Legislative Assembly when the Financial Statement is under consideration.

(Sd.) READING,
Governor General."

The Assembly will now resume consideration of the Report of the Joint Committee on the Indian Mines Bill.

THE INDIAN MINES BILL.

Mr. N. M. Joshi (Nominated: Labour Interests): Sir, I beg to move the following amendment:

"That to clause 23 the following sub-clause be added:

'(d) for not more than 11 hours in a day'."

I will take the latter part of my amendment separately. Sir, the evils which my amendment seeks to remedy are the evils of long hours of work in one day. By the Bill we have provided that there should be 54 hours of work in a week underground and 60 hours of work on the surface. Sir, by providing merely a limit for the week's work we do not stop the evils of the long hours of work. As a matter of fact, it was admitted during the discussion of the hours of work for the week that the workmen in the mines do not work generally more than 54 hours a week at all. Therefore, when that limit was placed, it was not placed to remove any evil because the evil of the long hours of work in a week did not exist at all. That limit was placed in order to satisfy the Washington Convention; that is all. But, even when you have a limit of 54 or 60 hours a week, you do not prevent long hours of work during the day. It is quite possible that the 54 hours may be worked in three days of 18 hours. Sir, it is not an exaggeration when I say that sometimes people do work for 18 hours a day in the mine and finish their week's work in that way. As a matter of fact this has been admitted both by Government and my Honourable friend, Mr. Sircar.

Mr. N. C. Sircar (Bengal: National Chamber of Commerce): I did not admit it.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: He says he did not admit it. Sir, he at least admits that there are not more than 54 hours in a week and he also admits that these people do not work for more than 3 or 4 days in a week. After working for 3 or 4 days these people go home. Sir, if these people work for 2 or 3 days or at most 4 days and finish the week's work which is about 54 hours' work, I think I am right in saying that the people in the mines must be working more than 13 hours and even sometimes 18 hours in a day. My Honourable friend, Mr. Sircar, may refuse to admit the fact which all the same exists. How does he propose to divide the work of 54 hours in three or four days' time unless the people work for 18 hours or at least more than 13 hours a day?

If my Honourable friend, Mr. Sircar, and the Government maintain that people do not work even for 54 hours a week, I can understand it.

But if they say that the people do not work for 54 hours, my contention is, why did they not accept the amendment of my Honourable friend that there should not be more than 48 hours in a week? If people do not work more than 48 hours in a week why should they object to the amendment? As a matter of fact people do work more than 48 hours. They work 54 hours and therefore the 54 hours' limit was accepted. Sir, this evil is not imaginary. Not only people work up to 18 hours in a day but sometimes a large number of people remain in the mine for the whole day including night and for days together. Sir, I do not wish to request the House to take my word unsupported by an authority. I therefore propose to read a sentence from the latest report of the Chief Inspector of Mines. The Chief Inspector of Mines in his latest report says:

"The practice of sleeping underground is only too common although it is usually forbidden."

(An Honourable Member: "What does 'sleeping' mean?")
 "Sleeping" means spending their night. Sir, as a matter of fact, people cannot but do that. Both Government and my Honourable friend Mr. Sircar will admit that they do not make provision for the housing of all the people who go to work in the mines, and if there is no provision of a residence on the surface, people do not mind sleeping underground and go on working as long as they can work. Both Government and my Honourable friend have admitted this fact that a large number of people come from their village to the mines.

Mr. N. C. Sircar: I rise to a point of order, Sir. I did not say that they are not provided with housing accommodation. What I said was that people coming from a distance of 5 or 6 miles do not go home every day. They go back home after their work is over.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Sir, my contention is that all the people who work on the mines have not been given residential quarters in the mines. Are there residential quarters in the mines for all the people that work there? Again, there are a large number of people who come from the villages to work on the mines. Do you mean to say these quarters have been built for not being occupied at all? As a matter of fact, a large number of people have not got sufficient residence on the mine. Therefore a large number prefer to go on working from one morning to the next morning, having practically little rest, sleeping somewhere and again beginning work and finishing the 54 hours for the week. This has been going on for a long time and the remedy that we have proposed in this Bill is no remedy for that evil. We simply propose that there should be 54 hours in a week. That is no remedy for stopping over-work during one day. Sir, the evil effects of the long hours of work in a day are both economic as well as from the point of view of health. If people go on working without sound sleep and without sufficient rest in the day for three or four days continuously, their health is bound to suffer. Again, from the economic point of view, neither the workman gains nor do the employers gain. The workman has to work 54 hours in a week. If he works these 54 hours after taking sufficient rest at intervals, I am quite sure he will be able to produce more during the 54 hours than if he works those 54 hours without sufficient rest. From the same point of view the employers also do not gain very much. Neither do the employers gain by this practice nor do the workmen gain economically. From the point of view of the health of the workmen there is a great loss. Thus, this practice of working without any limit of rest during the day is harmful from all points of view.

[Mr. N. M. Joshi.]

If that is so, I should like to know what the objections are which Government or my Honourable friend Mr. Sircar may take to the proposal which I am making, namely, that there should be a limit of work for the day. I propose that the limit should be 11 hours of work. Sir, I have proposed the limit of 11 hours not because I feel that a smaller limit is not desirable, but because I want the support of the whole House if I can gain it. I have particularly kept the limit at such a high figure as 11 hours simply because I want to carry, if possible, the whole House with me. Now, Sir, what can be the objections to this proposal? My Honourable friend Mr. Chatterjee yesterday said that these people working on the mines must work decent hours of work. I ask him whether he will take objection to my proposal of 11 hours on the ground of decency. I hope he will not. Neither will my Honourable friend Mr. Innes nor my Honourable friend Mr. Sircar will take objection to my proposal on the ground that 11 hours' work is not a decent amount of work.

Then, Sir, there were some objections taken yesterday to the proposals for the week's limit of work on the ground that the earnings of the workmen will suffer. There cannot be any objection to my proposal even from that point of view. I do not propose that the total week's work should be reduced. Let the total week's work be of 54 hours. I only propose that this 54 hours' work should be more evenly and fairly distributed. Instead of people being allowed to work 54 hours in 3 or 4 days' time, I only propose that these 54 hours should be worked in 5 or 6 days' time. Therefore, from the point of view of the earnings of the workmen there cannot be any objection to my proposal. Then, Sir, what can be the other objection? The objection which either the Government or my Honourable friend Mr. Sircar will take is that of the habits of the people. It is said that those who work on the mines belong to some class of people who have not got regular habits of work. They are the Santhals or some such people, and their habits of work are irregular. They will not be trained, they will not be disciplined to regular work. That is the main ground on which objection can be taken to the proposal which I am making. Sir, I would like to know from my Honourable friend Mr. Innes or any supporter of his whether this objection of the habits of the people was not taken whenever there was a proposal for regulating the hours of daily work. I want to know whether, when the Factory Act was discussed and when the limitation of the hours of work in factories was discussed for the first time, objections were not taken on the ground that the habits of the people in India differ. Not only that, but even to-day, those who have an opportunity of speaking to people who employ a large number of people in factories in Bombay, not the Santhals of the Central Provinces or Bihar, but in Bombay, will always hear complaints that the habits of the people prevent their reduction of the hours of work. So this complaint about the habits of the people is not a new one. It is an old complaint, and it has been brought forward not only in India but in all the countries of the world whenever there was an attempt to limit the hours of work for the day. Therefore, there is nothing special in this objection which the Government propose to take. As a matter of fact, it is feared that people work longer hours and they are not also disciplined because we do not make an attempt to regulate their life. It is necessary that their life should be regulated, and because it is necessary to do so, the factory legislation has come into existence. If there are any people who say, "Why should we limit, why should we regulate the life of the working classes", my answer to them is that they are too late in the day. The principle that the hours of work for the working classes should be regulated has been accepted by this country, by this Government, as well as by the whole world. Therefore if they say we should not interfere with the liberty of the working classes, I say they are too late in the day.

Then, Sir, when this question was discussed last time and even yesterday, it was said that I have no personal experience of the mines in India. Sir, I admit this disadvantage and I regret it, but I want to know how my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, who insisted upon visiting one mine before he introduced the Bill, and my Honourable friend, Mr. Chatterjee, who insisted upon visiting a dozen mines,—how did they learn by merely visiting these mines once or even a dozen times the habits, sentiments and the feelings of the working classes? Is there any one here who will believe that it is possible for such high officials as my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, and my Honourable friend, Mr. Chatterjee, by simply going to a mine, to learn the habits, the sentiments and the feelings of the working classes? Sir, I do not myself believe it and I do not think there will be any one here who will believe that by their going there they had learnt the habits, the feelings and the sentiments of the working classes. I therefore feel that I am not at a greater disadvantage than they are in this matter.

Then, there is another point of view from which Government is likely to take objection to my proposal and it is this. Yesterday, the Honourable Mr. Innes said that this proposal and any other proposal for limiting the daily hours of work will be impossible of supervision. Sir, I want to know from the Honourable Mr. Innes and those who support his view, if it is possible for the Inspectors of the Government to enforce the rule regulating the weekly hours of work, it is equally possible, nay, easier to enforce the daily hours of work and to see that the daily hours of work are properly observed. I want to know how any Inspector is going to see whether a man has worked 54 hours or more without finding out how much the man has worked during one day. If he has to find out the weekly hours of work, he has to find out the daily hours of work. Therefore, it is no more difficult for an Inspector to inspect mines for the sake of this rule, for the sake of the rule which I am proposing than if he could inspect the mine for the sake of the rule which the Government has already made. Therefore, there is no more difficulty from the point of view of supervision.

Sir, it was said that when I made these proposals I have not had the advantage of the advice of such experienced people as the Factory Inspectors, and especially the Chief Factory Inspector who has got great experience of this matter. It was said so last time. Sir, I again say that I am at a disadvantage. I have not got advisers who get salaries which the Chief Inspector of Mines gets, but it is quite possible for even a humble man like myself to get some adviser who knows the conditions in mines. But, Sir, I should like to know from the Government—I admit they have got the advantage of the advice of the Chief Factory Inspector, but whether they follow the advice of the Chief Factory Inspector, that is more important than having his advice at their hands. Sir, in order to tell the House how the Government of India follow the advice, the opinions of the Chief Factory Inspector, I propose to read one more passage from the latest report of the Chief Factory Inspector. I am sorry I have to read this passage from the "Times of India." (Mr. N. C. Sircar: "Inspector of Factories or Mines?") Mines. I am sorry that I committed that mistake and I am very glad that my Honourable friend has corrected me. I say, Sir, I have to read the passage from the "Times of India" as the Honourable the Home Member has refused to give us free copies of the reports of the different Departments. This is the passage:

"The practice of sleeping underground is only too common, although it is usually forbidden. The institution of regular shifts would discourage this and many managers would welcome a statutory regulation of hours of labour. They are at present deterred from regulating hours by the fact that miners would probably resent the enforcement of the regulations and leave their mines for other mines where such regulations were not in force. Were the hours of labour regulated, many difficulties in respect of supervision would disappear and the efficiency of inspection by officials would increase."

That is the opinion of the Chief Inspector of Mines, namely, were the hours of labour regulated, many difficulties in respect of supervision would disappear; not only will there not be greater difficulties of supervision, but the difficulties of supervision will disappear. That is the opinion of the Chief Inspector of Mines on this point. Sir, I want the House to see that when the Chief Inspector of Mines talks of the regulation of hours, he is talking not of the regulation of the weekly hours, but the regulation of the daily hours of work. This is clear from the fact that he is, at the beginning of the paragraph, mentioning the habit of sleeping underground. Moreover, not only does the Chief Inspector of Mines consider this practice desirable, but he says that many managers also consider this practice desirable. Therefore, the only difficulty in their way is that they fear that the miners may not like this regulation. It is true that the miners will not like the regulation. Nobody likes any control, nobody likes any regulation when first introduced. But, Sir, the Government has got experience of regulating the hours of work in other directions. They have regulated the hours of work of people who were not in the habit of having their hours of work regulated in the factories. People naturally would resent in the beginning, but I am sure the working classes would take to it if Government once introduced this regulation. The real difficulty in introducing this limit voluntarily is that when one mine introduces such a limit the mine owner is afraid he would lose his labour, and the labour might go to some other mines. Therefore, this regulation cannot be introduced voluntarily. It can only be introduced by legislation. That is the opinion of several managers of the mines. That is the opinion of the Chief Inspector of Mines. I hope, Sir, the Government will follow the advice of their Chief Inspector in this respect.

Lastly, I would only like to say one or two words to the Members of this Assembly. I have specially made the amendment so moderate, putting the daily hours of work at such a high figure as 11, because I want to make the principle of the regulation of daily hours of work recognised. If there is any Member here who can show any other way of getting the same principle recognised, I shall be only too glad to accept his suggestion. If there be any Member here who makes a proposal that the 11 hours of work should be increased but we shall recognise the principle of the limitation of the hours of work, I shall seriously consider that proposal. But what I want the House to do is that this principle of the regulation of daily hours of work should be recognised.

Sir, there is one point on which I should like to speak before I finish and it is this. Members of the House are likely to be told by Government that the Local Governments have not been consulted. I repeat my yesterday's argument. Local Governments must know that this point would be discussed if they had followed the discussion that took place in the Simla Session on the appointment of the Joint Committee. If the Local Governments and the mine owners have not considered that point, it is not my fault. The Members also may be told that as Government are opposed to this amendment Government may withdraw the Bill and there may be difficulties. The Bill may be at least postponed. Members need not entertain any fear on that score also. The Bill is going to come into operation at the end of July 1924, 18 months from to-day. So, if Government wants to introduce any modifications they like, they can do so. There will be no postponement of the Bill at all because the Bill will come into operation from July 1924, 18 months from to-day. There is no likelihood of any delay being caused by our accepting this amendment. I therefore hope that the Members of this Assembly by a majority will accept my amendment.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member):

Sir, I wish first to take up some points which Mr. Joshi has raised against me. He first admitted that he himself had never been to the coal fields and had never studied the conditions of life in the coal fields. He then asked what advantage Mr. Chatterjee and myself had gained from going to the coal fields and making inquiries there for ourselves. He pointed out that in the course of a visit or two one could not enter into the feelings of the labourers in the mines. Now Mr. Joshi has made one mistake. My friend, Mr. Chatterjee here has not only visited in his capacity as Secretary to the Government of India in the Industries Department many coal fields but he has spent many years of his life in those fields. He tells me that he lived there for many years as a child and therefore Mr. Chatterjee may claim real acquaintance not only with the conditions of life but also with the feelings of the labourers in the field and, as for myself, I possibly approach this coal problem from a point of view which is perhaps wider than that of Mr. Joshi. Mr. Joshi stands before this Assembly as the representative of a class. He asked this Assembly to consider class interest only. We on the Government Benches have to take other points of view into account. We have to consider the effect of any legislation which we may pass upon the country as a whole. I would ask the House to remember that this legislation which we are dealing with to-day affects in a very peculiar degree the most important industry in all India. Coal is the life blood of Indian industries. Any hasty legislation and any ill advised legislation which we may pass must have the most disastrous effect. It may send up the price of coal for every industry in India. It may even have the result that there will not be enough coal to go round and I hope, Sir, that the House will bear that fact in mind. I speak with some experience of this matter. For the last three years one of the most constant anxieties of the Government of India has been the coal position of India and I do hope that the siren voice of Mr. Joshi will not lead the House to adopt measures which will make an already difficult position much more difficult. Mr. Joshi then asked why it was that we did not adopt the advice of the Chief Inspector of Mines. He read an extract from the Chief Inspector's last Report. In that extract the Chief Inspector said that not only he but many mine managers in the fields were strongly in favour of a system of shifts. Sir, the Chief Inspector has been consulted in every line of this Bill. The Chief Inspector, as Mr. Joshi well knows, was present at the meetings of the Joint Committee and, Sir, I have assured myself that the Chief Inspector, however much he may be in favour of a system of shifts, is quite satisfied that it is impossible either to introduce a shift system at present or to impose a daily limit of hour. I have also satisfied myself by meeting many of the leading mine managers in the coal fields (and I say here and now that I have never met a more enlightened set of men), that these men are entirely in favour as we are all in favour, of a system of shifts if it can be introduced, but deprecate any immediate statutory imposition of that system of shifts. Then, Sir, as I said when this Bill was discussed last September, not very long ago we had a committee which inquired into the whole question of labour in the fields. That committee also referred to this question of introducing the system of shifts. They admitted that many mine managers in their evidence had said that what the coal fields really wanted was a system of shifts but they went on to say they were afraid that it was premature to introduce such a system by legislation and surely, Sir, when we appoint a representative committee of this kind we must attach weight to their words. As I said, I entirely agree that we could not confer a greater benefit upon the coal field than if we could assist mine managers to introduce a system of labour by shifts. But I deprecate attempting to do so before the time is ripe and I think the best way of dealing with that problem would be to deal with it in the same way as we have dealt with the equally difficult problem of women labour. That is when we address Local Governments in the terms of the Joint Committee's Report on the question whether a time limit could not be given for the employment of women in the fields we might at the same time consult them as to the possibility of setting a time limit by which a statutory system of shifts should be introduced throughout the fields. That I think will be the wisest and the best way of dealing with that problem. I am not in favour at this time of imposing a statutory limit of hours. I think, Sir, no one can accuse us of being reactionary in this Bill. We have made in the Bill some very real advances. We have for the first time prohibited the employment of children down mines. We propose, if the House will agree, to prohibit even the presence of children in the mines and that will inevitably reduce the number of women who go down those mines. That will reduce the labour population in the mines and this House has got to remember that the real difficulty which confronts every coal manager in India is the difficulty of getting sufficient labour. I say, that those measures are sufficient for the present and I am not in favour of going further and at this moment imposing a daily limit of hours. We have imposed a weekly limit of hours. Mr. Joshi asks what is the difference between a weekly limit and a daily limit. He says:

"If you are prepared to enforce a weekly limit, why can you not equally enforce a daily limit."

Then he went on to say that the reason that he wanted a daily limit was that he merely wished to enforce a principle. Now, Sir, that is the very reason why we have begun by imposing a weekly limit. We want to enforce a principle, but I do not say and I have never claimed that that weekly limit is going to make any material difference to the amount of hours' work in the fields. To the best of my belief, miners do not work 54 hours a week below ground, but we think it important that in this Bill we should recognize the principle of a weekly limit of hours. I may say here now that I would not have included that provision in the Bill had I thought that the enforcement of the provision would disorganize labour and the miners and would involve many prosecutions of mine managers for infringement of the rule. But it is different with the daily limit. Mr. Joshi, as he said, wishes to impose a daily limit merely to recognize the principle. My fear is that if you impose a daily limit, it will not be possible at all to enforce it without a very large increase in the inspecting staff, and even if we did make that increase in the inspecting staff, and did try to enforce the limit, it would mean numerous prosecutions and disorganization of the whole of the coal field labour. We have got to consider what the conditions of labour on these fields are. The men do not go down at any stated time of the day, they do not come out at any stated time of the day. They are not paid by time, they are paid by results. Labour in the fields is a labour under small raising contractors. The labourers go down when they like. They cut coal, they put it into the tubs, and they are paid so much per tub. How, therefore, are we going to enforce a daily limit? As I have said, the whole of the labour does not go down at the same time and does not come up at the same time. The only way of enforcing a daily limit of hours would be to have an inspector in each mine for that inspector to check for each man down in the mine precisely at what time he went down in the mine and whether he had exceeded the daily limit. We have been advised by the Chief Inspector, we have been advised by every mine manager, that it is impossible to do that,—that the only way we can enforce this method would be to impose a shift system and I have already given reasons why we wish to take the reform slowly.

Then I wish to point out to this House that it is not a question of men working 11 hours a day for 6 days in the week. Many of these miners, especially in the Raneeunge coalfields, are agriculturists; they come in, it may be, 6, 8, or 10 miles to the mines. They live in their villages and work in their fields. But they come into the coalfields, they go into the mines, they cut as much coal as they think necessary, they rest, possibly sleep, down the mine, and then they go back to their villages. They are not working 24 hours at a time; they are not working all the time, for half the time they are sleeping; and when they go back to their fields, they have cut 6 or 7 tubs of coal in order to supplement their earnings in the fields. The House has got to remember that this is not a question of miners working day after day 11 hours a day. It is a question of agriculturists coming in and spending two or three days at the outside, sometimes only 24 hours, in a mine, working as it suits them,—possibly sleeping down the mine and then going back to their fields. Mr. Joshi says that they sleep down the mines because houses are not provided for them. He has accused the coal miners of not providing sufficient house accommodation. That charge, to the best of my belief, is entirely inaccurate. Houses,—bustees—are provided by every coal miner at every mine. But people who come in, who live 5, 6 and 7 miles away, they do not want houses; if they sleep in the mine, it is because it suits them and their convenience to do so. Now, Sir, I think I have met most of the points which have been brought against us by Mr. Joshi. I wish this House to remember that this is a very important question. I wish this House to remember that Government have put forward a Bill which goes as far as they are prepared to go. We may be accused, and when we come to clause 25 we shall be accused, of having gone too far, but I shall ask this House not to be in a hurry, not to run the risk of disorganizing a very important industry merely in order, as Mr. Joshi says, to enforce a principle, to enforce the principle of a daily limit of hours. I have said that I am quite prepared to consult Local Governments whether we could not fix a time limit within which a system of shifts should be introduced in the coal fields; and I think the House will agree that that is the right way to advance in the direction in which we all wish to go.

Mr. N. C. Sircar: Sir, Mr. Joshi has said that the miners sleep down below because of want of house accommodation. I invite Mr. Joshi to go to the coal mines and see if there are not houses for them. There are houses, and the houses are now being regulated by the Mines Board of Health,—and in a few days the miners will get as good houses as many of us would like to live in. There are houses in the collieries in which the permanent labour lives,—and there are also houses in the collieries, which are purposely meant for sojourners who come and work for certain hours and go back. I must tell my friend, Mr. Joshi, that when he says there is a want of houses, that we do not provide houses for labourers, that he must be labouring under a mistake. Mr. Joshi has said that I said yesterday that the miners work for two or three days in the week. I never said so, that is a wrong statement. Then my friend says about the habits of the people. I invite him to go to the coal mines and see what sort of labour we have to deal with. We have 101 castes of labour, and everyone in the House can imagine how difficult it is to change the habits of so many castes and creeds, especially illiterate as they are. Then my friend says about 11 hours' work. I welcome if the labourers will work 11 hours, but as a matter of fact they do not.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Then why do you oppose?

Mr. N. C. Sircar: I am coming to the point. As a matter of fact I shall be too pleased if the underground labourer would work for only 8 hours, but as my friend, Mr. Mukherjee, pointed out yesterday, 54 hours, that is 9 hours a day, have been the utmost limit. But as a matter of fact we do not get more than 48 hours' work. Then about the 11 hours I was going to say that as my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, has said, no daily working hours can be fixed until the shift system can be introduced, and it is impossible at the present moment unless and until we are a bit independent of the labour by electrifying our coal mines and introducing electric coal cutters. Some of the miners are resident of villages 5 or 6 miles away from the collieries. As has been pointed out by my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, they are also agriculturists. They work in their fields in the morning and go down the mines in the afternoon and work up to such time as they please; some times they sleep underground and some times come to the surface to sleep and go down again about 2 o'clock in the morning, work till sunrise and then go home, after which they are 24 hours off. So, unless and until we are independent of this class of labour, and unless and until we can introduce the shift system, I cannot see how it is possible to introduce a daily system of 11 hours; and if the Legislature attempts to introduce such a system we shall, I am afraid, lose a good deal of our underground labour. The House knows what difficulty we were put to in 1921, having to buy ten lakhs of tons of coal from foreign countries at a cost of about two crores of rupees over and above what we would have paid in this country for same. With these remarks, Sir, I oppose the introduction of an 11 hours' working day.

Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal (Jullundur Division: Non-Muhamadan): Sir, the object of limiting the number of working hours in a week to 60 and 54 provided by clauses (b) and (c) is to protect the health and eventually the life of the labourer. But will that provision alone have the desired effect if a greedy labourer works 18 hours daily for three days consecutively and takes three days holiday consecutively? It may be admitted without much argument that 18 hours work a day continuously may do much more injury to the labourer's health than 9 hours daily work for six days. Therefore it is more necessary to limit the hours of work a day than the number of hours in a week. Without limiting the number of hours work in a day, the limiting of the hours in a week is of no avail. The labourer may become a total invalid after 18 hours work in a day or after 54 hours in three days. Unless such daily work is limited, the provisions of clauses (b) and (c) may also be evaded easily by the labourer working three days under one mine owner and three days under another mine owner without being detected. Neither mine owner will know the hours he has worked with the other. I consider that even 11 hours work in a day is excessive. The labourer requires at least two hours off for preparing his food; that makes 13 hours, which means the whole day continuous work during summer and more than the day continuous work during winter. Thus 11 hours daily work is too much, but as the amendment comes from Mr. Joshi who represents labour, I am bound to support it.

Mr. B. Venkafapatiraju (Ganjam cum Vizagapatam: Non-Muhamadan Rural). Sir, I am really surprised at the change in the attitude of the Government of India, during the last decade about the limitation of working hours. It is easy for the Honourable Mr. Innes with his persuasive eloquence to convince everybody that the key industry, coal mining, would be ruined unless we sacrifice human beings for that purpose. When the attempt was made for the limitation of working hours, in introducing changes in the Factory Act in the year 1905, the Government of India were unable to pass the Bill, or perhaps they were unwilling to pass it. At any rate the Bill was not passed. But subsequently, in spite of the advice of the Factory Commission to the effect that no such limitation should be made—their advice being:

"We are strongly opposed to any direct limitation of adult working hours, because we consider that there is no necessity for the adoption of this drastic course, because we are convinced that it would cause the greatest inconvenience to existing industries, most of which have never worked long hours, and because we think that such a measure would seriously hamper the growth of industrial enterprise."

That is what the Commission said, and most of the members who represented the Bombay cotton mills strongly opposed the limitation of working hours of the operatives in their factories. But in spite of that, Sir, the then Government were more influenced by the humanitarian point of view than the industrial point of view. On the advice of the late Mr. Harvey, the Government of India said, they "were unable to accept the recommendation of the Factory Commission that an indirect method should be adopted for obtaining a limit to the working hours of factories." After throwing out the recommendation of the Commission, in the Act XII of 1911, it was enacted that "no woman shall be employed in any factory for more than eleven hours in any one day. No child shall be employed in any textile factory for more than six hours in any one day. And no person shall be employed in any textile factory for more than twelve hours in any one day." Have we not then proceeded any further since the year 1911? Mr. Joshi has asked for the enunciation of a principle admitting the utility and the necessity of restricting hours of labour. We have it already in the Factory Act. It is bad enough that women are allowed to work in mines; it is bad enough that they are allowed to sleep underground; but now Government says that the industry would be ruined if we do not sacrifice these men and permit them to be employed for over 11 hours a day. Of course it is easy to see that it would not be their policy to overwork them; but these are people whose interests ought to be protected by others who know better. It is opposed to human nature for any person to work above or below ground for more than 11 hours a day.

[Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju.]

Is it not therefore the business of the Government in introducing such a Bill to limit the hours of work to even eleven hours a day? I therefore strongly support the Honourable Mr. Joshi's amendment and I hope the House will unanimously agree to that small modicum of mercy meted out to these unfortunate people in order to improve their condition.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I believe the quotation which my friend, Mr. Raju, gave the House is likely to mislead the House, as quotations very often do. The quotation had reference only to factory labour, which is much more organized, where the hours of work are under the control both of the Manager and probably of Government. With regard to mine labour, the whole question, as the Honourable Mr. Innes has told us, is working and cutting the coal by results. That is the most differentiating factor between the two.

12 Noon. The workman in the mines works voluntarily for certain hours just as it suits him to produce a particular quantity of coal in a particular quantity of time by piece work. I have no practical experience, I must admit, of mines, but if it is pardonable to give my practical experience of stone quarries, in which matter I think I have some experience (as I own lime stone quarries of a considerable extent which furnish the stone to a large province, and have had experience extending over some years), I think it would be pardonable if I give my own experience regarding the habits of the people and what they themselves like. Now, I have seen a large number of workmen preferring of their own will and accord to come for work, especially during the hot summer months, not according to the regulated hours but even so early in the morning as 4 o'clock, because it is cool, and go on working from 4 o'clock in the morning say till 12 or 1 or 2 o'clock, as long as they like; not that they work continuously during that time, but they work, for instance say for one hour, then take rest, then continue to work for two hours, again take rest, then continue to work for another hour and then take rest until they earn enough for the day. Now, when I tried to induce them to give up that habit and to regulate the hours both in their interests, in the interests of their health and in our interest for the sake of supervision, I believe they did not like it. Now, I recognise, as my friend, Mr. Joshi, says, that there should be a daily limit introduced sooner or later. In the abstract I do know that that will be to the interest of the workman and to the interest of the industry. But as the Honourable Mr. Innes has rightly pointed out, we are now passing legislation which is of a transitional character and while on the one hand we must not be carried away by purely academic considerations, on the other hand we must also see that in our enthusiasm for regulating labour we do not throttle industries which are for the benefit of the community at large. I therefore think that those of us who have the interests both of the industry and of the labour at heart should not support Mr. Joshi's amendment, howsoever good it may be in the abstract. Mr. Joshi brings to bear upon his discussions, no doubt, a close study of the question of the labour problem, but a study more or less from the academic point of view. I do wish really that he should add to his study a practical experiment, actual experience of handling workmen, even half a dozen workmen for half a dozen weeks, so that he may really see their mentality, what they themselves like and what is to their own real interest and convenience. Looking at it from this point of view, therefore, and the transitional character of this problem on the whole I think it would not be practicable at this particular stage to introduce a daily time limit.

Munshi Iswar Saran (Cities of the United Provinces: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I do not own a mine, nor have I ever had the privilege of working in a mine, either underground or above-ground. As the House is aware, I do not represent, as my friend, Mr. Joshi, is supposed to represent, the working classes, but at the same time I wish to say that I do not feel greatly interested in the mine owners either. My object is to see what is really in the interest of the country as a whole. Before I proceed, Sir, I wish to express my wholehearted agreement with the Honourable Mr. Innes in his statement that there are some very progressive changes introduced into the Bill which Government has placed before us. Mr. Innes has taken Mr. Joshi very politely and very kindly to task, because he has had no experience of mines. If I am not very much mistaken it was John Bright who once speaking in the House of Commons said that on one occasion he had ventured to express some opinion about America without having ever visited that country and he was at once met by people like Mr. Innes who said 'Oh, you have not been to America; how dare you express an opinion about it.' But it so happened that subsequently John Bright's opinion was found to be correct and the opinions of all those who had been to America not once but twice or thrice proved to be wrong. Mr. Innes has been to these mines and Mr. Chatterjee,—whose ability and whose eminence I gladly acknowledge—as a child has lived round about the mines and has therefore come into touch with the mine owners. (A Voice: "Mine workers.") Mine workers, yes, that is still worse. Mr. Chatterjee, as I have said, is one of those distinguished Indians of whom we are proud; but if Mr. Innes' description of Mr. Chatterjee is correct, Mr. Chatterjee must have been a very precocious and abnormal child. Mr. Bray says he was; most certainly.
 Sir, we are told, to use Mr. Innes' words, that coal is the life-blood of our industry. Is it therefore necessary that the life-blood of human beings should be sacrificed in order that the life-blood of our industry should be kept up?
 We are told that Mr. Joshi's proposal is premature, that it will lead to numerous prosecutions and it will lead to the disorganization of labour.
 All that may be true and I am not in a position to contradict these statements because I have no intimate knowledge of the working of these mines.
 But looking at the question perhaps from a point of view of more or less detachment, I wish to ask, Sir, the House to consider in all seriousness whether we shall allow these people to work for more than eleven hours a day. Is it in the interest of their health, is it in the interest of the well-being of that class, which, unfortunately, is to work underground? My friend, Mr. Sircar, says that he will be delighted if these people work for 8 hours. Where, then, I ask, is the difficulty? Why not then introduce a rule that no labourer will be allowed to work for more than eleven hours a day? It is said that this question is academic and so on. Sir, this word academic is a very vague word. I think this question is intensely practical, it is intensely human. I am addressing you as an Indian not in any special manner interested either in the workers or the owners but as one interested in the well-being of the country as a whole. Call me a visionary or whatever else you will. Strong words do not break any bones. I say industry or no industry these people should not be allowed to work for more than eleven hours and if they are willing to work for more than 11 hours as indeed many of them may be, they have to be saved against themselves. This is the need for this legislation. It is said that you must think of your industry; most certainly.
 There is no enlightened Indian who is not anxious that industries should make progress in India. But, Sir, the industry exists for the people and the people do not exist for the industry. These are the considerations, Sir, why I think that the House should accept Mr. Joshi's amendment.

Mr. Joshi in his anxiety made one unfortunate remark, and it is this. He said 'I do not mind even if you make it 12 hours provided I am able to enforce this principle.' I entirely dissent from that view. I do not care, Sir, in the least whether this principle or that principle is enforced or accepted. What I am most anxious about is that human beings should not be treated as beasts or at any rate, they should not be allowed even if they so choose to work as beasts.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee (Education Member): Sir, after the perfervid oratory of my Honourable friend, Munshi Iswar Saran, I feel a certain amount of diffidence in addressing the House. I am in entire agreement with the oracular sentiments that he has placed before the House. I entirely agree that we should look at this question in the interests of the country as a whole. I also agree, Sir,—and I believe I have mentioned this before in this House—that industries exist for the people and the people do not exist for industries. But, Sir, unfortunately my Honourable friend has completely lost sight of, or perhaps he had never any knowledge of, the actual conditions of the people in those parts of the country where mostly mines are to be found. Therefore, Sir, in his love or admiration for abstract principles he has forgotten the actual application of those principles. It is on behalf of the miners themselves, Sir, that I would resist the amendment proposed by my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi. I do not remember whether Mr. Sircar had explained that there were really two classes of workers in these mines. There are a number of wholtime workers, people who come from distant districts and provinces, but a very large proportion of the workers are recruited from the neighbouring villages. When I say neighbouring villages, I mean villages within a radius of about 10 miles of the mine. My friend, Mr. Joshi, tried to make capital of the fact that the owners of the mines did not provide dwellings for these workers and therefore they had to come all this long distance. Mr. Sircar has stated that there are enough dwellings. Personally, Sir, I should be extremely sorry to see all those villagers congregated round the mines, for in that case their conditions will become almost as miserable as of those workers who live in chauls in Bombay and Ahmedabad. I would much rather, Sir, that the present system did continue and these people lived comfortably and happily in their homes and came to the mines to add to their livelihood and went back to their homes getting a little bit of the sun and a little bit of the rain of Bengal as well. It is really in order to protect this class of workers from hardship and suffering that Government decided not to introduce at once the principle of a daily limit of work. If that principle is introduced, this class of workers will be entirely deprived of work in the mines. As Mr. Sircar has already explained, they work in the villages on their own fields or on the fields of their neighbours. They come to the mines, walk these 10 miles, arrive at the mines, work for two, three or four days and go back to their villages. They do not want all this regulation of 11 hours inside the mine and then a number of hours outside on the surface to be spent in those wretched douras that exist all round the mines. These douras are much better, I admit, than the chauls of Bombay; they may be better even than the quarters provided for labourers in jute mills, but certainly they are not as comfortable or as private as their own homes. They want to go back to their homes; why should you deprive them of those facilities? It is all very well to say that no man should work for more than 11 hours a day. I would certainly endorse that principle if a man is going to work 11 hours a day every day for six days in the week and for 365 days in the year. But when a man works only for two or three days and then takes complete rest, if he works even more than 11 hours a day, I do not think it really hurts his health. I am as anxious to see our workers healthy and comfortable as Mr. Joshi, but I think that he drives what he calls his principles too hard indeed. As a matter of fact, the miners do not work 11 hours a day at a stretch. As Mr. Sircar has explained, they go down the mine, they do a certain amount of work, and then rest and come up for food and drink. In these circumstances, it would be absolutely impossible at the present moment to bind them to a definite shift system; it would be extremely hard on these miners themselves, and I beg the House not to accept this amendment in the interests of the miners themselves.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"That to clause 23 the following sub-clause be added:

"(d) for more than 11 hours in a day."

The question is that that amendment be made.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Sir, I beg to move the following amendment:

"That to clause 23 the following sub-clause be added:

'(e) for more than six hours continuously without a period of an hour for meals.'"

Sir, this is again a proposal for limiting the hours of work to some extent, and allowing a period for rest and for meals. Sir, it may be said that this is again a proposal for disturbing the coal industry or throttling the coal industry. Sir, this argument of danger to industry has always been brought forward not only on this occasion—but on all occasions when there have been proposals for limiting the hours of work. Was not the same argument of the industry being in danger brought forward when the hours of work in factories were limited? I do not see that there is any danger to the coal industry simply because we try by Statute to give an hour for meals for the workmen. As a matter of fact, I have mentioned before that in India there is no dearth of cheap labour. We have enough labour and more than we want and we send out our labour. It is these very provinces of Bihar and the United Provinces that send men to distant parts, it is these very provinces that send men to Fiji and British Guiana thousands of miles away from their homes. Therefore, if any people say that the coal industry will be ruined by not getting sufficient labour, they are simply deceiving the whole world.

Sir, my friend, Mr. Chatterjee, said these people belong to the villages and he does not want villages to be broken up. He has my sympathies. I do not want the villages to be broken up. It is for that reason that I wanted limited hours of work. As a matter of fact, it is the growth of these industries that has broken up these villages and not any proposals which I have been making. Then, Sir, it was said that, when I make these proposals, I only look to the interests of labour. Sir, I deny that charge. I do not interpret my duty in that narrow spirit. Whenever I have advocated any proposals for the amelioration of labour, I have advocated it because I thought it was in the interest of the country as a whole.

Mr. President: I cannot allow the Honourable Member to revive a discussion which we have just had for an hour and a half on the other amendment. He must adhere strictly to the proposal that no one shall work for more than six hours continuously without a period for meals: from the point of view of the Chair the important word in that amendment is "meals."

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I bow to your decision, Sir. Sir, the proposal is that people working in mines should not be allowed to work continuously for more than six hours without our giving them an hour for meals in the interval. As the House has accepted that these people may go on working up to 18 hours a day, I hope the House will have some mercy upon these people and give them an hour for meals. Sir, Members of this House are very kind-hearted. It has been said that the employers who are represented here in large numbers are very kind-hearted. Sir, shall I be straining their quality of mercy too much if I ask them to give an hour to these people for their meals? I hope, therefore, that these people in the kindness of their hearts will accept my amendment.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I cannot think that my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi, means this amendment to be treated very seriously. I think, Sir, that his object in moving the amendment was to do what you did not allow him to do, namely, to get in his reply to the speeches on the last amendment. I would point out to the House that it has just rejected the principle of the daily limit of hours and that being so, what is the necessity or the use of trying to impose a rest period for meals? Let me point out to the House, as I have pointed out before, that there are no fixed hours for these miners. They come when they like, they are paid by the results, and they break off when they like. If they want a rest period for meals or for any other purpose, they can have it at any time they please. That being so, there is no reason at all for this House to impose a statutory obligation that a rest period should be given.

The motion was negatived.

Clauses 23, 24 and 25 were added to the Bill.

Mr. B. N. Misra (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, clause 26 runs as follows:

"No child shall be employed in a mine, or be allowed to be present in any part of a mine which is below ground."

My amendment is:

"To omit the words 'be employed in a mine, or'."

This will mean that a child can be employed above ground in the mining work. "No child shall be employed in a mine." Here "mine" must mean above ground as well as under ground. The other part of the clause is "or be allowed to be present in any part of a mine which is below ground." The phrase "which is below ground" qualifies only "or be allowed to be present in any part of a mine." If the construction of the clause is that no child shall be employed or shall be allowed to be present in any part of a mine which is below ground, I have no objection. But my point is that a child should be allowed to work above ground. The construction of this clause as it is, is that no child shall be employed in a mine. I submit it is rather injurious to the labouring class. My proposal is that the words "be employed in a mine" should be omitted from this clause. This will give an advantage. We have defined a "child" to be one under the age of 13. We are aware that these labourers always have children and the children always assist their parents in their work. The Honourable Mr. Innes has already said, and we all very well know, that it is the poor agriculturist class that comes for this labour, and we know that in poor agriculturist families, the children always help their parents in their work. If they have children of 6, 7, 8 or 12 or 13 years of age, they help their parents in the fields. They accompany them to the fields and help them there. They may not go under ground, but they can work above ground and help their parents similarly. They can carry the baskets of coal. They can do some minor work which is not very hard, they can earn some money in that way. Children of poor labourers very often never see schools. We, rich people, who send our children to schools cannot expect these labourers to send their children to any boarding schools or even to any primary schools. They always work jointly with their parents. If we keep them from labouring even above ground or doing some work near about the mine, it will mean not only loss of their earning to the family, but it will also mean that the parents will have to provide for their children and maintain them. Not only that. The children will ruin their own career, because they are not accustomed to go to school, they naturally waste their time in playing, they will not be of any use in future to themselves or to the family. They won't get used to work. In England even a cobbler's son or a shoe-maker's son can become a Prime Minister, and any poor man or a man of the labouring class can occupy very high positions. That is not so with Indian labourers. You cannot expect from this poor labouring class to get men who will get so much educated or who will rise so much above their class that they can occupy any high position in life. Generally these people continue to be labourers. We know very well how our caste system is working and we know that in India a peasant is always a peasant, a Brahman is always a Brahman, a blacksmith is always a blacksmith.

Mr. President: Order, order. Caste has nothing to do with employment of children in mines.

Mr. B. N. Misra: I am simply showing the analogy. The labourers who work in a mine cannot suddenly turn so rich and earn so much money that they can afford to send their children to schools. If the words, I propose, are omitted, the children will be given an opportunity of working near about the mine and they will earn a livelihood, and will help their parents and also learn how to work so that when they grow up, they can work in the mines or even elsewhere. In these circumstances, I submit that this Honourable House will accept the amendment. If my amendment is accepted, the objection on the part of the mine owners that they will lose labour and the industry will be ruined for want of labour will not hold good and the people will be allowed to work as much as they can above ground. With these words, Sir, I move my amendment, which runs as follows:

"In clause 26, the words 'be employed in a mine, or' be omitted."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, I beg to move that:

"In clause 26, omit all words commencing from 'or be allowed' to 'ground'."

The effect of my amendment will be, Sir, that the prohibition about the presence of children in the mines will go away. The clause as it stands in the Bill provides not only that the children be not employed in the mine but it also provides that they should not be present or allowed to be present in any part of the mine which is under ground. Sir, I subscribe to the principle that children should not be made to work in the mine. I also subscribe to the principle that they should not be allowed to be present under ground in the mine. But, Sir, if we look to the consequences, we find that this will lead to much obstruction in the working of the mines. This will result in driving away the women from the work. I do realise that the Government have expressed their intention and desire and they have adopted it as their principle that women should not be employed in the mines. But looking to the practical side of the thing I cannot say how far that will be desirable,—I mean industrially, and not from the humanitarian point of view or from the point of view of health. Work in a mine, Sir, is generally on a family system.

Where a man is required to cut coal, the woman is required to carry and take it away. In some places and on some occasions, if a man has not got his wife, he has to employ other women to do the work,—to carry away the coal cut by him. Sir, those who are acquainted with the system of work that prevails in the part of the country from which these labourers are imported, one will find that most of the work is left to the women and less to the men. (A Voice: "Shame.") It may be a matter of shame, but it has been done for ages and continues to be done in that way. The Honourable Mr. Chatterjee will be surprised to hear that in certain backward parts of certain provinces women give birth to a child and immediately after that, take away the child and walk for miles together. That will show how hardy those women are. My object is this, that we should not encourage the employment of women in mines so far as possible, but if you were to stop it for some years before the public opinion amongst those people has developed, the result would be there will be a shortage of labour in the mines and other industrial centres. A man would not like to go away leaving his family at home, because probably the wages may not be attractive for him, and if we make the wages attractive, that will injure the industries a great deal. Therefore, it will be necessary to employ women in the mines and I suggest that it will be much better and more desirable that this provision making it penal for children to be in the mines be deleted. With these words I commend my amendment to the House.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The effect of Mr. Agnihotri's amendment, if it is accepted, will be that there will be no prohibition against a child being taken down a mine as long as he is not employed underground. Now, Sir, quite deliberately the Government have included in the Bill this clause. Quite deliberately, we have decided that the Bill should take a step towards the prohibition of the employment of women below ground in mines. Quite deliberately, we have arrived at the conclusion that it is not right that small children, very small children should be taken down by their mothers into the mines and left in the mines when their mothers are working there.

This question of the employment of women in mines has a very old history. As far back as the nineties, we were warned by the Secretary of State that it would be wise in the infancy of coal mining to prohibit at once the employment of women in mines. Unfortunately, we did not take the step then. The Secretary of State warned us that the longer we delayed that step the more difficult it would become, and that is exactly the position that we are now in. There are 250,000 miners in India and not less than 80,000 are women. There are 170,000 miners on an average on the coal mines and 50,000 are women. I do not agree with what Mr. Joshi said yesterday that it will be an easy matter to replace those women. On the contrary, it will be a difficult matter, but I do hold that sooner or later, we have to face this problem of the employment of women in coal mines. As the Joint Committee has recommended, we shall take up with the Local Governments the idea of enforcing prohibition within a specified time. In the meantime, we propose to take this small step. We propose not to allow small babies or children to be taken down mines. We quite recognise that the result may be that some women will not go down the mines at all, and there may be a diminution in women labour; but at the same time, after full consideration with the Chief Inspector of mines, with mine managers in the coal fields, and finally in the Joint Committee we have decided that it is right to face that risk and to take this step, and this being so, I hope that the House will not accept the amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 26 do stand part of the Bill.

Mr. N. O. Sircar: I have got an amendment as regards clause 26, that is, to delete the clause.

Mr. President: Does the Honourable Member want to speak on it?

Mr. N. O. Sircar: Yes. I rise to speak but I am not a speaker, and I do not know if my speech will influence the Honourable Members to come to my side and vote for me—the Honourable Mr. Innes, the Member for Commerce, being on the one side, and Mr. Joshi, who represents the Labour Party on the other side to oppose me. Yet I must speak, because I owe an obligation to the Indian Mining Federation of which I am the unworthy President, and which Federation represents 40 per cent. of the Indian coal mining interests and 300 members, quite a big army to fight the Honourable Member for Commerce in order to exact their dues. Sir, I was associated with the Joint Select Committee appointed to consider this Bill and I did my duty with what you know is the give and take system, but in one particular point, I could not agree with the Committee Members and I was obliged to sound a note of dissent, and the point where I could not agree with them is clause 26 coupled with sub-clause (1) of clause 46, which indirectly contemplate dealing a death-blow to the coal industry and I am going to explain how. The object in view of prohibiting children from going down the mines is, indeed, a laudable one and I am at one with my Labour friends that this should be done, but not at once. The idea underlying this proposal, as has just been explained by the Honourable Mr. Innes, is what we are afraid of. It indirectly contemplates prohibiting female labour from going down the mines, as has already been apprehended, and justly apprehended by the Honourable Member for Commerce. Sir, it is the practice in the coal mines that women when they go down the mines, take their little babies underground, they keep them covered with their clothes in a basket and they go to work with their husbands, and the women thus have an opportunity of watching them there and taking care of them instead of leaving them on the surface with nobody to take care of them. I do not object to the prohibition of the employment and presence of children in the mines who are between the ages of 8 and 13, but what I object to is the prohibition of the presence of infant children in the mines, my reason being that the mothers can take care of the children. It is reported by the Joint Committee and it has been just said by the Honourable Mr. Innes that there are ninety thousand women working in the coal mines of which a fair estimate can be made that about 60,000 work below the mines and then again of these 60,000, a large number must be mothers and if they are prevented from taking their infant children down the mines it will mean that these women may not go down the mines and we will lose a very large quantity of output. A further danger is that these women work in the mines as partners to their husbands. The husband cuts the coal and the wife carries the coal and fills the basket. She is practically the partner of the husband in working in the mines. If the woman is thus deprived of taking her infant child down the mine, the woman would not go down and most likely the husband would not go down also. He will say "Why should I go and work alone below. I would rather take some work on the surface where I can work with my wife and earn a better wage." Now, Sir, what would be the consequence? We will be losing a large quantity of labour of women and most possibly of men also. The output will go down very very considerably. It must be vivid in the mind of everybody what was the consequence in 1921 of a short output. The Government had to buy about 10 lakhs of tons of coal from foreign countries and at a price Rs. 20 above that which was obtaining here then. It meant a loss of about 2 crores of rupees to the country. As I have said, I do not object to the principle of prohibiting children from going down. There is in the Committee's report that Government is contemplating the prohibition of women from going down the mines and it is in the contemplation of the Committee to recommend a period of five years after which that prohibition is to come into force. As I say I do not object to the principle. I am at one with the Honourable Mr. Innes and I am at one with the Honourable Mr. Joshi. What I want in the interests of the coal trade is that time must be given to adapt the collieries to the change, so that the output may not considerably go down. With these remarks I propose that clause 26 be deleted.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: My Honourable friend Mr. Sircar began by making an appeal ad misericordiam that he was not a speaker. We have all heard his speech and I think that we can assure him that he was unduly diffident about his powers. The trouble about Mr. Sircar's amendment here is that it goes a great deal further than he intended. He wishes to take clause 26 entirely out of the Bill and merely to reserve power to the Government of India to restrict or prohibit the employment of children in mines by the rule making power. That is to say, the Honourable Member wishes to place us in exactly the same position as we are in the existing Bill. That is to say, he wishes to remove all our proposed restrictions on the employment of children. We are bound by the Washington Conference not to allow children to be employed in mines, even as we are bound not to allow them to be employed in factories. That is one reason why I say that the Honourable Member's amendment goes too far. But, Sir, he has explained that he entirely agrees in principle that we should take this step sooner or later towards the prohibition of the employment of women. All he asks for is a little longer time. We discussed this point very carefully in the Joint Committee and eventually we came to the conclusion that if we provided that this Bill should come into force in July 1924 we should give the mining industry sufficient notice. It must be remembered that one-half of the mining industry has accepted this clause without any complaint at all. It must also be remembered that in many mines in the coal fields even now small children are not now allowed to be taken down. I have just been reading a report on labour in the coal fields and in that report it is said that where the entrance to a mine is by shaft even now children are prohibited from being taken down that mine. All we propose to do is to extend that prohibition to all mines, whether they are approached by inclines or whether they are entered by means of shafts. I think, Sir, that the House will agree with me that we must take this step and that 18 months is long enough notice to the mine owners interested, especially as half the mine owners have agreed to the clause.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 26 do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 27, as amended by the Joint Committee, do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 28, as amended by the Joint Committee, do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: I understand from the Honourable Member that the amendment he proposes to move to clause 29 is really consequential, including the proviso at the end.

Mr. N. C. Sircar: That has been already disposed of by my amendment to clause 26.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 29, as amended by the Joint Committee, do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 30, as amended by the Joint Committee, do stand part of the Bill.

Mr. President: The question is that clauses 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39 and 40, as amended by the Joint Committee, do stand part of the Bill.

Mr. President: The question is that clauses 41, 42 and 43, as amended by the Joint Committee, do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clauses 44 and 45, as amended by the Joint Committee, do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Clause 46. Mr. Sircar.

Mr. N. C. Sircar: Sir, it is consequential on clause 26 and since my amendment to clause 26 was lost, I do not want to move this.

Clauses 46 to 50 were added to the Bill.

The Schedule was added to the Bill.

The Title and the Preamble were added to the Bill.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I move, Sir, that the Bill, as amended, be passed.

Mr. President: The question is that the Indian Mines Bill, as amended, be passed.

The motion was adopted.

THE CANTONMENTS (HOUSE-ACCOMMODATION) BILL.

Mr. E. Burdon (Army Secretary): Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill further to amend the Cantonments (House-Accommodation) Act, 1902, be taken into consideration."

This Bill was introduced in the Assembly last March, and last September it was referred to a Joint Select Committee of the two Houses. I think I may safely say that the principles which the Bill embodies have from the first met with the general approval of this House, and I need not therefore at this stage detain Honourable Members with a further exposition of what those principles are. The Select Committee have effected a number of amendments in the Bill, chiefly in respect of the procedure and practice which are to be followed in applying its provisions and these are fully set forth in the Report which was presented to the House on the 15th January. I should like, however, to take this opportunity of thanking the Members of the Select Committee for the trouble they have taken in dealing with the Bill and preparing their Report. Some of the points raised were not wholly free from contention and many of them were intricate. In spite therefore of the presence of the few amendments on the paper, I think I may venture to say that the results of the Committee's labours may be regarded as extremely satisfactory. Sir, I move that the Report be now taken into consideration.

Mr. President: The question is: .

"That the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill further to amend the Cantonments (House-Accommodation) Act, 1902, be taken into consideration."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Pyari Lal (Meerut Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, the amendment that I move is that in clause 1, sub-clause (3), the whole of the proviso be omitted.

Sir, it will be seen that section 3 of the Act limits the application of this law to only such houses in cantonments as are required by a military officer or may be required by a military officer, and with that object in view the framers of this law have decided to issue a notification, and before issuing the notification they have provided the procedure to be followed in this respect. But this proviso seems to nullify the provisions of clause 3. This proviso says that any notification issued under section 3 of the Cantonments (House-Accommodation) Act, 1902, that is, the present Act that we are considering, which is in force at the commencement of this Act shall be deemed to be a notification made under section 3 of this Act. Sir, the underlying idea is that there may be any number of houses in a cantonment, for instance there may be 800 houses in a cantonment but only 50 are required for the residence of military officers. The provisions of this Act should apply only to these 50 and not to the other 250, because, Sir, those who have house property in cantonments know it to their cost, that as long as a fear attaches to a house being at any time required or appropriated by military officers, it prevents the general public from going anywhere near it, they won't have it, and if they won't have it, who is to suffer?—The house owners; and therefore the Government have very wisely made this provision in section 3, that is to say, in future this Act shall only apply to such houses as are actually required; but what they give with one hand they want to take away with the other. Therefore if this proviso is allowed to stand what happens is that the notifications issued before this Act shall remain in force. If they remain in force, what is the good of clause 3? If they want to perpetuate the same mischief which they are going to remedy by clause 3, where is the use? Then, again, Sir, if you read sub-clause (3) of clause 1, you will find it says: 'It shall come into force on the 1st day of April, 1923, but it shall not become operative in any cantonment or part of a cantonment until the issue, or otherwise than in pursuance, of a notification as hereinafter provided by section 3,' which means that previous notifications which indiscriminately cover all the houses in a cantonment, those notifications shall be in force until the time when notifications under section 3 are issued. I say that this will meet the necessity of the case; but perhaps the cantonment authority might say, 'Oh, while those notifications are there, these houses are liable to be appropriated, but when you pass this Act and cancel all those notifications, what will happen to military people; they will be without any law to appropriate houses for them.' But this sub-clause (3) that I have read meets that case; that is to say, they will be allowed sufficient time to issue their notifications under section 3, clause 3, and until such time those notifications shall remain good. I can understand that, but to provide in the next clause, to put in this proviso, that those notifications shall remain good for all time to come, I say where is the use of clause 3? Sir, with that object I submit that this proviso should be deleted.

Mr. President: In clause 1 amendment moved:

"To omit the whole of the proviso at the end of sub-section (3)."

Mr. E. Burdon: Sir, if the amendment which my Honourable friend has proposed were to succeed, and the Bill with this amendment were to be passed into law, then I should like to explain that the result on the 1st of April next could only be one of two alternatives. The first is that there would be no House-Accommodation Act for cantonments at all, and the second would be that Local Governments would have re-enacted the notifications which were issued under the previous Act. There would be no other course open to us. I quite see the point which my Honourable friend has in mind. The suggestion is, I think, that as under this new Bill the Government will be the tenant of the houses in cantonments instead of individual military officers, and as the Government will take the houses which they lease for a considerable period—the period will be 5 years—therefore it will be possible to arrive at greater stability and greater certainty in regard to the number of houses which should be appropriated; that is to say, it should then become possible for Government to determine more or less, once and for all, how many houses they require to appropriate for the use of military officers, to apply the Act to those portions of the Cantonment in which these houses are situated, and thereafter to exempt from the operation of the Act the rest of the cantonment. I think it is quite possible that something of the kind may be done, but the House will realize that before the limitation which my Honourable friend desires can be put into practice it will be necessary for the local military authorities to assess in the light of the provisions of this Bill the number of houses they will require on an average, to find out those which are most suitably located, and thereafter to submit proposals to the Local Government probably after consultation with the military authorities at headquarters, defining as precisely as possible those portions of the Cantonment which should be set free from the operation of the Act. This is a process which will take time. I can give my Honourable friend an assurance that we shall endeavour to limit the application of the Act in the manner which he desires; but I do not think that it would be an appropriate way of seeking this end to omit the proviso. The proviso, I think the House will realize, is of a very ordinary character. It merely continues an arrangement which was necessary under the old Act until revised arrangements under the new Bill can be brought into force. There is one further point which I should like to mention. The existing Act may be declared to be operative in any Cantonment or part of a Cantonment; in the present Bill we repeat this provision. "The Local Government, with the previous sanction of the Governor General in Council, may by notification in the local official Gazette declare this Act to be operative in any Cantonment or part of a Cantonment situated in the province." The Bill therefore, in so far as this matter is concerned, does not introduce anything new. As a practical matter, stricter limitation may be possible and we shall endeavour to carry this out, but more as an executive matter. For the reasons which I have given I oppose the amendment.

Mr. President: The amendment moved is to omit the proviso at the end of clause 1 (3).

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 1, as amended by the Joint Committee, do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. E. Burdon: Sir, I beg to move the following amendment :

" (1) That clause 2 (1) (i) be omitted and the subsequent sub-clauses re-lettered.

(ii) That in clause 2 (2) for the words ' President of the Cantonment Committee ' the words ' Commanding Officer of the Cantonment ' be substituted."

The amendment is of a purely formal nature. The words " President of the Cantonment Committee " only occur in the passages of the Bill which I have quoted and in no other, and there is no purpose of substance which requires their being retained at all. Actually, the Commanding Officer of the Cantonment is in all cases President of the Cantonment Committee and he is referred to by the former designation in every other clause of the Bill under which functions are vested in him. In principle too, the amendment which I propose represents correctly the facts of the matter. In appropriating houses in Cantonments for military officers the Commanding Officer of the Cantonment acts in his capacity as such, as the representative of Government. He should not and cannot correctly be viewed as acting in his capacity as President of the Cantonment Committee. The matter is of no great practical importance at present but it will become important if, and when, Cantonment Committees acquire more of the character of a local self-government body. For these reasons the amendment which I now move is, I venture to submit, clearly desirable.

Mr. President: The amendment moved is :

" That clause 2 (1) (i) be omitted and the subsequent sub-clauses re-lettered."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The further amendment moved is:

"That in clause 2 (2) for the words 'President of the Cantonment Committee' the words 'Commanding Officer of the Cantonment' be substituted."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 2, as amended, do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 3, as amended by the Joint Committee, do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 4 do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clauses 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10, as amended by the Joint Committee, do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Pyari Lal: Sir, the amendment that I move is:

"That in clause 11, sub-clause (1), the figures and word '21 days' be substituted for the words 'four days'."

This particular sub-section of clause 11 states that when a house owner receives a notice that a certain house is required, the house owner shall vacate it within four days from the service of the notice. But under section 30 the owner who receives this notice is given the right of appeal against such a notice, and for that appeal he is allowed a period of 21 days. Section 30, sub-clause (2), says:

"No such appeal shall be admitted unless made within a period of twenty-one days from the service of the notice aforesaid."

Now, I submit, Sir, that if the house owner has to vacate his house within four days of the receipt of that notice, what use will an appeal be to him, because it is not likely after he has vacated the house and the military are in occupation that they will give it back to him. This provision therefore will cause a great deal of inconvenience and in fact it is directly opposed to the other provision allowing 21 days for an appeal.

Mr. E. Burdon: In the interests of the convenience of the House, may I say that I am quite prepared to accept this amendment.

Mr. President: The amendment is:

"That in clause 11, sub-clause (1), the figures and word '21 days' be substituted for the words 'four days'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

POSTPONEMENT OF GENERAL ELECTION IN KENYA.

Mr. J. Hullah (Revenue and Agriculture Secretary): With your permission, Sir, I should like to make an announcement, which I think will be of interest to the House in view of the numerous questions that were recently put to me, on more than one occasion, regarding the political situation in Kenya and the possibility of postponing the general election until the question of the franchise has been settled. Have I your permission, Sir?

Mr. President: Yes.

Mr. J. Hullah: We have received this morning from the Secretary of State for India a telegram informing us that the Secretary of State for the Colonies has authorised the Governor of Kenya to make an announcement in the following terms:

"The unavoidable delay in settling outstanding questions including that of Indian representation has made it necessary for the Secretary of State to choose between a postponement of the general election and dissolution of the new council after its election. In adopting the former course the Secretary of State has been influenced by the fact that from the date of his predecessor's original attempt to secure a settlement by agreement it has been intended that the new constitution should be framed in time for it to be brought into force on the occasion of the general election now due."

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Twenty Minutes Past Two of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Twenty Minutes Past Two of the Clock. Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar was in the Chair.

THE CANTONMENTS (HOUSE-ACCOMMODATION) BILL.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally (Sind : Muhammadan Rural): Sir, the first amendment that stands in my name is:

"That in clause 22 (1) (b) the following words be deleted:

'who shall be persons ordinarily resident and liable to pay taxes, in the cantonment'."

The effect of this amendment, if carried, would be that the two members nominated by the owner concerned will be appointed by him to serve on the Arbitration Committee without any restriction. There will be no limitation to the effect that these two arbitrators named by him should be persons resident within the cantonment or pay taxes to the cantonment fund. I do not think, Sir, many words are needed for me to support this amendment as it is almost self-evident. Under clause 22, the Government have by sub-clause (a) the right of nominating two members on their behalf, whomsoever they like, and there seems to be no reason why the house-owner should be limited to select two arbitrators who are necessarily resident within the cantonment and are also paying taxes. I submit, Sir, he should be a perfectly free agent to select any two arbitrators from wherever he likes and he should not be compelled to select two arbitrators necessarily resident within the cantonment. The effect of the clause as it stands would be that, while a common shop-keeper having a stock-in-trade of say Rs. 50 in his shop and paying 4 annas in the shape of halalkore cess to the cantonment fund, becomes a fit person to be an arbitrator, while a very big landlord owning house property within the cantonment area say to the extent of some takhs and paying thousands of rupees in the shape of taxation to the cantonment fund but having the misfortune of residing within the adjacent civil area, cannot become a fit person to be nominated by the house-owner as an arbitrator. I think, Sir, that this will be a very anomalous position, and so far as the Karachi Cantonment is concerned, I know of certain gentlemen of very high position who own a very considerable amount of house property within the cantonment but reside within the adjacent civil area which is only about a stone's throw. All these gentlemen will be disqualified under these words which I want to be deleted, and I suppose Sir Montagu Webb will bear me out in this statement that several owners of house property within the cantonment area reside in the adjacent civil area of the town. Sir Montagu says—on the other side of the road.

There is another difficulty, Sir, that will also arise, I believe, very shortly if these words are retained. It is, I believe, proposed in several important cantonments, for instance in the Cantonment of Ambala, to remove the Sudder Bazar, which is at present a part of the cantonment, and make it into a separate municipality. Thus the cantonment proper in places where these Sudder Bazars will be removed from the cantonment, will be very much more limited than at present: and it will be a practical difficulty in the way of a poor house owner to find men in whom he has got confidence and who will be fit persons according to this clause to serve as arbitrators. That is a difficulty which we ought to keep in view, but which I believe the Government have not taken notice of. That also serves, therefore, as an additional reason why these words should be deleted.

Primâ facie there appears to be no reason whatever why the discretion of the house owner to name his two arbitrators should be fettered in any way. He may bring two arbitrators from wherever he pleases provided he has got sufficient confidence in them. The only argument that would probably be advanced from the Government Benches against my amendment would be that if these two arbitrators are resident within the cantonment area, they will be acquainted with the conditions of the cantonment far better than persons residing outside it. That, to my mind, will be the only argument that will be advanced, but I do not think, Sir, there is much force in it. Conditions in the cantonment are not so difficult that a man of common intelligence whether he be resident within the cantonment or not, cannot acquaint himself with, by a little inquiry. After all, what is the purpose of this Arbitration Committee? The purpose of this Committee is to fix rental values, and I suppose that any man of ordinary intelligence can do that without much difficulty after acquainting himself with the conditions prevalent in the adjoining civil area as well as within the cantonment itself. Therefore, I think, Sir, there is no reason why these limitations should be placed on the choice of two arbitrators to be named by the house-owner, and I hope the House will agree with me that these words should be deleted.

Mr. Chairman: Amendment moved:

" That in clause 22 (1) (b) the following words be deleted :

' who shall be persons ordinarily resident and liable to pay taxes, in the cantonment ' "

Mr. E. Burdon: Sir, I submit that the clause, as approved by the majority of the Select Committee, is for at least two definite reasons better than it would be if amended in the way my Honourable friend, Mr. Hussanally, has proposed. The point of the amendment is, I may say, not a new one. It has been considered and discussed previously. The clause as it stands provides that the Committee of Arbitration shall consist of persons who are responsible persons and who have some local association with the cantonment area in which the subject matter of arbitration arises and may therefore be presumed to have some knowledge of the circumstances which would ordinarily determine the findings of the Committee of Arbitration. Now, this provision is to my mind rightly based and indeed it follows good and established practice. I cannot personally believe that, if the words to which my Honourable friend takes exception are retained, the field of choice will be limited as he seems to anticipate. I think his amendment would only provide for a remote contingency.

The other point which I would submit for the consideration of the House is of a very practical nature. In devising the arrangements which form one of the main purposes of the Bill, namely the arrangements which secure that, when a house is appropriated by Government, rent, shall be assessed in a manner which shall be scrupulously fair to the landlord, it has been necessary to provide for certain formalities and elaborations of procedure. Now, it is obviously desirable to limit these complications to the minimum absolutely necessary. We want an Act that will work smoothly and with reasonable expedition. Well, if the recommendation of the Committee of Arbitration is likely to be delayed, inconvenience will certainly be caused to the military officer who may in the meantime want to occupy a house and there will be greater delay if the owner of the house is at liberty to nominate as representatives on that Committee of Arbitration persons who may reside at a considerable distance. My Honourable friend has referred to the possibility of Sadar Bazaars being excluded from cantonment areas and to the further limitation of choice which would result if this were to take place. Now, my Honourable friend is perfectly well aware that it has not yet been decided to exclude any particular Sadar Bazaar from the cantonment area. The matter is still under consideration, and in the present Bill we only take into account the existing state of affairs. I wish to lay considerable emphasis on the practical objection which I have put forward. There is a very grave danger that the elaborate procedure of the new Act may place serious practical difficulties in the way of its operation and I hope the House will agree with me that it is desirable to limit the complications of the Act as much as possible. These are the objections which I have to offer to the amendment and I would ask the House to look at the matter in this light. The clause as it stands seems to provide sufficiently and appropriately for the requirements of any ordinary case. More than that I do not think can be expected of any Bill. Sir, I oppose the amendment.

Mr. Pyari Lal: Sir, as a member of the Select Committee, I think it my duty to explain that the considerations suggested by my friend, Mr. Hussanally, were not present to my mind when I agreed to this provision in the Bill as it now stands. It is a fact, Sir, and the Honourable Mr. Burdon has not denied it, that it is in contemplation, or, as he puts it, under consideration, to separate the Sadar Bazaars from the military areas proper or to cut away the civil portion of the population of cantonments from the military portion. Supposing, Sir,—and I have very strong hopes that it will come to pass,—supposing this measure is carried out, then what will happen? There are cantonments now, for instance of Ambala and of Meerut, where the Sadar Bazaars only contain people of intelligence or any social status. These are not to be found in the cantonment areas proper. Then, where will you find fit and proper nominees for the house-owners—surely you do not expect the house-owners to appoint for their arbitrators men who would be petty grocers or petty traders or mere hawkers who would then inhabit the regimental portion after the Sadar Bazaars have been separated and the chief portion of the civil population would have gone. So, if my Honourable friend will consent to it, I would propose that some two or three words might be added to the clause as it stands, that is to say “persons who are ordinarily resident or pay taxes or live in the immediate vicinity of the cantonment.” That would provide for these contingencies which he has suggested, that is to say, the persons who are living very near the cantonment area, across the road, as has been said. For persons who are well-to-do do not live in the cantonment proper, yet they are very near it. Or, in case the cantonments and Sadar Bazaars are separated, then the present inhabitants of the Sadar Bazaars would also come in as arbitrators. That would meet requirements of my friend and at the same time retain all those advantages in this provision which we had all along contemplated.

Rai Bahadur S. N. Singh (Bihar and Orissa: Nominated Official): Sir, I do not think this amendment of Mr. Hussanally should be accepted. It is always desirable in such cases to bring in responsible men familiar with the subject-matter of the dispute, and men coming from outside the cantonment area do not necessarily possess any knowledge of the state of things existing in the cantonment and would have in fact no stake therein. Sir, when committees are appointed in municipal areas to revise or review municipal taxation, the members elected are as a rule municipal rate-payers and I see no reason why any other criterion should be adopted in a cantonment.

Mr. Chairman: Do you move this as an amendment to that clause?

Mr. Pyari Lal: Yes, Sir, I beg to move:

"That the words 'who live in a cantonment or pay taxes or lives in the immediate vicinity' be substituted for all the words after 'persons'."

Mr. E. Burdon: I should be perfectly prepared to accept the sense of the Honourable Member's amendment. The form in which I would put it would be:

"For all the words after 'persons' substitute 'liable to pay taxes in the cantonment and ordinarily resident therein or in the immediate vicinity thereof'."

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: So far as I am concerned, Sir, I have no objection.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Sir, the second amendment which stands in my name is:

"(in) That in clause 22 (1) (c) for the words from 'and not having' to the words 'of the cantonment' the following be substituted:

'to be elected by the four members nominated under clauses (a) and (b) or a majority of them. Should there be no majority in favour of any person, the District Magistrate shall, on the request of the Commanding Officer of the cantonment, nominate the chairman of his own selection'."

The effect of the clause as it stands is that a chairman must be selected who shall be a person not in the service of the Government or the Cantonment Authority and not having any interest in house-property in the cantonment, which has been appropriated or is liable to appropriation, under the Act and who shall be nominated by the Commanding Officer of the Cantonment. My object is to take away this power from the Commanding Officer and to give it to the District Magistrate of the adjoining civil area. The reason why I make this suggestion is that under clauses (a) and (b) 4 persons are nominated as arbitrators, two by the Government and two by the house owner, and the house owner, as settled only a little while ago by the amendment of my friend Mr. Pyari Lal, is confined to select the arbitrators from amongst the residents of the cantonment or persons paying taxes therein but residing in the immediate vicinity thereof. So that, practically it comes to this. Of the four arbitrators thus selected, two are to a certain extent under the influence of the Cantonment Authority and the Commanding Officer is given the right of nominating the Chairman, he practically gets 3 of the 5 under his influence. Therefore, any decision arrived at by the Committee or the majority of them will not in the eyes of many of the house owners look as very just. At least it will give a handle to the people to think that the arbitration has been more or less one-sided, whereas if the power of nominating the Chairman is vested in the District Magistrate of the adjoining civil area, there is nothing lost so far as the Government is concerned, but the house owner will have reason to think that he has met with fair justice at the hands of the Committee as a whole. I therefore commend my amendment to the House.

Mr. J. P. Cotelingam (Nominated: Indian Christians): Sir, in order to understand the amendment that has been moved by my Honourable friend Mr. Hussanally, I would like the House to take the clause as a whole. Clause No. 22 lays down the constitution of Arbitration Committees that will be called into existence when there is a disagreement about the amount of the purchase money of a house between the military authorities and the house owner. A cause of disagreement may also arise where the rent becomes a question of dispute. For these purposes Committees of Arbitration have been constituted, and this clause, as I have said, lays down the constitution of such Arbitration Committees. Two of the members of the Court are to be appointed by the Officer Commanding the Cantonment and in the choice of these two members of the Court he is restricted. He is to appoint one who is an officer of the Military Works Services or of the Public Works Department. The house owner the rent of whose house is a matter of dispute or the amount of the purchase money of whose house is a cause of dispute, has the option of nominating two persons to this Arbitration Committee. Then comes the question of the appointment of the Chairman. Usually a Chairman is elected by the members of the Committee. In other words, the Committee elect their own Chairman. But there are occasions where a controlling authority also appoints the Chairman. There are circumstances which make it very necessary that the Officer Commanding the Cantonment appoint the Chairman of the Arbitration Committee. Honourable Members will see from Chapter IV, which deals with Committees of Arbitration, that the whole matter has to be gone through as expeditiously as possible. Mr. Hussanally proposes that the four members, two elected by the Officer Commanding and two by the house owner, meet and choose their own Chairman. I am not aware of a Committee choosing a Chairman outside its own body. Mr. Hussanally proposes that the four members meet and choose an outsider as their Chairman.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Under the Bombay District Municipal Act such an Arbitration Committee can choose a Chairman from outside.

Mr. J. P. Cotelingam: Further, Sir, the Honourable Member says that they may be elected by the four members. I do not know how in the absence of an electoral roll for the purpose such a Chairman can be elected.

Mr. N. M. Samarth (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): By votes.

Mr. J. P. Cotelingam: The object of the Arbitration Committee is to expedite business and it may not always be possible for the two members nominated by the Officer Commanding the Cantonment to agree to a Chairman elected or selected by the two men who represent the interests of the house owner. If these are to meet and if they differ one from the other in their choice a good deal of time will be lost, and the object for which the Arbitration Committee is constituted will not be achieved. In the next place, the Officer Commanding cannot exercise any undue influence. He is restricted in his choice of the Chairman. He is to nominate a person not in the service of the Government or the Cantonment authority and not having any interest in house-property in the cantonment. This restriction secures a non-official as the Chairman of the Committee of Arbitration.

This matter was fully discussed in the Select Committee and the majority agreed to the nomination of the Chairman by the Officer Commanding. In the event of any irregularity in the procedure, the clause provides for the District Magistrate to step in and appoint the Chairman or other member of the Arbitration Court. There is also a further safeguard provided for. If the aggrieved party is not satisfied with the award of the Arbitration Court, he has the right of appeal to a Civil Court. For these reasons, Sir, I think that the clause as it stands in the Bill and supported by a large majority in the Select Committee will commend itself to the House.

Mr. Pyari Lal: I do not think, Sir, that I can support the amendment of my Honourable friend. I think it is a matter of very small importance whether the person who appoints the Chairman is the Officer Commanding of the cantonment or the District Magistrate. We know as a matter of fact that the District Magistrate is a very heavily worked official, and as a rule, he is not in touch with the cantonment affairs. Therefore he would rather consider it very irksome when he is called upon to make the choice of a Chairman in matters which he probably does not care for. The Commanding Officer of the cantonment is a gentleman probably unconnected with any of the parties, a gentleman fresh from England, and a person who does not involve himself in the ordinary civil affairs of the people. And then when you restrict his choice that he shall only appoint a man who is not interested in the property, the subject of appropriation, that he shall appoint a man who is not in Government employ or in any way subordinate to him, I suggest nothing could be fairer than to ask him to make the appointment. Besides, our object in making this provision is to avoid unnecessary delays, because, after all, the house is very urgently required and as soon as possible. If you interpose at every step delays of months and weeks, what will happen? The provisions of this Act will then be absolutely nugatory, mean nothing, and therefore I think the clause as it stands should be allowed.

Mr. E. Burdon: Sir, my Honourable friends Messrs Cotelingam and Pyari Lal have anticipated most of the objections which I have to offer to this amendment. It is quite clear that in substance nothing could be gained by the proposal that the Chairman of the Committee of Arbitration should be elected. In the first place, election could always be made to fail by the two Government Members of the Committee declining to vote for any particular candidates, and they would always do so if there were any element of contention present. Consequently, in every case in which the principle of election would ex hypothesi be of value, it would be necessary to resort to nomination. This, of course, was recognised by the framers of the Bill. I need not touch on the point of the undesirability of adding unnecessarily to the delays of the proceedings of these committees of arbitration. Mr. Pyari Lal has explained this matter very clearly.

There are only two further points which I should like to mention very briefly. One is that the clause as it stands gives a guarantee that the Chairman of the Committee of Arbitration shall be a non-official, and that is a point on which very great stress has always been laid by those interested in cantonment reform. My Honourable friend's amendment would not necessarily have the same result. The other point is this. Let us suppose for a moment that the Commanding Officer of the cantonment, in exercise of his powers of nomination, makes an unsuitable choice, and this were to affect the ultimate decision of the Committee of Arbitration, what would happen then? The owner of the house, under the provisions of this Bill, will have the right of appeal to the Civil Court. I have heard it said that when you provide this remedy of appeal, you provide everything that any reasonable person can ask for. It is quite clear that the Commanding Officer of the cantonment with the knowledge of this fact before him, namely, that there is the right of appeal, would never deliberately make an unsuitable choice, and he would not do so for other reasons as well. It would be his object to bring the proceedings of the Committee of Arbitration to a close as quickly as possible and to do everything that he could to ensure that the proceedings of the Committee should be non-contentious. For these reasons I oppose the amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 22, as amended, 23, as amended by the Joint Committee, 24, as amended by the Joint Committee, 25, and 26 were added to the Bill.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: As regards this clause 27, I have two amendments standing in my name.

Mr. Chairman: Move them one by one.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: They are connected with each other and I should like to move them together, because if one is carried the second follows. They are:

"(a) That in clause 27 after the words and figure 'Section 7 and' the following be inserted:

'in places where there are no populated civil areas adjoining cantonment areas'.

"(b) That to clause 27 the following be added:

'Where, however, there are populated civil areas adjoining cantonment areas, the annual rent on cantonment buildings may be fixed at such percentage on their market value as is for the time being recoverable by way of annual rent on the market value of similar houses in the adjoining civil area in the locality concerned.'

It will be observed that in the amendment as printed there occurs the word "shall" and with your permission, Sir, and the permission of the House, I should like to substitute the word "may" instead of "shall". I shall explain, Sir, why I propose these two amendments.

It was represented to me by some landlords in Karachi, I mean the Karachi Cantonment, that if rental values in the cantonment for such bungalows as the Government commandeers are fixed by reference to the adjoining bungalows in the cantonment, the result will not be satisfactory so far as the landlords are concerned, because the rental values of such bungalows, at any rate, in the Karachi Cantonment were fixed several years back, perhaps 30 or 40 years back. Times have changed since then

3 P.M. and the cost of repairs and the prices of materials have gone up considerably. Therefore fixing the rental values for bungalows to be commandeered by Government in reference to the other adjoining bungalows will not necessarily meet the case. Therefore they suggested it to me that a clause should be inserted that comparison should be made between the bungalows in the cantonment and the bungalows in the adjoining civil lines, in cantonments like Karachi, so that a fairer rental value should be fixed for these bungalows which are to be taken over by Government on long leases, and it is with that object that I differentiated between these two classes of bungalows; because if the bungalows are situated in a cantonment which has no civil area adjoining, there could necessarily be no comparison between any bungalows in Civil lines and the bungalows in the cantonment. Necessarily therefore any comparison that can be held will only be amongst the bungalows in the cantonment. But when there are bungalows with similar accommodation and construction in the adjoining civil area of a cantonment, reference ought to be made to the rents that exist in these civil areas. But I am told that in certain cantonments this is not possible and that the rents of houses and bungalows in the civil area are much smaller than the rents within the cantonments. It is with the object of meeting that difficulty that I want to remove the word 'shall' and put in the word 'may', so that the amendment as I propose now will suit both the cases. When there is a cantonment by itself having no civil area adjacent and no bungalows within the civil area to which the rents of these bungalows within the cantonment can be compared, the comparison should be to the other bungalows in the same cantonment but when, in certain cases like Karachi as I have described, there are civil areas adjoining with bungalows of a similar kind the comparison should be made between the cantonment bungalows and the other bungalows, so far as the rental value is concerned and I hope that this amendment will be acceptable.

Mr. Pyari Lal: I strongly object to this amendment. My Honourable friend is probably unaware of the state of things in this part of the country. There is a great deal of difference in the value of the houses situated in the civil area and those within the limits of a cantonment. There are different considerations altogether in judging both these cases. The considerations that apply in one case will not apply to the other. In cantonments, the site of the houses belongs to the Government. We are liable to be turned out at any moment. We do not consider it to be our property at all and therefore when we build houses we practically take a very serious risk and for that risk we are paid by way of compensation a higher rental value. In cantonments I know, for instance Ambala or Meerut, the annual rental value of the house is about 12 per cent. of the estimated market value, whereas in the city it is only 3 or 4. Persons who have spent Rs. 10,000 for their houses in the civil area get about Rs. 25 or 30 rent, whereas persons who have spent a similar amount on their houses in these cantonments get Rs. 100. Therefore to have any recourse for purposes of comparison to the houses in the city will not be advantageous to the house owners and therefore will never do.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Quite the reverse is the case in Karachi.*

Mr. Pyari Lal: My friend wants to change 'shall' into 'may'. He wants "to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds." In one case he wants a particular rental and in another case another rental. That will not do. There must be a uniform rate and I think the method of calculating the rent suggested in the Act as proposed is a very sound one.

Mr. E. Burdon: My Honourable friend, Mr. Pyari Lal, has, I am afraid, taken the words out of my mouth. If I have understood my Honourable friend Mr. Hussanally correctly and if I may speak colloquially, he wants "to have it both ways." If rents in the adjoining civil area are high, then rents in cantonments should be raised by an artificial process irrespective of natural causes. On the contrary if rents in the adjoining civil area are low, then those in cantonments should be maintained at their existing high level. I now wish to put the case, if I may, as I see it myself. Houses in cantonments only are to continue as in the past liable to appropriation for the use of military officers and it is only in houses in cantonments that military officers are permitted to live. They are not allowed the option of residing in any adjoining civil settlement. Now these facts have a necessary effect in determining the value of houses situated in cantonments and the value of houses in adjoining civil areas has nothing whatever to do with the matter. The criterion which my Honourable friend seeks to introduce for the purpose of fixing rents in cantonments would be clearly alien and inapposite. I do not think, however, that I need elaborate the argument. I have no doubt the House will appreciate the point I have put forward. With these remarks I oppose the amendment.

Mr. Chairman: The question is:

"That in clause 27 after the words and figure 'Section 7 and' the following be inserted:

'in places where are no populated civil areas adjoining cantonment areas', and that to clause 27 the following be added:

"Where, however, there are populated civil areas adjoining cantonment areas, the annual rent on cantonment buildings shall be fixed at such percentage on their market value as is for the time being recoverable by way of annual rent on the market value of similar houses in the adjoining civil area in the locality concerned."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Pyari Lal: The amendment which I beg to move is, that to clause 27 the following proviso be added, namely.

I am sure that this is an amendment that my Honourable friend Mr. Burdon will jump at and I propose it simply to show that when he has been just generous to us in the matter of the provisions of this House Accommodation Act we are equally prepared to meet him in the same fair minded attitude. Sir, this amendment can be inferred from the various portions of the Act. But I only introduce it to put the matter in plain words and beyond all doubt. In the Act itself it is provided that the house will be taken for five years certain, that in the beginning the repairs will be done at the expense of the owner, and for the period during the tenancy, the repairs will be done by the tenant, and in the matter of assessing rent we shall be allowed the same amount as to the other house-owners possessing similar houses in the cantonments. But we know as a matter of fact that other house-owners have to meet the cost of these repairs annually, so that the rent which they receive is minus the cost of these repairs. We want to put the Government tenant on the same footing as these other tenants. These tenants have not to bear the cost of repairs; and therefore I propose that this amendment might be accepted. Again, Sir, it might be said that in the matter of ordinary tenants there is generally no dispute about repairs. In the case of military officers there is always a great deal of heart-burning and trouble over the extent and the cost of these repairs. They generally are persons of dainty taste who want much more repairs than the house owners can afford, and more often than not, the whole of the rent hitherto, used to be absorbed in these repairs alone, and so the owners practically got nothing. So it might be objected that by the provision that I am now introducing the same state of things may recur. But I say, no. Mr. Burdon has been kind enough to define the phrase 'reasonable repairs'. Now it can never be disputed. Clause 2, sub-clause (j) defines what the phrase 'reasonable repairs' means :

"A house is said to be in a state of reasonable repair when (i) all floors, walls, pillars and arches are sound and all roofs sound and watertight"—there can be no dispute that this is just—(ii) all doors and windows are intact, properly painted or oiled, and provided with proper locks or bolts or other secure fastenings—again there can be no dispute—(iii) all rooms, out-houses and other appurtenant buildings are properly colour-washed or whitewashed."

Beyond this, under this Act the Government cannot go, and therefore those former disputes are not likely to arise. I must, Sir, congratulate the Honourable Mover on his introducing into this Assembly a Bill of this just and generous character.

Mr. Chairman: You will have time to do that when the motion is made that the Bill be passed into Law.

Mr. Pyari Lal: I shall say one word, with your permission.

Mr. Chairman: Later on. Amendment moved :

"That to clause 27 the following proviso be added, namely :

Mr. E. Burdon: Sir, I gladly accept the amendment proposed by Mr. Pyari Lal. It is obvious that the Committee of Arbitration should not be entitled to include in the rent which they fix as payable to the owner the cost of repairs which are being directly and separately borne by Government. The omission was, I must acknowledge, due to an oversight, and I am much obliged to my Honourable friend for providing me with the means of remedying it. Sir, I accept the amendment.

Mr. Chairman: The amendment before the House is that to clause 27 the proviso which I have already read be added.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that clause 27, as amended by the Joint Committee, stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that clauses 29, 30, 31 and 32, as amended by the Joint Committee, stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Clauses 29, 30, 31 and 32 were added to the Bill.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that clause 33 stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that clauses 34, 35 and 36, as amended by the Joint Committee, stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that clause 37 stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that clause 38 stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that clause 39, as amended by the Joint Committee, stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that this be the Schedule to the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

The Title and the Preamble were added to the Bill.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, I should draw the Honourable Member's attention, before he moves that the Bill be passed, to an obvious omission in sub-clauses (i) (j) of clause 2—'a house is said to be in a state of reasonable repair when (i) all floors, walls, pillars and arches are sound and all roofs sound and water-tight'. But there is no mention of the word 'wind tight',—a house ought to be wind-tight,—it is a usual clause inserted in every lease. Supposing the roofs do not leak, but a storm blows into the house; I hope it will be remedied.

Mr. Chairman: Order, order. Mr. Burdon.

Mr. E. Burdon: I move that the Bill, as amended, be passed.

Mr. Pyari Lal: Sir, I consider that the provisions of this Bill have been conceived in a very just and generous manner. It has always been a sore point with cantonment house-owners that their houses were commandeered by military officers and they got no return for their money, and this has caused a great deal of trouble hitherto. But now everything has been put on a very satisfactory footing. Not only is the notice to appropriate a house, good enough, but against that very notice an appeal has been allowed, and that must give a great deal of satisfaction. Then again in the matter of repairs, the house-owner can have a Committee of Arbitration, and the constitution of the Committee of Arbitration leaves nothing to be desired. From a decision of the Committee of Arbitration—and this again is very good—a right of appeal to the Civil Court has been given, and we can go up to the District Judge. What more could a house-owner in a cantonment want? Then again on the question of rent also we are to get the same value for our money, to get the same rent, as house-owners of the neighbouring houses. Then in cases of dispute again there is the same Committee of Arbitration, and the same right of appeal. Sir, everywhere, all along the line, we have been treated most fairly, and for this our unbounded thanks are due to the Honourable Mover, Mr. Burdon, and I only hope that this Bill is but an earnest of what we expect from his generous nature in future in the way of cantonment reforms.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Sir, I associate myself with every word which has fallen from the lips of Mr. Pyari Lal regarding the Honourable Mr. Burdon.

Mr. E. Burdon: Sir, I should like very briefly to thank my Honourable friends for the kind things they have said about the Bill and about myself. But I think that it is only right to say that greater acknowledgments are due to my predecessor, who really laid the foundations of this piece of reforms, which I know has been very anxiously desired by the owners of houses in Cantonments.

Mr. Chairman: The question is :

"That the Bill further to amend the Cantonments (House-Accommodation) Act, 1902, as amended, be passed."

The motion was adopted.

THE COTTON TRANSPORT BILL.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member):
I beg to move, Sir,

"That the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill to provide for the restriction and control of the transport of cotton in certain circumstances, be taken into consideration."

Sir, this Bill has already been before the House on two occasions and on both of those occasions I have made a speech explaining the objects of the Bill. In the circumstances I do not propose to detain the House very long to-day. The Bill is a very modest measure. Some people indeed think it is too modest a measure. It is a very modest measure intended to give Local Governments, if they so desire, a remedy against a very real evil, namely, the evil of mixing cotton. As I have explained previously, this evil of mixing bids fair to ruin the reputation and, incidentally also, the price of some of India's best staples. I wish to emphasise the point that though this Bill is a modest Bill, yet it should assist Agricultural Departments in the very beneficent work they are now doing in improving and maintaining the quality of staple cottons in certain tracts. For instance, some Members of this House may have seen in the course of the last day or two an article in one of the Bombay papers. That paper draws attention to the fact that the work done by the Agricultural Department in Bombay in the Surat and Naysari tracts, which is one of the tracts I may mention about which the Bombay Government is most nervous, has resulted in giving the cotton of that tract a premium of Rs. 20 to 21 an acre over the cotton of the adjoining Broach tract. And the article goes on to say that there is a danger that, owing to this evil practice of mixing, the work which the Agricultural Department is doing in this respect may be entirely neutralized. Our Bill is an attempt to enable a Local Government, it is faced with a problem of that kind, to apply at any rate a partial remedy. I move, Sir, that the Bill be taken into consideration.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan): I move, Sir:

"That the Bill be recommitted to the Joint Committee."

My object in moving this amendment is not in any way to deprecate the measure or to put any obstruction in its passage. But, Sir, I find that there are certain apparent defects in the Bill that has emerged from the Joint Committee which I think cannot be amended on the floor of this House. With this object, Sir, I move that the points which I will suggest later, be taken into consideration by the Joint Committee, to provide the necessary checks to safeguard the interests that may be concerned.

This Bill when circulated for public opinion had a mixed reception. Some approved of it while others deprecated it. On the one hand the Bombay millowners and the Bombay Chamber of Commerce welcomed it with open arms, and not content with that, they even took the Government to task for having delayed such a wholesome measure. On the other hand, the United Provinces and some people in the Central Provinces were not satisfied with the Bill, and they thought that it was not a good measure and disapproved of it. Other provinces were quite indifferent to the Bill; and generally the opinion was divided. Sir, the objects with which this Bill has been introduced are very wholesome and desirable no doubt. In the cotton trade there has been fraud and deception practised in the country, inferior cotton used to be mixed up with good cotton of reputation. But the measure which has been brought before us will create many other hardships and troubles against which it is necessary for us to provide safeguards. Many people think that this measure will not be able to check the deceit and fraud complained against while others think that it may hamper the internal trade of the country. Some people think that even the agriculturists, for whose benefit this measure has been introduced, will not welcome it as they will be hit hard by it. For instance, only yesterday one of my friends said to me—suppose a man were to cultivate long staple cotton in a particular area, a portion of which may not be fertile enough for that particular variety and hence yield an inferior variety, while another portion might yield a superior variety. How can that agriculturist distinguish between the two and separate them? There is also the objection, Sir, that the cotton growing area in certain provinces is very limited and scattered. From these scattered parts the cotton has to be transported to central localities where ginning factories are located. Some people suggest that the cotton could only be improved by improving the agricultural processes and by the Agricultural Department and the fraud could be checked by the agents of mill owners specially deputed for the purchase of superior cotton.

The first of the difficulties in this Bill, as will appear to Honourable Members, is that the Bill provides the railway staff with authority to prohibit the transportation of any cotton from a place to any place in a notified area. No doubt, as the Honourable Mr. Innes has pointed out, very extensive powers have been given to Local Governments to notify areas and to notify the variety of cotton that they may desire to prohibit or protect. But the power given under the Bill to the station staff is highly extensive and undesirable. We not only give power to the railway staff to stop transport of cotton, but we also give them power to discriminate as to whether the cotton handed to them for transport was or was not of a prohibited variety. For instance, suppose the Central Provinces Government notifies that the Berar or Akola area is a protected area. And that short staple cotton should be prohibited from entering or being sent to that area but long staple cotton to be a protected variety, and not be prohibited. They may do this to prevent the admixture of short staple cotton with the long staple cotton. I go with a bale of cotton having long staple and I give it over to the railway station master or to the goods clerk or any other railway officer authorised in this behalf to forward it to Berar area. I tell him 'Here is a bale of cotton, kindly forward it to Akola.' Under the provisions in clause 4 the station master, if he thinks that the variety of cotton contained in this bale is not of a variety that has been notified by the Government, as the protected variety of cotton, the result will be that that station master might stop the transport of that cotton from the station. Here we give the authority to the station official to discriminate between different kinds of cotton. I may insist that the cotton was good long staple cotton which is protected and not prohibited. The station master may say 'It is a prohibited cotton and therefore I forbid it.' Moreover, Sir, he will be too prone to refuse the transport, where cotton is handed over to him outside the notified area. For instance, under a subsequent clause, Sir, we have also provided—probably in clause 6—a penalty that if a station master or station official were to allow the transport of prohibited cotton from being sent to a notified area that station master or that station official will be liable to a penalty under this Bill. Now, in this case, Sir, we provide a penalty that if he lets cotton to be transported he will be punished. At the same time, we do not provide a penalty that if the station master or the station official were wrongfully to refuse to receive or transport it to that area he will be punished. There is no provision to that effect. All this goes to show that the Bill, as it has been put before us, is a defective measure and is not quite a perfect one. All of us, Sir, are fully cognisant of the corruption that went on during the period of control when priority certificates were required to be obtained for goods wagons. Everyone of us knows what mischief the railway officials played in those days. Corruption was prevalent not only amongst small station staff, but even amongst some of the high officers of the railway company. I do not mean to say that all the high officials of the railway behaved in that way or were corrupt, but there were to be found some officials who were corrupt. When such a thing could happen at one time, where could there be safety or check at other times also for the non-recurrence of such a thing at the hands of petty station officials who are not much literate and who cannot have proper power of discrimination between long staple cotton and short staple cotton. I could very well have understood if any provision had been made in this Bill of giving such power only to some expert licensing authority or agricultural authority. But no such provision has been made. The Honourable Mr. Innes might say that the Local Governments may make rules in that respect, but I doubt whether the Local Governments can make rules for checking or controlling the station officials for abuses under clauses 4 and 5. And, Sir, I submit that the safeguards or checks that we might put by way of amendments may not be sufficiently proper safeguards. It has also been seen during the last two or three days that when an amendment is moved and if there is any slight mistake in it, we are taken to task and no such amendment can succeed. Under these circumstances, Sir, it will be very difficult for us to put in proper amendments. Moreover very few amendments have been notified in this Bill. I do not mean to say that amendments have not been notified because there are no objections or imperfections in the Bill. I shall be very much obliged if any Honourable Member can point out the safeguards that have been provided against wrongful actions on the part of the station officials in this Bill. I shall be very much obliged if any Honourable Member will point out the safeguards that have been provided against the transport of cotton by road or by way and the agency that has been provided for in this Bill. It might very well be said on behalf of the Government that this agency could very well be declared by the Local Government, but may I know where the funds will come from? No such source of revenue has been provided here, and therefore I submit that these imperfections could only be remedied if the Bill goes back again to the Joint Committee for amendments. With these words, Sir, I commend for the consideration of the House that the Bill be recommended to the Joint Committee.

Mr. Chairman: The original motion was :

" That the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill to provide for the restriction and control of the transport of cotton in certain circumstances, be taken into consideration."

Since when an amendment has been moved :

" That the Bill be re-committed to the Select Committee."

Captain E. V. Sassoon (Bombay Millowners Association: Indian Commerce): Sir, the interests which I have the honour to represent have desired even stronger measures than those afforded by the Bill. But we accepted it as it stands as a step in the right direction. I confess, Sir, that I have been rather at a loss to understand some of the remarks that have fallen from the lips of the last speaker. He talks of growers who grow long staple and short staple cotton and he appears to think that this Bill would cause some grievance to these growers. I do not see anything in the Bill which prevents any person from exporting from his district long staple as well as short staple cotton. It merely prevents anybody from importing short staple cotton into a long staple district. As to the further point which the last speaker made as to the powers in the hands of the station staff, supposing that a consumer in a district wanted to import cotton and was in some doubt as to whether it would be accepted by the station master, his district being a notified area, there would be no difficulty for him to obtain a license as is available under this Bill. The moment he has got his license, the station staff have no power to withhold his right to import. He has, furthermore, the right under the license to import any sort of cotton that he may need for his particular purposes. He may need in a long staple area to import short staple cotton if he happens to have a mill there and under the safeguard, that is to say, by having a license, he is enabled to do this. I therefore fail to see any reason, Sir, why this Bill should be re-committed to the Joint Committee and on behalf of the interests, which I represent. I strongly support it.

Mr. B. H. R. Jatkar (Berar Representative): Sir, I rise to support the motion which has been made by Mr. Agnihotri. It is very necessary that the Bill as it stands should be improved further. From the opinions of the several Local Governments that have been received, it appears that the Bill as it stands, if passed, would be a dead letter and would not be availed of by many of the Local Governments. Mr. Agnihotri has only given the opinions of two of the Local Governments. If I read to the House the opinions of the other Local Governments, I can positively say that the majority of the Local Governments say that the Bill is either not necessary for their provinces or impracticable and unworkable. In the face of these opinions of the Local Governments should we consider and adopt a Bill which would be a dead letter soon after it is passed? Probably the Bombay Government alone is wholeheartedly in support of this measure. And I think to meet the wishes of only one province this Government should not adopt a Bill which will not be of any use to the other provinces. Moreover, the defects in the Bill have been pointed out by my Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri. I would add something more to what he has stated. Where is the classification of the variety of cotton which are to be protected? Is it to be left to the Local Government to specify the varieties of the cotton or is it to be left to the Station Masters to whom the goods are consigned to detect the variety of cotton that is being consigned. The Bill itself does not make any provision for the classification of the several varieties of cotton. The Indian Cotton Committee have specifically stated that it should be the first concern to classify the varieties of cotton before any other thing is taken in hand. I therefore consider that classification is necessary whether in this or in any other Bill, because the present varieties of cotton are named after railway stations or after provinces. For instance, the House may be surprised to learn that the cotton which is known as Bengal cotton does not grow in Bengal at all. So I think it will be desirable to have the classification of the varieties of cotton before we give protection to any area for growing that sort of cotton. Moreover, the evil of mixture about which so much has been said is with the middlemen or the ginning and pressing factory owners. It has also been recommended that there should be some Act to provide for the licensing of ginning and pressing factories, and I think that legislation must also be considered along with this legislation, otherwise it would be of no use to pass this Bill without checking the malpractices in the ginning and pressing factories.

The last speaker pointed out that there is absolutely no hardship to the cotton growers, but I think there will be a hardship to them in this way. Suppose the Khandesh area is protected or the Berar area is protected for certain varieties of cotton. Up to now the cotton growers take their cotton carts from one province to another, and he has only to cross the border to take it to the nearest cotton market, but if you give protection to any such area, it will certainly cause hardship to the cotton growers in the adjoining area.

Moreover, in the definition of 'cotton,' cotton seed has been included. Cotton seed if restricted wholesale would cause very great hardship to the public. One of the Local Governments,—I believe the Government of the United Provinces—has stated that cotton seed should be excluded. There is also this difficulty. Where cotton seed is imported for sowing purposes it must be restricted, no doubt, but the wholesale restriction of importing cotton seed which is meant for oil or to be used as food for cattle would be a great hardship to this province or that province, because it would be very difficult to detect what cotton seed is imported for food, for cattle or for seed.

One of the provinces has also condemned the wording of section 4 because it gives too much discretion to railway officers and I do not know how it can be removed by an amendment here or an amendment there. For this purpose, therefore, it would be necessary to recommit the whole Bill to the Joint Committee once again. The Joint Committee that was appointed consisted of 10 members, and the House will be surprised to know that 5 members had not taken part in the deliberations of the Committee at all, and out of the 5 members who have taken part, three represent Bombay. Of course I have nothing to say personally against any one of them, but I submit that all the provinces were not represented on this Joint Committee and the advantage of their experience has not been taken in regard to this Bill. With these remarks, Sir, I support the motion before the House.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I oppose the amendment. I believe both my friends Mr. Agnihotri and Mr. Jatkar have entirely misconceived the object of the Bill. I do not think the Bill, as it has emerged from the Select Committee, is so radically defective as to deserve a recommitment to a Joint Committee. Mr. Agnihotri spoke about the safeguards which he wanted. May I point out to him an unusually good safeguard which this Bill introduces, namely, the safeguard under clause 8? That is the best safeguard which I can think of. "No notification under section 8 or rule under section 7 shall be issued by the Local Government of any Governor's province, unless it has been laid in draft before the Legislative Council of the Province, and has been approved by a Resolution of the Legislative Council, either with or without modification or addition, etc." I think, Sir, this is a safeguard which we ought to value. No Local Government under this Act will be in a position to issue any notification restricting the transport of cotton unless the Members of the Local Legislative Council get an opportunity to see the draft.

[Mr. B. S. Kamat.]

Mr. Jatkar spoke about the classification of cotton, and he thought that every Station Master on every railway should be conversant or should be made conversant by rules or by the Act with all the thousand and one varieties of cotton in the country. I believe, Sir, it is a task so stupendous that no Act or Railway Administration can ever hope to accomplish. All these things could be done with reference to specific tracts of the country only by the Local Government of the province, by special notifications and with the consent of the Legislative Council of the province concerned. That is, I believe, the safest safeguard which one can think of.

Then again Mr. Agnihotri seemed to labour under another misapprehension. He seemed to think that under clause 4 of this Bill the whole responsibility of determining the quality of cotton is thrown on Station Masters. Sir, the Bill attempts to do nothing of that sort. The only duty of the Station Master under this Bill will be to ask for a licence from the consignor. If the consignor is honest enough, he will be able to produce his licence, and I don't think Mr. Agnihotri is against the principle of licensing. At the beginning of his speech he admitted that the objects of the Bill were good. He also admitted that the transport of cotton ought to be checked. He also admitted that it could be checked only under a system of licences. All these three premises being granted, I believe it follows that somebody must issue licences, and the duty thrown on the station master is only to see that the consignor has got a licence in his hands. The terms and conditions of the licence will be determined by the Local Government and placed in draft before the Legislative Council, so that every condition in the licence, the very form of the licence, will be shown to Members of the Legislative Council. I believe that is a pretty good safeguard.

Then Mr. Jatkar spoke about the growers' inconveniences and hardships. I do not know where the hardships for the grower comes in. The Bill does not check the cultivators from growing any particular variety of cotton. They can sow in their fields, even side by side, and acre by acre, any class or variety of cotton. The only attempt which the Bill makes is to prevent smuggling under a false name and consigning under false pretences. I believe, Sir, cotton, especially when it is exported, is getting a bad name if the whole cotton is mixed up and adulterated with different varieties. What we want to save is the name of Indian cotton, particularly in foreign countries so that we may get a good price for it. Secondly there is often adulteration in the cotton seed which the cultivator gets. Cotton is mixed in ginning and pressing factories under this process of smuggling. The seed which the cultivator sows in the fields is after all not pure, good seed of a good quality but it is mixed seed which comes from ginning factories, and therefore the crops which he realises are never pure, unadulterated cotton which he exports, with the result that he suffers by this process of mixing of seed. It is therefore to his interest to pass the Bill. I do not think anything would be gained by recommitting this Bill to the Joint Committee, and, if at all my friend Mr. Agnihotri thought that there were serious difficulties in the Bill, he could have sent in any number of amendments. I see, however, that there are only two or three amendments in his name showing that either he or his friends had very little else to suggest to improve the Bill, and from this very fact I think we can take it for granted that nothing can be gained by recommitting it to the Joint Committee.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: I desire, Sir, to add a few words in support of what my friend, Mr. Kamat, has said. I wish to make this point. Mr. Agnihotri and Mr. Jatkar in their speeches both attack what I might call the whole scheme and the whole principle of the Bill. It is no use sending points like that to a Select Committee. A Select Committee must work upon the assumption that the scheme of the Bill, the general principle of the Bill, has been accepted by the House. A Joint Committee could not alter materially our clauses (4) and (5). They could not deprive the station master of the power we give him to refuse a consignment of cotton unless it is accompanied by a licence without altering the whole scheme of the Bill. A point of that kind, Sir, is a point which has to be decided by the whole House. This is a Bill of only 7 clauses. It is not a very difficult Bill to understand and I think, Sir, that this House is quite competent to deal with the points raised by Mr. Agnihotri.

I desire to make just one other point. Mr. Jatkar pointed to the fact that 3 out of the 4 non-official members of the Select Committee had come from Bombay. He suggested that the Bill had been drawn up in the interests of the Bombay cotton trade and the Bombay mill owners. Now, Sir, that is entirely untrue. This Bill is intended largely for the benefit of the growers. Does Mr. Jatkar realise what are the evils that we are trying to meet? One of the evils is the dishonest middleman. He rails cotton from a short staple tract to a station inside a well known long staple tract. He thereby gets on his bale the station mark of the long staple tract. He thereby gets a better price for his cotton, but in the process he helps to destroy the reputation of the cotton in that long staple tract. Again, cotton from a short staple tract is railed to a long staple tract and is there mixed with cotton of the superior variety. Again, it is fraud pure and simple and again it is the cultivator that suffers. And finally, and this is the worst of all, you get unginned cotton railed from a short staple tract to a long staple tract. The cotton is ginned in the long staple tract. It is mixed with the long staple cotton and gets the higher price. Again, it is fraud. And the seed is used for sowing in the long stapled tract. Thus you set up a process of deterioration in the whole of the cotton of that tract which it may take years to arrest. I say without fear of contradiction that the purpose and object of this Bill is to maintain the reputation of our best cottons in India. It is a Bill which offers Local Governments a remedy if they desire to use it and it is for each Local Government and local Council to decide whether they will apply the remedy which we offer them. But let no one in this House say that we are here introducing a Bill against the interests of the cultivator and solely in the interests of the trade, for it is not true. I submit, Sir, that this amendment should not be accepted.

Mr. Chairman: Amendment moved:

"That the Bill be re-committed to the Select Committee."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Clauses 1, 2 and 3, as amended by the Joint Committee, were added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"That to sub-clause (1) of clause 4 the following proviso be added:

'Provided that the railway officials so refusing shall without any unreasonable delay inform the consignor and the authority entitled to grant a licence for transport, the fact of such a refusal and shall carry out the order that the licensing authority may pass directing him to so receive for carriage or to so forward, or allow the cotton to be so carried.'

Sir, in clause 4 of the Bill we read:

"the station master of any railway station or any other railway servant responsible for the booking of goods or parcels at that station may refuse to receive for carriage at, or to forward or allow to be carried on the railway from, that station any cotton consigned to a notified station, being cotton of a kind of which delivery at such notified station has been prohibited, unless both stations are in the same protected area, or unless the consignor produces a certified copy of a licence for the import of the cotton into the protected area in which such notified station is situated."

Sir, as will appear from what I have read out, the station master or a railway official can refuse to receive or to transport the cotton consigned to any notified area, if it is cotton of a kind of which the delivery at such notified station has been prohibited. Sir, when I moved my amendment for the recommitment of the Bill to the Select Committee, the Honourable Mr. Sassoon and the Honourable Mr. Kamat were pleased to say that the licence would have to be produced before the station master and on seeing that licence the consignment would be received or transported. But, Sir, on reading this clause, I find that the cotton that has been prohibited from being sent to a notified area requires a licence, but for cotton of a variety that has not been prohibited from being transported to that area no licence is necessary. And so the difficulty would come in where any consignment of the variety of cotton that is not prohibited from being sent to that particular area, is tendered to the railway official for transport. In that case the official may be pleased to say that in his opinion the cotton tendered to him was of a different variety or of the prohibited variety, and he may refuse to receive it for transport. This point was not cleared up by any of my Honourable friends who opposed that motion. Neither was this point touched by the Honourable the Commerce Member. If we say that the licence could be applied for and was required even for such a variety of cotton, then there will be another difficulty. Every place is not expected to have a licensing authority. It is only big places or the large trade centres that may be the headquarters of the licensing authority and the dealer, the trader or the agriculturist or the cotton grower, who wants to transport that cotton, shall have to go to that licensing authority, and shall have to request him to have an inspection of the variety of cotton that he wants to transport and to give him a licence and only when he is able to satisfy the licensing authority he would be entitled to transport that cotton to such a station in a notified area but not otherwise. This will necessarily involve much inconvenience and trouble to the dealers. The Honourable Mr. Innes said that I objected to the principle of the Bill. Not in the least: far from it. I do welcome the principle on which this Bill has been based and, if I had any objection to the principle of the Bill, I would not have requested for its recommitment to the Select Committee but I would have opposed it outright. If my interpretation of this section is correct, the station master has to discriminate and find out for himself and to judge whether or not the consignment of cotton that is produced before him is one of the prohibited varieties. The consignor comes and says, "This is not of the prohibited variety" while the station master says, "This is of the prohibited variety and I refuse to receive it." Where is the remedy? My friend Mr. Kamat said that he should obtain a licence and then produce it. But if he thinks that it is of a variety which is not prohibited, where is the necessity for a licence? If he goes to the licensing authority, that officer will say, "Well, I am only required to grant a licence for such varieties of cotton that may be prohibited from going into a particular notified area." Therefore, I submit, Sir, that this state of things will lead to real hardship to agriculturists and to persons who may have occasion to consign goods at wayside stations. With this view, Sir, I propose a safeguard in the form of a proviso to clause 4. I am conscious of my weakness in the English language, and it is just possible that my amendment may not be in a proper form or be properly worded. But my sole object is that there should be a check, a safeguard, over the station official when he refuses to receive or to transport a consignment of cotton, and that that safeguard should be provided in the Bill. That is my object, and with that object I move the amendment that in case the station official refuses to receive such consignment, he should inform the consignor and at the same time he should send an intimation to the licensing authority, if any, appointed within the area and that such licensing authority's orders shall be final in that respect, and that if the licensing authority issues a licence to him or advises the station master to transport that cotton, then the station master should obey him. That is the proviso which I wish to put in. With these words, Sir, I put my amendment before the House for consideration.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, Mr. Agnihotri has so completely misapprehended the scope of this clause that I find it rather difficult to answer him. Mr. Agnihotri appears to be under the impression that certain varieties of cotton will be allowed to be imported into a prohibited area and that other varieties will not be so allowed, and that it will rest with the unfortunate station master to decide whether any particular consignment which is offered to him for carriage belongs to the prohibited or to the non-prohibited variety. Let me assure Mr. Agnihotri that we intend no such thing. We have defined "cotton" in clause 2 (c) as meaning every kind of unmanufactured cotton; that is, ginned and unginned cotton, cotton waste and cotton seed. We have adopted that particular form of definition in order in clause 3 to allow a Local Government to exercise its discrimination whether it should prohibit the import into the notified area of every kind or only of one kind of cotton. The Local Government may say that in a particular season, they will allow cotton seed to come in without any restriction, or they may allow cotton waste which may be required for some particular purpose. But the Local Government will not say that particular varieties of cotton may come in under licence and other varieties may not. We recognise that in these notified areas there may be mills which may require for perfectly legitimate purposes cotton from outside. What will happen then is that the Local Government will issue through a licensing authority a licence to that mill to import so much cotton into that area. (Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: "Any kind of cotton"?) Yes, every kind of cotton. When the cotton comes before the station master of the consigning station, the only obligation that we lay upon him is to see whether or not that particular consignment is covered by a proper licence from the licensing authority. The station master will have no other duty than to see whether or not the consignment is covered by a licence. He will have nothing to do with the variety of the cotton or anything of that kind. His duty is perfectly clear. And the reason why we have had to put in this clause is this. Under the Railways Act, every railway administration is required to provide reasonable facilities for the transport and carriage of goods. The railway administrations are not entitled to refuse to receive goods for carriage unless they are particularly dangerous goods in which case they may receive it on conditions. But ordinarily, a general carrier like a railway administration must receive the goods, and that is why we propose to empower the station master to refuse to receive cotton for consignment to a notified area except when there is a licence. We must make provision for that in this Bill and that is why we have put in the words "Notwithstanding anything contained in the Indian Railways Act." Now this amendment suggests that if the railway official refuses to receive cotton which is not covered by a licence, and which it is proposed to send to a notified area, he should at once without delay inform the consignor of the fact. There is no need to provide anything of that kind. What happens when you take goods to a railway station? You tender it. If it is refused, you are told on the nail why it has been refused. Moreover, in all these cases when a notification has been issued by the Local Government, that notification will be communicated to the railway administrations and posted up in all goods sheds. Then it is suggested that the station master must inform the licensing authority, in order presumably, that the licensing authority may issue a licence if he so thinks fit. That is not the job of the station master. That is for the person who wishes to consign cotton. If he has got any particular reason why he wants cotton to get into a particular area, it is for him to go to the licensing authority in that area and get the necessary licence. I do not see that there is the slightest necessity for making the amendment suggested by Mr. Agnihotri. As I have pointed out, Mr. Agnihotri has entirely misapprehended the whole scope of this clause. I oppose the amendment.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Then may I know why you have inserted the words 'being cotton of a kind of which the delivery at such notified station has been prohibited'? If you were to omit these words, then the interpretation which you suggest will be correct. But so long as you retain those words, you give the station master discretion to find out whether the cotton is of that variety or not.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: It is explained by clause 8 of the Bill.

Mr. Chairman: The amendment before the House is:

"That to sub-clause (1) of clause 4 the following proviso be added:

'Provided that the railway officials on refusing, shall without any unreasonable delay inform the consignor and the authority entitled to grant a license for transport, the fact of such a refusal and shall carry out the order that the licensing authority may pass directing him to so receive for carriage or to so forward, or allow the cotton to be so carried.'

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that clause 4, as amended by the Joint Committee, do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, my second amendment is similar to the one that I moved before. The Honourable Mr. Innes was pleased to point out in answer to my amendment dealing with the necessity for information to the consignor that the consignor was informed at the moment his consignment was refused and not booked. But the Honourable Mr. Innes I regret to say has not seen to this that there are three stages when the consignment could be refused. The station-master may refuse to receive or to forward or to allow it to be transported. He may receive it and may subsequently disallow its transport. It may happen like that, and therefore such information was necessary, but as the clause is thrown out, I need not say anything further. I beg to move:

"That in clause 5 the following proviso be added:

'Provided that the railway officials so refusing the delivery of the cotton shall, without any unreasonable delay, give an intimation of such refusal to the consignee and the authority entitled to grant a licence for transport and shall not return the cotton but will give delivery to the consignee if so ordered by the licensing authority.'

The Honourable Mr. Innes has pointed out that I am under a misapprehension as to the railway station official's right to judge or find out for himself the quality or variety of cotton consigned, but he has done me an injustice in not looking to the subsequent insertion made by the Joint Committee and to its effect on clause 4 and to its effect on the whole of clause 5. If the insertions had not been made, the station official would have on non-production of the licence been simply entitled to refuse the delivery or refuse to receive for transport, as the clause in the Bill had a provision that unless both the stations be in the notified area or the consignor produced a licence, the railway official could refuse. He could have done that even before, but by this insertion you do give him further power to discriminate and find out for himself the variety of cotton consigned. The moment the Local Government notifies that a particular variety of cotton is prohibited from being sent or transported to a particular area, it will certainly mean according to my interpretation that he shall certainly be justified in making that discrimination and finding out for himself whether or not that particular variety of cotton has been prohibited. In the subsequent amendment that I put before the House I provide that if the delivery has been refused, the consignment should not, ipso facto, be returned to the station from which it had been received but the station official should inform the licensing authority and the consignee also in order to enable them to take such steps that they may be pleased to take in order to have the delivery made. With these words, I commend my amendment again for the consideration of the House. It will be very hard for the consignee to have the goods transported back to station from which they emanated even though, in the meantime, he may be taking steps for obtaining a licence from the licensing authority. Therefore, it is necessary that the consignee should be intimated and at the same time the licensing authority should also be intimated of the refusal of delivery of such consignment to the consignee. With these few words I move my amendment.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, Mr. Agnihotri spent the greater part of his speech not in dealing with the amendment to clause 5 but in expressing his dissatisfaction at the rate of his amendment to clause 4. In the circumstances, perhaps, I need not speak at any great length upon the amendment to clause 5.

I should like the House to consider what the objects of this Bill are. They are, as I have said, to stop a real danger to our cotton in India, a danger which is based upon a fraudulent practice. We have been accused in this Bill of not going far enough. The Bill is an experimental Bill and we have deliberately made the penalty as light as possible. There is no penalty at all upon station master who forwards cotton not covered by a licence. But a statutory obligation is placed upon the station master of the receiving station. All that he is required to do is to return the cotton. Surely, we could not have a Bill which is much more lenient than that. But Mr. Agnihotri wishes to destroy the effect of even the modest measure which we propose. He wishes the station master to delay and to inform the consignee and to give him a chance of obtaining a licence. Surely, that is unnecessary. The cotton will have to wait for 14 days. The consignee, if he is an honest consignee or if his licence is wrong, will have that period in which to appeal to the licensing authority. But I wish again to say that it is not the business of the station master to have any concern at all with the licensing authority. The duty laid upon him is perfectly clear. It is to see whether or not a particular consignment is covered by a licence. Sir, I hope that the House will not accept this amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 5, as amended by the Joint Committee, was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move an amendment to clause 6 which is to this effect:

"After the words and figure 'sub-section (1)' the words and figure 'of section 4 and' be inserted."

Clause 6 provides for penalties for the import of prohibited cotton. It also provides that if any station master allows delivery of cotton in a notified area, of a variety which has been prohibited by the Local Government, that station official is liable to a penalty under clause 6. I regret to say that I have not yet been convinced that clause 4 does not serve. . . (Laughter) I beg to revert to clause 4 because I move an amendment for the inclusion of that clause in clause 6, and with that view I am constrained to make a comment on the wording of clause 4 again. If the insertion printed in italics in that clause had not been made, clause 4 would have had the same interpretation as has been given by the Honourable Mr. Innes, but by that insertion, I am still of the same opinion, that you authorise the station officials to discriminate the variety which has been prohibited from the variety permitted by the Local Government. If my interpretation is correct, in that case I submit that the insertion of sub-clause (1) of clause 4 is absolutely necessary in clause 6 also. If the station master wrongly or maliciously refuses the transport of cotton or does not allow the cotton other than the prohibited variety to be transported from his station to a station in the notified area he should be made equally liable to the penalty as has been provided for in the case of his giving delivery of the prohibited cotton within the notified area. Therefore I submit that the penalty should also be provided against a station master wrongfully refusing to receive the cotton or to transport it to a station in the notified area. This will provide a check on the railway official who would otherwise be prompt in refusing until he is bribed or satisfied otherwise, and this will lead to much corruption and obstruction of trade.

Mr. Chairman: You are moving all the clauses (a), (b) and (c). Otherwise it will be meaningless.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: It comes to the same thing. If (a) fails then the others go.

Mr. Chairman: Then they have been moved together.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: You may take it that way, Sir.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I have some difficulty in understanding what is intended by this amendment. Mr. Agnihotri is still harping upon the failure of his amendment to clause 4 and apparently he wishes by this amendment to clause 6 in some way to achieve the object he had in view when he proposed his amendment to clause 4. Shall I be in order in again explaining away his difficulty in regard to clause 4.

Mr. Chairman: That is not necessary.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: At any rate his amendment to clause 6 is as follows. He wants in clause 6 to introduce a penalty for a station master who refuses to forward cotton. That is not within the scope of this Bill. As I have explained we are placing in this Bill a statutory obligation upon a station master at a receiving station to refuse the delivery of the cotton unless that cotton is covered by a licence. Naturally when we place a statutory obligation upon an officer or upon a person we provide a penalty for that person. Mr. Agnihotri wants us now to revert to clause 4 and wants us to provide that a station master who refuses to forward cotton improperly should also be penalised. Mr. Agnihotri however has not realised that matters of this kind should be dealt with by an amendment of the Railways Act or of the Carriers Act. I am not quite sure which it is. It is under these Acts that Railway Administrations have to provide reasonable facilities and if any penalty is to be provided when those facilities have been withheld improperly by a station master, it should be provided by an amendment of these Acts and not by introducing entirely unnecessary sentences into a clause of this Bill which is intended for an entirely different purpose.

Mr. Chairman: The motion before the House is—

That in clause 6:

- (a) after the words and figure 'sub-section (1)' the words and figure 'of section 4' and 'be inserted;
- (b) after the words 'upon him' the words 'refuses to receive, forward or allow to be carried, or returns or' be inserted;
- (c) after the words 'other person' the words 'fails to carry out the order of the licensing authority' be inserted."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that clause 6, as amended by the Joint Committee, do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that clauses 7 and 8, as amended by the Joint Committee, do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that clause 9, the Title of the Bill, and the Preamble of the Bill do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I move that the Bill, as amended, be passed.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that the Bill to provide for the restriction and control of the transport of cotton in certain circumstances, as amended, be passed.

The motion was adopted.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Wednesday, the 31st January, 1923.

GIFT OF BOOKS BY SIR WILLIAM GEARY BAR

Mr. President: I have further to acquaint the Assembly that through the generosity of an English gentleman interested in the welfare of the Indian Legislature, namely, Sir William Geary, Bart., the Library of the Indian Legislature now possesses some interesting Parliamentary records of English history. These records are mainly in the form of Reports of the Proceedings of the House of Commons, and in some cases also of the House of Lords, during the 17th and 18th Centuries. They have an historical interest of their own, and they form the foundation of the procedure which we ourselves are engaged in practising from day to day within these walls. I am sure I shall be voicing the unanimous feeling of the Assembly if I transmit to Sir William Geary, the donor of these volumes, our very cordial thanks for this substantial pledge of his interest in the welfare of the Indian Legislature. (Cheers.)

THE INDIAN NAVAL ARMAMENT BILL.

Mr. E. Burdon (Army Secretary): Sir, I move:

"That the Bill to give effect in British India to the Treaty for the limitation of Naval Armament be taken into consideration."

When I introduced the Bill in this Assembly last September I explained briefly its purpose and significance. The legislation contemplated arises out of the Treaty for the limitation of Naval Armament signed at Washington on behalf of His Majesty, the King, and certain other Powers on the 6th February 1922, the object of the Treaty being to contribute to the maintenance of the general peace and to reduce the burden of competition in armament. The Bill requires no further justification or explanation from me.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Bill to give effect in British India to the Treaty for the limitation of Naval Armament be taken into consideration."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Clause 1. The question is that this clause stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Clauses 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14. The question is that these clauses stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that this be the Schedule to the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that this be the Title and the Preamble of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. E. Burdon: Sir, I move that the Bill be passed.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Bill to give effect in British India to the Treaty for the limitation of Naval Armament be passed."

The motion was adopted.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. President: The Assembly will now resume consideration of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Court-fees Act, 1870, as passed by the Council of State.

On the last occasion when the proceedings were interrupted the Assembly was engaged in the consideration of the amendment by Mr. Agnihotri to the effect that in clause 33, in the proviso to sub-section (1), insert the words 'allow inspection to the accused and'.

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, I think it is advisable in the first instance to endeavour to remove the misapprehensions which have been disclosed in the debate which has already proceeded on this amendment. Clause 33 proposes to substitute a new sub-section for sub-section (1) of section 162. That, Sir, is one of the most important sections in the Code of Criminal Procedure, not only from the point of view of the investigation of offences but also from the point of view of the proper prosecution of offences, particularly, if I may say so, in our Magistrates' Courts. Now, Sir, in the course of the debate, my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, said that "under the Code copies of these statements were furnished to the accused. Later on in the consolidating Act this proviso was modified and found its place as it does in the current Code of Criminal Procedure." He was referring, Sir, to the Code of 1882. Section 162 in that Code ran as follows:

"No statement, other than a dying declaration, made by any person to a police officer in the course of an investigation under this Chapter shall, if reduced to writing, be signed by the person making it or be used as evidence against the accused."

I am aware, Sir, of the different rulings under that section, but it is clear that Dr. Gour was not quite correct in suggesting that it expressly gave the accused the right to obtain copies of these statements. That section was replaced by section 162 of the present Code, and we are dealing now with the proviso inserted by the Lowndes Committee in lieu of the proviso to sub-section (1) of that section. That proviso, Sir, introduces a difference in the ordinary rule of evidence regarding the use of previous statements made by witnesses. Generally speaking, they may be used not only for corroborating the evidence of witnesses in Court but for discrediting the evidence. The proviso in the Code of 1898 and the proviso in the clause as drafted by Sir George Lowndes' Committee restricts the use of these statements to the purpose of impeaching the credit of a witness produced for the prosecution. I want also, Sir, to impress upon the House that we are dealing here with statements recorded by a police officer. We are not dealing with the police diary. Police diaries are dealt with under section 172, and in the police diary the police officer day by day enters his proceedings, setting forth the time at which the information reached him, the time at which he began and closed his investigation, the place or places visited by him and the statement of the circumstances ascertained through his investigation. That, Sir, is a different thing entirely to the statements which we are now dealing with. In the police diary there may be the purport of the statement of a witness to the police, but the record of the statement will not usually, or ought not to, be contained in the diary. Now, under the proviso it will be seen that the court is required on the request of the accused person to refer to such writing and may then, if the court thinks it expedient in the interests of justice, direct that the accused be furnished with a copy thereof. The Honourable Mover of the amendment wishes to make it compulsory on the part of the court to allow to the accused person inspection of the statements in all cases. What were the arguments used in support of this amendment? In the first place my Honourable friend Mr. Agnihotri said, referring to the time when the accused was brought up for trial: "It therefore generally happens that though the accused knows nothing about the statements, still he requests the court to go through them to find out if there are any contradictions, and the Magistrate has therefore to waste his time unnecessarily." The whole ground, therefore, of his amendment, as stated by him, was that the present procedure involves a waste of time. I submit, Sir, that in the circumstances of India, in view of the prosecuting agency which is usually available to our Magistrates, it is most necessary that the Magistrate should refer to these statements. It is his duty to do so; that is the only way in which he can find out what the witness is able to testify to, and it is the only way in which he can be sure that he is conducting the trial properly. I think, therefore, Sir, that we may at once neglect this argument.

My Honourable friend Sir Henry Stanyon stated that he did not remember one single instance in seven years' work as a Divisional Sessions Judge in which he was ever asked to delay the trial so that copies of these statements might be prepared and handed over to the accused. As regards that suggestion, Sir, I will merely remark that in my own experience I have used the provisions of the proviso and I am sure that that must be the experience of other persons in this Assembly who have experience as Magistrates or as Sessions Judges.

I turn now, Sir, to the objection raised by my Honourable and learned friend Dr. Gour. He says, "Ever since this proviso was inserted I have had numerous cases in which I have asked the Judge or the Magistrate, as the case may be, to refer to the statements of witnesses made before the police. He has looked at it and he says to me, 'I have referred to it' and thus complied with the provisions of this proviso; but I was none the wiser by the Judge's reference to the police diary and the result was that I was not able to cross-examine witnesses with reference to the previous contradictory statements which in the appellate court were a revelation to me." Well, Sir, that is an entirely different question and I propose to return to that later. We must remember, as I have said already, that we have here a modification of the ordinary rule of evidence as to the use of previous statements, and I submit, Sir, that it is impossible for us to provide in the Code that it shall be compulsory on the part of the Magistrate to allow to the accused person inspection of these documents in every case. Let us refer, Sir, to the remarks in the report of the Select Committee on the present section 162—I mean the Select Committee which sat on the Code of Criminal Procedure Bill which became the present Code of 1898. They said:

"In the first place, it is essential in the interests of public justice that the sources of police information should be kept secret. If the names of informers or detectives and the nature of their information be disclosed the detection of crime would be seriously crippled."

Well, Sir, does this Assembly wish to cripple the detection of crime? I am sure that the answer is 'No.' But if this amendment in the form in which it has been moved is carried, I submit that we shall be going a long way towards crippling the detection of crime. These statements, Sir, are the statements of a witness; a portion of them may be of use to the accused, it may be in the interests of justice that he should see them in order to be able to discredit the statements made by the witness in the court afterwards. But, Sir, they may contain all sorts of other information. Why do we have that provision in section 125 of the Indian Evidence Act which says that:

"No Magistrate or police officer shall be compelled to say whence he got any information as to the commission of any offence."

The sources of police information may well, Sir, be contained within the four corners of these statements, and we cannot therefore amend the Code so as to require that in all cases the accused person shall be able to inspect these statements. I agree, Sir, that in cases such as those referred to by

Dr. Gour the intention of the present provision in the Code is that, if it is in the interests of justice that the accused should be supplied with a copy, and unless there is some paramount reason against this course being taken, the court ought to supply a copy of the statement. I hope that most Courts would do that at the present time without requiring any amendment of the provisions in the proviso. But in order to meet the wishes of the Mover of this amendment and of those who supported him, I would suggest that in lieu of the present amendment the following amendment should be made, viz.,

"That in clause 33 in the proviso of the proposed new sub-section (1) of section 162 for the words beginning with 'may then' and ending with 'in order that any part of such statement,' the following be substituted, namely:

'shall then direct that the accused be furnished with a copy of such part, if any, of the statement as the Court thinks it expedient to furnish in the interests of justice in order that such part ' and so on. (Dr. H. S. Gour: "That is no good at all.") I will read out the proviso as it will stand:

"Provided that, when any witness is called for the prosecution in such inquiry or trial whose statement has been reduced into writing as aforesaid, the Court shall, on the request of the accused, refer to such writing and shall then direct that the accused be furnished with a copy of such part, if any, of the statement as the Court thinks it expedient to furnish in the interests of justice in order that such part may be used to contradict such witness in the manner provided"

(Dr. Nand Lal: "I do not think it will serve the purpose.") That, Sir, meets entirely any substance that there is in the arguments which have been adduced in favour of the amendment now before this House. We must, Sir, retain for the Court the power of deciding. It is impossible, Sir, for us to provide in the Code that these statements shall in any case be given over to the accused. That would be the result of the amendment proposed. As soon as any witness appears the accused will ask the Court to refer to the statement. It will be the normal course; it will be done every time, and then the Court is bound to hand it over. That, Sir, I submit, would entirely cripple the detection of crime in this country. (Voice: "How?") because as I have said already these statements not only contain statements which may be of value to the accused person but they will also contain all sorts of other information. (Dr. H. S. Gour: "That is part of the case diary"); (Dr. Nand Lal: "Confidential reports are quite separate.") Before I sit down, Sir, I would like to refer to another point. It will be remembered that in the course of the discussion of Mr. Pantulu's amendment on the first part of section 162, an arrangement was come to between the Honourable Members opposite and the Members on this Bench. The amendment moved by my Honourable friend Mr. Pantulu was for the substitution of the words "as evidence" for the words "for any purpose". We, on this Bench, were prepared to accept that amendment, but at the instance of Honourable Members opposite, we decided not to vote for it, because they agreed that when discussing section 172 later we should provide in it for the use of these statements in the same way as the diary may be used to assist the Court in its inquiry. The Court, Sir, must be able to use these statements to this extent; otherwise, what, Sir, is the use of the police officer recording these statements? It will be of no value at all if it cannot be used for any purpose in the inquiry or trial of the offence which is then being investigated. This, Sir, is not a new amendment at all. It follows definitely from the discussion of Mr. Pantulu's amendment, and after the amendment which I have just moved has been put to the House, I should propose, with your permission, Sir, the following amendment also:

"That in clause 33 to the proposed new sub-section (1) of section 162 the following proviso be added, namely:

"Provided further that the Court may in the course of the inquiry or trial send for the record of any such statement and may use such statement not as evidence in the case but to aid it in the inquiry or trial."

We propose, Sir, that this should be included in section 162 rather than in section 172 which was suggested by my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, because section 172 refers to the diary, and this section, which refers to the recorded statements taken down by a police officer is the proper section in which to provide for this provision.

Mr. President: I cannot put the amendment moved by the Honourable Member on my right, because, though it offers an alternative to the amendment standing in the name of Mr. Agnihotri, it cannot be included in the same place. I propose, however, to allow the discussion to proceed on the basis of the alternative proposed, so that the matter open now is not only the original amendment of Mr. Agnihotri but the alternative proposal of the Government, on the understanding that if hereafter we come to the actual moving of the amendment by Mr. Tonkinson that will be treated as a formal stage.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, this is a very important amendment before the House. If the administration of criminal justice in this country is to be improved at all, this amendment ought to be carried. It is not only my opinion, Sir; it is only yesterday I received a letter from a gentleman who is practising in Coimbatore for the last 35 years and he is not a politician at all, as he says. He says:

"The reason for my troubling you is my very grave anxiety and concern in the matters which I am now placing before you. I have had nearly 35 years' experience in the mofussal Courts mostly on the criminal side, and I feel very strongly that as the law is now being administered in the mofussal, unless these amendments are embodied in the Bill, accused persons are gravely handicapped and there will be a strong feeling that there is no longer British justice. As you know, I have never been an Indian politician, never joined the Congress and I am supposed to be an anti-Congressman. The amendments that I consider very essential are that the grant of copies of statements under section 162, etc., to the accused should be made mandatory and imperative and not discretionary as it now is and that they should be granted as soon as the inquiry or trial has commenced and before the accused are called upon to cross-examine the prosecution witnesses."

Sir, let us remember where we are and what the matter is. We are now in a Court of Justice. The police have passed the stage of investigation of the crime and placed the accused before the Court; and, as a matter of fact, under this section, the witness is actually in the box, mark the words—provided that when any witness is called for the prosecution, etc.,—then only this question arises. Therefore it is not the detection stage which my Honourable friend has in view and which he is so anxious to safeguard. The detection stage is already over; we have now come to the prosecution stage. The police are in possession of evidence which they place before the Court, and this witness is actually put in the box against the accused person. And what is wanted? His previous statement recorded by the police. For what purpose? In order to see if he has made contradictory statements. Sir, it is admitted in the section as it stands that it will be useful for the accused that these previous statements shall be available to the Court, but what the section now lays down is that the Court is to determine whether it should allow a copy to be given or not. Sir, those of us who have to practise in the profession know how little the Courts know as to what the accused wants. The accused is the man to judge. He knows his line of defence; he knows what the weakness of the prosecution witness is. He knows best how to deal with the previous statement made by a witness in the defence. How is the Court in a position to judge? The Court is not in possession of the full facts of the case. The prosecution has just begun; the prosecution witnesses are being examined. The Court does not know what the case of the accused is and what his evidence will be. Therefore the Court is called upon to do a thing which it is humanly difficult for any human being to perform. Therefore I say this is a futile provision. And it is not only a futile provision. In this country as we know all executive and judicial functions are combined in the same individual and Magistrates depend for their promotion and livelihood on the goodwill of the District Superintendent of Police, and also on the District Magistrates. Sir, what is the meaning of leaving this discretionary power in the hands of Magistrates like that? I can understand Sessions Judges being entrusted with discretionary powers like that; they are only concerned with justice. We, Sir, in this Legislature are anxious to promote the administration of justice. Courts do not exist merely to secure convictions; Courts exist to promote justice. Let the accused have full opportunity. What is it after all? Here is a public officer—a policeman is a public officer—who records a statement from a witness. It is that statement which is asked for. How is it going to prevent a detection of crime. I fail to see. That is the substantial argument used by Mr. Tonkinson, because the accused looks at the previous statement of a witness. Is it my Honourable friend's contention that the witness in the box has made statements not relating to the case about some other crime? Is it that the witness has not made statements with reference to the crime under investigation, but has been called upon to make statements irrelevant to the crime? Then, Sir, if that is the practice, the sooner that practice is abandoned, the better, and this will be the best method of having that practice abandoned. Let all statements be confined to the particular case concerned. Why should the police go about hunting for information about other cases from witnesses connected with the crime? Therefore I fail to see how detection will suffer. My Honourable friend referred to section 135 of the Evidence Act. I fail to see what that has got to do with it. We are now concerned with the previous statement of the witness, not with the source of knowledge of the policeman or the officer. It is not a question of the accused trying to ferret out information which the policeman may know. This is a record made of this man's statement who now comes forward as a witness. What the prosecution will be afraid of is that this man has made a contradictory statement beforehand and they will carefully suppress it. They do not want the accused to know what this man has said. That is the real secret of the opposition of the police in many cases to showing these statements to the accused person. Therefore, Sir, justice suffers by this provision remaining as it is. It is a futile provision to entrust this discretion to the hands of Magistrates who are not judicial officers pure and simple. Therefore, Sir, I think this right ought to be given to the accused person, and I strongly support the amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): Sir, as one who I think may claim to take just as much interest in the proper administration of justice as my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, I feel very anxious indeed that the House should not treat this matter lightly, and that they should understand most carefully what it is they are setting about to do. I still see some indication that there is some confusion in the minds of Honourable Members with regard to these two matters, sections 162 and 172. Members are freely talking about diaries. 162 does not deal with the diaries. Do let us get that point clear in our minds. Members have talked about diaries being shown to the defence.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: We did not say anything about diaries.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Section 172 lays down what the diary contains:

"Every police-officer making an investigation under this chapter shall day by day enter his proceedings in the investigation in a diary, setting forth the time at which the information reached him, the time at which he began and closed his investigation, the place or places visited by him, and a statement of the circumstances ascertained through his investigation."

Now the statement of the circumstances ascertained through his investigation will mean the purport of the evidence that he has received from the witnesses; it won't be the statement, certainly not the statements recorded under section 161 of the Code. Now we are not concerned in this case with showing the defence the diaries at all. These are statements recorded in full and verbatim, quite apart from the record of his proceedings which the police officer makes in the diary. Now what Mr. Agnihotri's amendment of this clause contemplates is this. A case comes before the Magistrate. A prosecution witness is called. That is how the proviso begins. A prosecution witness is called and the Court hands the defence the statement. This is to be obligatory and is to take place on every occasion on which a prosecution witness is called. That will be sometimes on the average 25 times a day in every Magistrate's Court; the Court will hand across this statement. (Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: "No.") My Honourable friend says no. He has not the slightest idea of the amount of criminal work our Magistrates have got to get through. If they take up twelve cases a day, and two witnesses per case is not an extravagant number to allow, I say and I repeat that some 25 times a day the Magistrate will have to hand over to the accused a copy of the statement which has been made by the prosecution witness who is being called at that moment and who is stepping into the witness box. Now, Sir, what will be the effect of that? The police will know that this is going to happen. They record what the witness says to them. What the witness says may be relevant or it may not. My Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, said everything that a witness said, everything that is recorded is relevant, and therefore the accused should have it. Now, Sir, is the ordinary investigating officer so familiar with the law of evidence that he knows what to record and what not to record, which statements made by the witness are to be relevant and which are not? He does not know, Sir. He takes down everything that is said to him by the witness hoping that there may be something which, though for the moment he cannot see the relevancy of it, will aid him in his investigation. Now the police officer, as I say, being in the habit of recording this statement in full, will say to himself "if I put the witness into the witness box, the whole of his statement will have to be handed by the Court to the defence." What is going to be the effect of that? Honourable Members will find that there is no provision in the Code which makes it compulsory for a police officer to record a statement in writing. Section 161 gives the investigating officer power to examine witnesses orally. If the statement is of any importance he records it in writing; if it is not, there merely goes down in the diary a record that such and such a witness was examined and corroborated another witness, or just the purport goes into the diary. If these statements are all going to be made available to the defence, every word of them, the police officer will say "If I am to disclose to a particular accused person all the sources of my information, I shall record nothing; I shall merely put into the diary a bare purport of what I have discovered from examining a witness under section 161." The defence will get nothing, the Court will merely get the assistance under section 172 of that brief record; the Superintendent of Police will be prevented from checking thoroughly the work of his subordinate investigating officers; the diaries will not be of much help to him, to the Court or to the accused. That is the first effect. 25 statements handed over by the Magistrate daily to the defence to use or not to use as they think fit. Surely, Sir, this House will realise that the present system, where discretion is left with the Magistrate, is much more convenient and tends much more to the speedy administration of justice. Cases will be intolerably delayed when the witness is put into the witness-box and the defence pleader says: "Give me ten minutes; I want to read this and see what I can get out of it." The duration of every case will be prolonged and, if you go by the figures of cases that the Magistrates try, the delay in the disposal of criminal cases will be intolerable.

Mr. Bangachariar said that the courts do not exist merely for the purpose of securing convictions. I would seriously ask this Assembly to put it to itself whether the Legislature exists merely for the purpose of securing acquittals.

Mr. Pyari Lal (Meerut Division; Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, may I know from the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith, what is the object of the criminal administration of justice? The object is to secure justice to a man who is supposed to have committed a crime. The police are asked to investigate. Why? Simply to save the time of Magistrates in going over matters which may, after all, result in nothing. The object is that the police officer may go to the place where the crime is supposed to have been committed at once, that is, at the earliest opportunity, collect together the men who are living in the locality and learn from them as to what is the real state of things. If he does his duty, he records the statements made to him. Having done so, what is there to hold these statements back from the accused. It is perfectly plain that the police must place their cards on the table. If they have done their duty, they have nothing to fear; but what I know happens, especially in the mufassil, is this. It is all very well in the abstract to say the Magistrate shall in every case exercise his discretion. But I know, as a matter of fact, that they do not, especially in the mufassil, where you have a number of Honorary Magistrates, who, to use an Urdu expression are anari Magistrates, that is to say, they are perfectly ignorant. I happen to be an Honorary Magistrate myself, and, therefore, I have the courage of my convictions to say before this Assembly what I generally notice. These Magistrates, Sir, are under the thumb of the police. (Mr. R. A. Spence: "Are you not an Honorary Magistrate?") Are there no exceptions, Sir? In the mufassil what happens is this. When the police chalaan a case they consider it to be a point of izzat, they consider it to be a point of honour, with them, that the man whom they have sent up should be convicted. For this purpose they bring pressure to bear on the Magistrate and if, unfortunately, he is an Honorary Magistrate, a kind of pressure which he is not able to withstand. The result is that this provision in the law that a Magistrate is allowed a discretion remains a dead letter. Sometimes, when the Magistrate is a mild sort of a gentleman, he smiles at the request of the counsel for the defence and says: "Yes, I will go into it," and in the end you find he has not done so and that you have trusted to his mere word. As the saying goes "It is much better that 100 guilty men should escape rather than that one innocent man should suffer." What I submit is that the Magistrates and the Courts exist for the purpose of doing justice, and no matter what amount of time they have to spend over it they must do their duty. I do not quite realise what the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith means by saying that it would mean any amount of inconvenience to the Magistrates who have got very heavy work. There may be 80 witnesses that they have to go through and if they are to supply copies, how will they get through their work? That is all very well, but, if they are there, they must do their work properly; whether it takes them two days or a week, they must get through it, because it may be a matter of life and death for the person who is standing in the dock as an accused. I submit, Sir, that these statements made to the police are not only necessary for the purpose of contradicting witnesses, who appear before the Court, but they are very important in other respects, and I say this from my experience of the last 40 years both on the Bench and at the Bar. You find a particular witness comes before the Court and deposes to a certain state of things. The private information of the counsel for the defence is that this witness is not speaking the truth and that this witness said something very different before the police, and that this witness was procured 8 or 10 days after the actual occurrence and at the instance of the accused's enemies. Now, how are you to clear up those points? The man may say exactly what he had said, but he has said so to the police 8 or 10 days after the crime, whereas, if he were a truthful witness, he ought to have been present when the police officer went to investigate the crime, on the same day. We also want to know whether this witness has come forward of his own accord or whether some pressure of the kind suggested by the accused has been brought to bear on him.

Now will not these things matter very seriously in deciding as to whether the witness is credible or otherwise, and therefore from all points of view I do not see any purpose in the Government withholding those police papers from the accused at the time when he is put on his trial.

Mr. P. P. Ginzwa (Burma: Non-European): Sir, in my opinion no case has been made out by the Government for the rejection of this amendment. The last speaker on behalf of Government made the remark that it would be extremely inconvenient if on every occasion a Magistrate had to give a copy of a witness's statement as he was being examined in Court. I do not understand what he means by that argument at all. Why does he suppose that if the Magistrate is deprived of this discretion and if the furnishing of copies is made obligatory, copies will have to be as these witnesses are produced in Court. The accused can apply for copies of statements made before the police in the same way as he applies for copies of evidence, in the ordinary way.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: What is the position if any witness is not called by the prosecution?

Mr. P. P. Ginzwa: That is so, no doubt. But before the case actually commences a list of witnesses is drawn up and is filed on the record as the Honourable Member (Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith) must be aware. But even if there is a certain amount of inconvenience involved in this, it will be counterbalanced by the convenience of the accused and the safety of the accused. I can see no objection whatsoever to the copies being furnished as soon as the police have made up their minds as to what witnesses they are going to call. True the prosecutions are conducted in the lower courts in the most perfunctory fashion. The police do not know what witnesses they are going to call. They call them as they require them, so to say. But if the furnishing of copies was made obligatory, it would be incumbent on the police to make up their minds before the case begins in Court as to which witnesses they are going to examine, and as soon as they have made up their minds it would be quite convenient to furnish copies to the accused if he applies for them.

Now I will tell the House my experience of this business. I come from a province from which my friend Mr. Tonkinson also comes, and as he knows, the administration of justice in that province is not as developed as in India. And what happens there? We have Magistrates there who would refuse to refer to the police papers if the accused asked them to do so. I say that from personal knowledge. They will say "Oh, what is the use of that? The witness is being examined in Court, we shall do it later on." If the Counsel for the Prosecution happens to be fair-minded especially when the accused is unfetted, he draws the attention of the Court to some statement by a particular witness before the police. The Magistrate, instead of feeling grateful to the Counsel for the Prosecution, goes for him and says it is no part of his business to draw the attention of the Court to what took place before the police. I am not exaggerating at all. I have heard it with my own ears and I have been rebuked by the Court on several occasions and the Court has been rebuked back by me—it is needless for me to say. Things like that do happen.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: In Burma.

(Some Honourable Members: "In other Provinces also. All over India.")

Mr. P. P. Ginzwa: In Burma; I have experience of another Presidency also, but I hope that Presidency has improved since I left it.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Burma is a part of India.

Mr. P. P. Ginzwa: The point remains, Sir, that,—I would put it in this way—that prosecutions are conducted in such a perfunctory fashion in the courts of the Magistrates that unless a Magistrate is extremely conscientious, and, what is more, not afraid of the police at all, all the facts will not be produced before the Court.

I will give you another instance. On several occasions even in the Sessions Court—the High Court this time and not the Court of a Magistrate—I have discovered that when a case was committed to the Court the Magistrate had been so careless as not to have made a reference to the statement made before the police by a witness though it was entirely different from that made before the Court, and no Court could have convicted if the Magistrate had been careful enough to go into the police papers and get the truth out of the witness.

And do you think you are going to prevent the accused from obtaining copies of these statements? If an accused person is a well-to-do individual I have always noticed that he is extremely well prepared as to the facts which have been taken down by the police. How does that happen? I have seen, in a large number of cases, actual copies of statements made before the police in the possession of the Counsel for the accused.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): The police is fair-minded, I suppose.

Mr. P. P. Ginwala: I have known a Judge of the High Court ask Counsel for the accused, how he had come to know what a certain witness had said to the police; and this Counsel for the accused had to tell the Court to mind its business. In any case, the facts were in his possession. On the other hand, in the case of an undefended accused, even if the Counsel for the Crown has read the statements recorded by the Magistrate; and he is, unfortunately more interested sometimes in obtaining convictions than in securing justice. There are such men, there is no doubt about that. He himself has not studied the police papers. The Judge sits there. He has never examined the police records. The poor accused is undefended. A most important statement might have been made to the police which escapes the attention of the Court, the Counsel and the Jury, and the accused is convicted.

Now, Sir, is it worth while running so much risk in order that some time may be saved to the police and to the Courts, for that is what the argument amounts to.

Another argument put forward by the last speaker on behalf of Government was that the police do not know what is relevant and what is irrelevant when they take down a statement. Well, I say if the police is so incompetent, change it. They ought to know their business and because they do not know their business that should not be an argument. When they are investigating a case, they must know what facts are relevant and what are not; and supposing a fact that is irrelevant is recorded by the police, what injury will it do to the prosecution that an irrelevant fact gets into the hands of the accused. If the accused were entitled to obtain copies of statements, there would be a certain guarantee that the police would do their work in a more efficient manner, would be more careful, would be more honest; and, it would certainly lead to the purification of police administration. You may take it from me, Sir, when I say this, that it is true—that when an accused is a well-to-do individual he manages to obtain copies of statements or is placed in possession of statements made before the police. And that is a thing that ought to be put a stop to.

Then it was stated that it is not obligatory on the part of the police to record statements. What police officer is going to run the risk of keeping in his memory a statement which was orally made to him? He will never be able to get a conviction. He knows his business too well to run that risk; for a witness may be examined by him to-day and may not be produced in Court for a month. Is the police officer going to take the risk of his forgetting or remembering what that witness stated? He is bound to take it down for his own protection and for the protection of justice. A statement which ought to be taken down under section 162 can not be entered in the diary alone. He must take down the statement in the ordinary way. In addition to that, he has to summarize it down in the diary. The diary is more for the guidance of the police themselves, whereas these statements are more for the guidance of the Court, and he can not impose on the Court by transferring to the diary what he ought to have recorded in another place: that would be thoroughly dishonest—to record statements in the diary in order to prevent the accused from knowing what a particular witness stated. There is also another reason. He has got to have a certain guarantee that a statement made to the police will be adhered to by the witness when examined in Court. And where is the guarantee if he does not take the statement down? For his own protection he has got to take the statement down. If the prosecution is 12 Noon. prepared to take the risk of the statement not being taken down the accused is prepared to do so likewise. The accused does not care whether the prosecution witnesses' statements are taken down by the police or not. I repeat, Sir, that for his own protection the police-officer should make a point of taking down the statements unless he wishes to be thoroughly dishonest and takes it down in some other record to which the accused cannot have access in the ordinary way. I submit, further, that far from taking more time it would facilitate the ends of justice, it would expedite the prosecution cases if the accused before he is tried is furnished with copies of the statements because it is common experience that many questions have to be put by the counsel for accused to witnesses as to what they might have stated to the police, and that is a way in which more time is likely to be wasted than would be the case if counsel were to be prepared with copies of the statements before he comes into court; and if he finds there is nothing in those statements, if he knows his business, he will not waste the time of the court. On the other hand you cannot shut out counsel from asking questions, very often irrelevant questions, which take up more time than the relevant questions and which he would not have put if he had got copies of the statements. On these grounds I support the amendment and I hope there will be no question of a difference of opinion on this point on the part of those at least who are interested in the administration of justice and who have practical experience of the working of magisterial courts as well as courts of sessions.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith has given so luminous a description of our position, that I should not have attempted to add to it, if we had not since he spoke heard lately to my own astonishment and, I think, to the astonishment of the House also, some very extraordinary statements. We were told, for instance, that Magistrates are entirely under the thumb of the police. I shall illustrate to the House, by one of the best methods of testing the truth of such statements, the extent to which our Magistrates are under the thumb of the police. I assume that where you have a highly developed police system the police must have all the greater authority over Magistrates, and you would in such circumstances secure, if the charge is true, almost universal convictions. Now take the figures for a single year in one province, Bombay. (Mr. K. Ahmed: "Take Calcutta.") My case would be even stronger in Calcutta. Out of 207,735 persons who were under trial, these extremely subservient Magistrates only convicted 125,000 or under 62 per cent. Take the most serious classes of offences, offences against person

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Official): Were they all police cases, may I know, or cases on complaint also?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Take the police cases only if you will—instance for offences affecting life—1,164 persons under trial and 443 convictions; or serious hurt—25,000 persons under trial—2,000 convictions. This is the extent to which our Magistrates are under the thumb of the police. I have been told again that the statements recorded under this section under discussion must be open to inspection because they are useful for a good number of other purposes—that is Mr. Pyari Lal's description of them. Well, if they are used for any other purpose, then it is a clear breach of the law; the law lays down that they are to be used for one definite and defined purpose only and for no other.

Then Mr. Ginwala tells us that cases are put forward in the courts by the police in a haphazard way; he says that since the list of witnesses is prepared in advance, the accused ought to be able to obtain, as soon as that list of witnesses is put in, a copy of their statements. The police officers, he says, ought to make up their minds what witnesses they would put in. Is it for the police to do that or for the prosecution? Does the Government Prosecutor or the police choose what witnesses should appear? He also says in addition that the threat which Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith held out—though indeed it is more correctly described as an apprehension from my point of view—that if this amendment were carried the police officers would not record statements—he says that that would be an act of distinct dishonesty on the part of the police. Why? I suppose that he holds the theory that the police only record these statements to assist the court or the accused. That is not so. The statements are recorded mainly for the assistance of their own superiors in deciding on the necessity for and for guiding prosecution. It is true that the law by a somewhat exceptional provision allows these statements to be used for challenging the credibility of certain witnesses; but the primary object of recording these statements is not, as he suggests, in order that they may be used as any species of evidence before the court; they are primarily recorded for police purposes. That we in India allow them to be used for the specified purpose provided in the Act, constitutes an unusual procedure, confined, I imagine, to India alone. Do you in English courts have statements made before the police regularly recorded, and utilised for purposes of rebutment or conviction by the Court? Of course not, the law nowhere compels the police to record statements, and the exceptional procedure for the utilization of such statements as have been recorded for police purposes has only been introduced because such statements happen to be recorded; it would be no act of dishonesty at all if the police officer did not record those statements; the law does not direct him to do so. Nor would it be an act of dishonesty on the part of the senior police officers if they ordered that statements, instead of being recorded at length by police officers, were simply to be taken orally, and the purport given in their diaries. He says that the police officer would do it for his own protection. He seems to regard a statement recorded by a police officer as something equivalent to a statement recorded by a Magistrate for the purpose of binding down a witness to his statement. It is obviously nothing of the sort, the law does not allow it to be used in that manner. Now, will or will not the passing of this amendment mean that such statements will not be recorded? I say emphatically that the chances are that it will have this consequence. It will be likely to have this consequence, because the police will have reason to see real harm in making such statements public. Some doubt has been passed upon Mr. Tonkinson's substantive statement that if this amendment is carried it will be a serious hindrance to detection. Mr. Rangachariar argued that we are now at the stage of prosecution and that detection is over; the making of these statements public could not, he says, hinder detection. But I will give a concrete instance within my own experience, an instance which could perhaps be paralleled by other officers here, to know how the placing of statements of this nature, (and the amendment demands that the whole and not part of the statements should be given) in the hands of the defence would seriously re-act on detection. We were investigating a widespread conspiracy case which ended in the throwing of bombs. I believe that the approver's statement to the police ran up to 40 printed pages. Certain accused were subsequently brought up in regard to one stage only of those transactions. It was a largely ramified conspiracy which operated all over India; one particular case was brought up before the courts in regard to incidents which occurred at Lahore alone. Now I ask you—was the whole of that approver's statement to be placed in the hands of the defence? (A Voice: "Yes.") An Honourable Member says: "Yes". I welcome his interruption as allowing me to show the absurdity of any such contention. It is obvious that if you had placed the whole of the statement of the approver as recorded by the police in the hands of the defence, you would have prejudiced very gravely indeed the possibility not only of conviction but even of arrest in other cases. You would have endangered the life of more than one informer. We could not wait in that case until we had traced the whole of that conspiracy with its many ramifications throughout India; we prosecuted in the one section where we had the evidence. There must be many such cases. Take a big dacoity case. Look at its development. The police do not know exactly in the first instance what to look for, what is likely to be relevant or irrelevant; but thinking that their witness knows something about it, take down the whole of his evidence. It turns out to refer to a large series of transactions of a gang. I have known gang cases which have taken in the trying many months, have involved hundreds of accused, and a vast series of transactions. Are you going to place, in the course of the trial of one small transaction only, the whole of the statement of a witness who made a statement referring to some 10 or 20 different transactions? Is that a reasonable proposition? If you do demand this and if you secure this, then the inevitable result will be that the police will be chary of recording statements in this way. They will depend on a number of records in their diaries, and there will be no statements available for the purpose which you suggest. In the alternative if such statements are recorded, and are placed in the hands of the defence, they will very gravely impede the course of detection. That is the point I wish to make against Mr. Rangachariar. We are, it is true, considering here the stage of prosecution; that is perfectly true. We wish as much as anybody here to give the accused every fair chance of rebutting the evidence against him. We are no more anxious that a sentence of conviction should be passed on an innocent man than any one else. But at the same time we must realise that although we are now at the prosecution stage yet there are cases, it may be many cases, in which to place in the hands of the defence a large number of statements ranging over a very considerable number of transactions, may re-act on the possibility of detection of crime, may endanger the lives of informers, may allow other guilty men to escape, and I do not think that anybody here seriously desires that result. If we are anxious to secure justice for the accused, we should be equally anxious to secure the protection of life and property by aiding as far as possible in the detection of crime.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally (Sind: Muhammadan Rural): I have listened to the arguments on both sides in regard to this question with great interest. I have experience of a Magistrate's duties for about 20 years both stipendiary and honorary as my friend Mr. Pyari Lal calls it. There can be no denying the fact that in the mofussil some Magistrates, particularly of the second and third class, are considerably in the hands of the police; but I have also noticed in some cases weak first class Magistrates are also guided by police inspectors and sub-inspectors. I may say that probationary mamlatdars, what are called in Sind Mukhtiarars, or Tahsildars in other Provinces and acting men are so prone to police influences that very often justice in their courts cannot be properly obtained. No doubt Magistrates of position and education and having an independent character are not so much under the thumb of the police as others of the class I have mentioned are; and so far as the province of Sind is concerned I know when I was in service orders had been issued by the Police Superintendents to all inspectors and sub-inspectors not to send copies of statements to courts at all and sometimes it happened that even when the Magistrate called for these statements they were refused. So far as Sessions Courts are concerned, they always call for these statements through the Magistrates committing cases to their courts, almost invariably, because they know that these statements are not supplied to Magistrates. Within my own experience, when Sessions Courts fixed the hearing of cases committed to their courts, they particularly called for these police statements to be submitted to their courts. This will show how anxious the police always are to suppress these papers from the Magistrates to whose courts they send such cases. I know, Sir, that very often these statements are very important and very often contradictions are brought to light between the statements made by witnesses in courts and the statements they made before the police, which have a considerable bearing on the cases themselves. But at the same time I can imagine cases in which it would be extremely unwise and hazardous to allow the accused to have a look at these statements or to allow them to take a complete copy. Yes, it may be in the interest of the accused to allow him to have copies of extracts from these statements, and that will lead to better justice being dealt out to the accused. But in every case to give a complete copy of the statement will be prejudicial to the interests of justice itself. For instance, if a person belonged to a secret society and he gave certain information to the police, and his statement was recorded, what would be the result if the statement is made public and the secret society learns how the police got at them through this particular individual. I think the result of such a course would be that in 9 cases out of 10 the man would be murdered immediately—and cases have occurred in which witnesses have been murdered. Therefore, it is no doubt not a very reasonable thing to allow in every case the accused to take complete copies of statements made by witnesses before the police. I see, Sir, however, that there are arguments for both sides. I quite admit that in 9 cases out of 10 it is very important that the Magistrate or the trying Court should allow copies of statements to be given to the accused, and more especially in ordinary cases. But in delicate cases and extraordinary cases it would be very unwise to allow the accused to have complete copies of these statements. I would, therefore, Sir, with your permission suggest a sort of a compromise between the two parties; I would say, if the Government accepts that compromise, that in ordinary cases copies should be allowed to the accused, but if the Magistrate or the trying Court, for special reasons to be recorded, thinks it inexpedient to allow copies of such statements to the accused, he may have the power of refusing the same to him. I think a compromise of this kind would suit both sides, and ought to be accepted by the Government as well as by my friends on this side.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, the section under discussion is of such a far reaching character that it is desirable to clear the air to some extent, especially as regards one answer which the Honourable the Home Member gave regarding the objection put forward on this side. The answer was this; if there is to be a detection of crime—and that also was voiced by the last speaker—if the statement made by one of the witnesses is in the hands of the counsel for the defence, the probability is that the accused will know who are the persons who gave the information; that may lead to unsavoury consequences so far as the persons who gave the information are concerned. Sir, the answer to that is very simple. Ordinarily speaking, a statement recorded by the police must be relevant to the case which is to be put up against the accused. If there is to be any information regarding the origin of the crime, and regarding the complicity of others in the crime, that matter would probably go into the diary and not into the statement recorded for the purpose of proving a case against the particular accused. If we make this difference, namely, that the statement must be confined as far as possible to the case to be charged against the accused, and any extra information that may be obtained during the course of the inquiry regarding the origin of the crime, regarding the existence of a conspiracy and so on, should find a place in the diary, there would be no difficulty in accepting the amendment. If, on the other hand, you refuse to give the accused a copy of the statement, the result of it will be that he will have to be groping in the dark, he will not know what evidence has been given against him, and he will have, as pointed out by Mr. Ginnwala, to ask his counsel to put a large number of questions which will take more time of the Court than is necessary. Executive instructions can be issued to the police to take down in the statement, only such facts as are relevant to the case under inquiry and to relegate to the diary all the information which will be required for the purpose of following up the clue and finding out where a particular conspiracy has been hatched and where the conspirators are to be found. In that way information which you are anxious to safeguard and keep back from the accused can be very easily kept back, and information which it will be necessary for the accused to have for the purposes of defending himself will be available to him. Sir, one inconvenient question was put by Mr. Pyari Lal, and that is, what is the object of the Criminal Procedure Code if you are going to keep back information from the accused which would enable him to defend himself? There has been no answer to that. After all, the object of Criminal Procedure Code is to enable the accused to defend himself. It was stated by the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith that the result of compelling the Court to give copies of the evidence will be that the police will only note down a very meagre statement and that would be of no use to anybody. Sir, I take it the police will be acting honestly,—that the police are not dishonest. I take it that the police, if it is good, will be recording all the statements which have been made by a witness relevant to the inquiry and it is that statement which it is necessary for the accused to have, in order to enable him to show that the witness has not been speaking truth. Sir, it will also have this further effect. If a witness knows that he will be confronted by the statement previously made by him he will take care to speak the truth; if on the other hand he knows that there is no chance of his previous statement being used against him, he will boldly speak falsehoods, and he will not be inclined to place the true facts of the case before the Court. Therefore, the amendment will have a good effect also upon the witness. Sir, there is one other aspect of the case as to which I take a very different view from others who have preceded me and it is this. I consider it is a misfortune that in this country the Magistrate is given the discretion either to refuse or to allow any portion of the statement to be given to the accused. What is the result? Supposing the Magistrate is honest. He is asked by the accused on information which he has obtained from elsewhere to look into the statement and to find out whether there is anything in it which is favourable to him. The Magistrate finds that there is nothing favourable but a great deal that is unfavourable to him. What is the position of the Magistrate? The Magistrate ought to keep an open mind until the whole of the evidence is recorded; and he must be in a position to judge impartially between the accused and the Crown; but where he has got some information which he considers is prejudicial to the accused and not favourable to the accused, can a second or third class Magistrate be expected to wipe out from his memory all that he has learnt from the statement, and could he be expected to judge as between the complainant and the accused and fairly,—if this information is kept back from the accused and at the same time the Magistrate is allowed to pursue it; Sir, in every other country the Magistrate is asked to keep his mind altogether free from anything which has not been recorded and which will not be part of the evidence of the case on which he is to give his judgment. Per contra, this section enables the Magistrate to look into the diary and to find out whether it is favourable to the accused or unfavourable to him. If he considers it to be favourable and if he considers it is in the interests of justice that the accused should have it, then he is directed to give a copy; if he considers it unfavourable, certainly his mind will be prejudiced and the accused will be all the worse for having made the request to the Magistrate. Under those circumstances, the discretion given to the Magistrate to look into the statement and to keep the information to himself without furnishing a copy to the accused is likely to be prejudicial both to the Magistrate and to the police. I am speaking of the statement, not the diary. Under these circumstances, Sir, it seems to me that the provision as it is proposed to be enacted is not in the interests of justice. On the other hand, I think it is likely to stand in the way of the accused getting fair play and is also likely to make the position of the Magistrate very irksome. For these reasons, Sir, I think the amendment which has been moved is a very reasonable one and should be accepted by the House.

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, the desire of the House, in the main, is that the discretionary power of the Magistrate or the court may be taken away and that a right may be given to the accused that he may obtain copies of the statements of those persons who have been called as witnesses against him in that prosecution. Now, Sir, there are Magistrates and Magistrates and there are courts and courts. There is no doubt about it that some Magistrates are very efficient and very conscientious. But the Honourable the Home Member cannot deny the correctness of the proposition that there are some Magistrates and some courts who are not efficient and who do not perform their duties conscientiously. Now, the desire of the Assembly is that no room for doubt should exist and that those who are not efficient and are not conscientious may be made to perform their duties in a certain fixed manner. That is the real object of the House. The House is not prepared to say in a sweeping way that the whole judiciary is inefficient. That is not the object of the House. The object of the House, I may be allowed to repeat, is simply that the grievances which are occupying the mind of the public in these days may be redressed, and the easiest method of extending redress to them is by taking away this discretionary power from Magistrates and courts. Now, the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson said that there will be a mass of irrelevant evidence . . . (Mr. H. Tonkinson: "No") a mass of irrelevant things brought on to the records of the police, namely, persons, to whom questions may be put by the investigating officer, may make reference to things which have no concern with the case, and the answers, given by them to the investigating officer, may expose them to prosecution. May I invite his attention to the provision which is incorporated in sub-section (2) of section 161 of the same Code:

"Such person shall be bound to answer all questions relating to such case put to him by such officer other than questions the answers to which would have a tendency to expose him to a criminal charge or to a penalty or forfeiture."

Therefore the fear which has been entertained by the Honourable Member seems to have been misplaced.

The other ground which was advanced by him was that the police diary, for all intents and purposes, will be placed in the hands of the accused. In reply to that I may say at once, it will not happen at all. The accused will, simply, be entitled to obtain copies only of those statements in regard to which witnesses are called. He has not got the right to ask for copies of the statements of all the persons who have given answers to questions put by the investigating officer, namely, only of the statements of those witnesses who will be called by the prosecution. This proposition, therefore, Sir, will advance the cause of the administration of justice; the witnesses who come before the police officer investigating a case will realize their responsibility, they will know that a copy of the statement which they are making before the police, can be obtained by the accused and they will be subjected to cross-examination; they will consequently speak the truth and know that if in their depositions in court there is any contradiction, that contradiction will be brought on the record under the provisions of section 145 of the Evidence Act. They will therefore be induced to speak the truth. But in the present condition of the law in this behalf, they do not care; they, in some cases, regard themselves as irresponsible men who can make any statement they like. To my mind the procedure, proposed, now will improve the administration of justice and the statements recorded by police officers will become more accurate.

The other ground, which has been advanced on behalf of the opposition to this amendment, is that it will be very inconvenient and the work of the courts and Magistrates will be impeded. Of course there is some force in that; it will not be so convenient as it is now; work will not be done so expeditiously as it is done now. But, Sir, consider the advantage which the Government will derive—an advantage of sterling worth; for justice will be done; there will be no room for injustice. Is not that a good return, Sir? Even if two hours more are spent in arriving at the correct conclusion, I think that expenditure of time may be considered as worth while. So, on the ground of convenience, or on the ground of expedition, I may say, the opposition has got no case.

[Dr. Nand Lal.]

Then the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith said, " Oh, then the police will not do their duty; they won't put many questions to witnesses; they will simply put down a line or two giving the gist of the whole thing." Why should we grudge that? If the police officer writes his diary in full and the statements in a brief manner, that will save public time. So on that ground also the opposition has no case.

Then the Honourable the Home Member took this exception, namely, that this amendment will not be of any utility, because, confidential documents will be open to the public through the medium of that accused, and most probably that will spoil the prosecution. In reply to that I may submit that the statement of the approver is recorded generally by a very responsible officer, the Superintendent or Deputy Superintendent, and that is if I mistake not, no part of the investigation within the scope of section 161, Criminal Procedure Code. I think the Honourable the Home Member will accede to this contention which I am placing before him in reply to his argument. In the second place, that statement is recorded before the Magistrate. So the statement of the approver will not, if I think aright, come within the purview of section 162.

On these grounds, in brief, I support this amendment which speaks for itself and will be very useful both to the public and to Government. I trust that the Government Benches will accept the recommendation of the amendment.

Mr. P. B. Haigh (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, I venture to suggest that after this lengthy debate the question before the House has narrowed itself to two points of importance. The first point for the House to decide is whether these statements recorded by the police can safely in the interest not only of the accused but of other witnesses and of the maintenance of peace and order, be practically made public, and if the House is of the opinion that this cannot be done, that such statements cannot without any restriction be made public, to what extent it should be permitted and who is to regulate it. Now, Sir, with regard to the first point, I trust the House has listened with attention to the remarks that fell from Mr. Hussanally. Mr. Hussanally spoke as a stipendiary Magistrate of many years' standing and also as an Honorary Magistrate. He spoke as one having full knowledge of police methods. He said that in his opinion many subordinate Magistrates, especially of the lower grades, were at times unduly influenced by the police, and yet he said he could not recommend that any such statements should as a matter of course and as a matter of right be practically made public in Court, because of the grave danger involved to other witnesses in the case or to other persons whose names may be mentioned in the statement. I hope the House will take that seriously into consideration, because it is a point that, I suggest, those who have supported this amendment are rather apt to overlook. The Honourable Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar stated that the whole object of Criminal Procedure is to enable the accused to defend himself. I suggest that there are other considerations. There is such a thing as the maintenance of law and order, the maintenance of peace, the protection of innocent persons, the protection of witnesses who honestly give evidence in the Courts. These are not things to be lightly overlooked or entirely ignored. It has been suggested, that the difficulty can be overcome if only the police will record in these statements what is strictly relevant to the case; and Mr. Ginwala made some very scathing remarks on the utter incompetence of a police officer who could possibly include in a statement of this kind things that were not strictly relevant to the statement that the witness now before the Court is about to make in Court. Possibly Mr. Ginwala has never taken part in the investigation of a crime. (Mr. P. P. Ginwala: "I am very thankful for it.") Well, he may be congratulated on not having had that unpleasant duty to perform, but had he taken part in the investigation of a crime, he might not have been perhaps so scathing in his remarks upon the unfortunate investigating policeman. How is a police officer when he begins to investigate crime and to record the statement of a witness to know exactly what is relevant and what is not? He goes to a village where a dacoity or a murder has been committed. Perhaps a man comes forward who appears to know a good deal about what was going on in the village on the night of the occurrence and for the sake of getting an accurate record of what that man says, not trusting to his memory, he proceeds to record what the man tells him. How can he possibly conceive at that stage what is and what is not going to be relevant to the case? Minutest facts may come out which appear to have nothing whatever to do with the case and yet may prove of vital importance later on. The man may depose, for example, 'I went the day before to see about a buffalo or something of the kind' an apparently trifling occurrence, which may in the end be the very fact on which detection is based. It is absurd to suppose that these statements recorded by the police in the course of investigation can refer simply and solely to just the fact about which the witness will be asked to depose in Court. (Dr. H. S. Gour: "These are not the statements.") I do not understand what Dr. Gour means by saying that these are not the statements. These are the statements in the case; and these are the statements Dr. Gour wants to have produced in Court. Well, Sir, I submit, that if we once grant that these statements must contain much that may be irrelevant to the immediate statement of the witness that is going to be made in Court, it is essential that the disclosing of them should be a matter of discretion, because we cannot take the risk of allowing all these things to be published and possibly not only to interfere with the detection of the offence itself, but to involve other persons and other witnesses. The Honourable the Home Member has given a striking example in the matter of the big conspiracy case that he referred to, and I do not need to cite any further examples. That is one very convincing instance of a case in which the whole statement could not be allowed to be disclosed. Well, in that case, who is to exercise the discretion? No other person can possibly do so except the Magistrate or the Judge. You cannot leave the matter entirely to the police as to whether they are to exercise a discretion, or to the prosecuting counsel. The only person who can be vested with the discretion is the Magistrate in charge of the case. With regard to these Magistrates, I venture to make a reference to something that Mr. Rangachariar was pleased to say. He said that Magistrates "depend for their promotion on the good will of the District Superintendent of Police," and he added (as an after-thought), and "also of the District Magistrate." Well, Sir, so much has been said in the course of this debate about the influence of the police over Magistrates that I venture to contradict categorically that statement that subordinate Magistrates depend on the District Superintendent of Police for their promotion. The District Superintendent of Police has nothing whatever to do with the promotion of Magistrates. (Laughter.) Honourable Members laugh, but I know . . . (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "We know the contrary"; Dr. Nand Lal: "Secret reports are more valuable than the open recommendation of superior officers.") Possibly Honourable Members will allow me to proceed. Promotions of subordinate Magistrates are made on the recommendation of the District Magistrate after consultation with the Sessions Judge; and the District Magistrate has every opportunity of forming his own opinion on the work of subordinate Magistrates. Not only does he see the record of their cases which he may call for from time to time, but he hears appeals from them. Every time they convict a man they send a summary of the case to the District Magistrate, and he has every opportunity of forming his own firsthand opinion on their work. He does not, as a matter of fact, consult the police at all. I have referred to this matter at some length because I think too much has been made of the supposed subservience of our Magistrates to the police officers. I do not wish to detain the House any longer after this somewhat lengthy debate but I trust that Honourable Members will not, in order to serve the interests of the accused, be led astray into failing to consider altogether the other side of the question and the imperative necessity of protecting the other persons whose interests may be gravely involved if the publication of these statements is allowed in the ordinary course of procedure.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 33"

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: May I have your leave, Sir, to move an amendment on the lines suggested by Mr. Hussanally.

Mr. President: The amendment which the Honourable gentleman has placed before me necessarily can only be moved later on.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: It will depend upon certain words being deleted on the lines of Mr. Agnihotri's amendment.

Mr. President: I am only pointing out that I cannot put the amendment laid before me at the present moment as an amendment of Mr. Agnihotri's amendment; it is in substance an alternative, but in form it cannot be put now, because it comes at a later stage. The House will understand that if Mr. Agnihotri's amendment should be defeated, such a proposal as the one made by Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary would still be in order. But I cannot put one proposal against the other, because they do not stand together in the same position in the clause.

(An Honourable Member: "The question may now be put.")

Mr. N. M. Samarth (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): May I speak on Mr. Agnihotri's amendment? I fully appreciate the difficulties which are at the bottom of Mr. Agnihotri's amendment and the arguments of those who have supported it to meet them, but I put it to the House, do they or do they not appreciate also the strength of the argument that to make it obligatory to give a complete copy of the whole of the statement made would, in the interests of justice and on grounds of expediency, be sometimes undesirable. I am not drawing upon my imagination; I can recall a case in which there was a statement taken down by a police officer of about 40 pages, in which the names of five different public men were said to have been involved, and it would have been unfair to these men if the giving of a copy of that whole statement were made obligatory. I trust, therefore, that a via media will be found acceptable to the Members of this House, as suggested by Mr. Hussanally, in some terms which will make it ordinarily obligatory on the Magistrate to furnish copies, but the Magistrate may refuse to do so for reasons to be recorded by him in certain cases, or may cause extracts only to be given in certain cases and not the whole statement. I trust Mr. Agnihotri will agree to that.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhamadan): That will come in after my amendment has been accepted.

Mr. H. M. Samarth: Meanwhile the proposal for a complete copy to be invariably furnished, which is the nature of Mr. Agnihotri's amendment, should be thrown out.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That in clause 33, in the proviso to sub-section (1) insert the words 'allow inspection to the accused and'."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, the next amendment which I beg to move is consequential on the amendment that has just been allowed by the House. If we allow inspection of the statement to the accused, as we have just done, then this clause becomes unnecessary and superfluous, and I therefore propose:

"That in clause 33 in the proviso to sub-section (1) after the word 'shall' omit the words 'may then if the Court thinks it expedient in the interest of justice'."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, the next amendment which I beg to move is:

"That in clause 33 in the proviso to sub-section (1) omit the words 'if duly proved'."

We have allowed that the statement made before police be shown to the accused in the Court. Then, when the statements coming from the police are used for the prosecution, it is not necessary that, for the purpose of contradicting a witness, the statements should be proved. Therefore, Sir, the words 'if duly proved' become unnecessary and should be deleted.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I did not quite follow Mr. Agnihotri's reasons for cutting out these words "if duly proved". If the words are removed—he suggests that they are unnecessary—then this copy of the statement which is furnished to the defence will be used in the manner provided for by section 145 of the Indian Evidence Act. Perhaps Mr. Agnihotri suggests that section 145 lays down that the statement must be proved. This is what section 145 of the Evidence Act does say: "but, if it is intended to contradict him by the writing, his attention must, before the writing can be proved, be called to those parts of it which are to be used for the purpose of contradicting him." Therefore, section 145 clearly contemplates that the statement must be proved though it does not actually require it, and it is necessary to retain these words in section 162. The removal of the words will simply mean that any statement made to the police officer, though it may be proved or may not be proved, can be used to contradict the witness. That, surely, I think the House will realise, will be extremely dangerous.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 33, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: May I suggest that the further consideration of this clause be postponed. Many of my friends here have, I think, a feeling that it is justifiable, in view of the previous decision of the House, to place on the Bill some proviso which would obviate the danger, to which many of us referred, of the whole of the statements referring to a large number of transactions being handed to the defence. From several parts of the House we have heard an admission that that would be dangerous; and I suggest that the consideration of this clause be not completed until we have had an opportunity of considering the advisability of inserting some such proviso.

Mr. President: The original question was:

"That clause 33, as amended, do stand part of the Bill,"
since which an amendment has been moved:

"That further consideration of clause 33 be postponed."

The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"That in clause 34, sub-clause (i) omit all words commencing from the words 'and any Magistrate' to the words 'Government may'."

This clause 34 of the Bill provides that the authority may be given by the Local Government even to a second class Magistrate to record confessions of accused persons. The recording of confessions is a very complicated affair and it is better that it should be restricted only to experienced first class Magistrates and not to other Magistrates. As the Honourable Mr. Wali Mahomed Hussanally and the Honourable Mr. Pyari Lal have pointed out, there are Magistrates of the second and third class who are not quite experienced enough to realise that they are not to be guided by any outside influence but are to do justice in the case and they are often influenced by the police. Under section 164 we have provided for the admissibility of these confessions when they are made before the Magistrate and have excluded the confessions made before the police. It is necessary that the second and third class Magistrates should not be authorised to record confessions and this could be done by omitting the words as suggested in my amendment. Sir, the Honourable Members must be aware that the complications and difficulties in the recording of confessions have been recognised by the various High Courts. They will find from the law reports that the confessions recorded even by first class Magistrates were often not recorded with the proper safeguards, and care necessary in such cases. Therefore, Sir, I submit that it is undesirable and would be very dangerous to extend this power of recording confessions to second class Magistrates.

With these words I move my amendment.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: As the House will see, what the Honourable Member proposes, is that:

"Any Magistrate of the first class may, if he is not a police officer, record any statement or confession made to him."

In consequence, no Magistrate of the second class, even though specially empowered by the Local Government, would be able to record a statement. I do not know whether the Honourable Member, who laid great stress on the question of confession, realised that that would be the effect of his amendment. Such, however, is the effect. The original Bill proposed a distinction between statements and confessions; it contemplated that any Magistrate could record a statement but only first class Magistrates, or specially empowered second class Magistrates, should record a confession. The Joint Committee, however, went further and limited the recording of a statement to first class Magistrates and to second class Magistrates specially empowered in this behalf.

Something may, of course, be said perhaps for special safeguards in regard to confessions. They must be recorded with particular care and by highly responsible Magistrates. That may be the case, but in the case of statements, is it necessary that the House should show such mistrust of even second class Magistrates, even when specially empowered by Local Governments, as to refuse to allow them to record statements? What would be the consequence? Often these statements are not of the highest importance; very often they are not even brought on to the record of a trial. But that as many Magistrates as possible should be allowed to record statements is obviously a distinct convenience in the course of investigation. Take the case of a woman who has merely to testify to the simple fact, that she recognises a particular article or object concerned in an investigation. The statement is a simple one; and yet the result of the Honourable Member's amendment, if carried, would be that she would have to go into headquarters to record the statement before a first class Magistrate. That can hardly commend itself to the House. Second class Magistrates have powers up to imprisonment of six months, and yet you will not allow them to record the simplest facts testified to by a witness brought before them by the police—an unreasonable mistrust of the Magistrates, an undue hindrance, to the course of investigation, and possible source of inconvenience to witnesses themselves. For that reason, I oppose the amendment.

Mr. President: The amendment moved is:

"In clause 34 in sub-clause (i) omit the words 'and any Magistrate of the second class; specially empowered in this behalf by the Local Government'."

The motion was negatived.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, before we leave sub-clause (1) of clause 34, I would like to invite the attention of the House to what is obviously a somewhat serious omission in the clause as drafted by the Joint Committee. It has till just this moment escaped the notice of the House. In the way it is drafted, no Presidency Magistrate can record a statement or confession. I think this is a most serious defect and I would like to ask the indulgence of the House to enable me to move an amendment which will remedy that defect. The amendment will run as follows:

"That in sub-clause (i) of clause 34, before the word 'Any Magistrate', the words 'Any Presidency Magistrate,' be inserted."

The motion was adopted.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras ceded districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammads Rural): Sir, on behalf of Dr. Gour, who is absent, I move that:

"In clause 34 (ii) (a) after the word 'that' insert the words 'he is not bound to make a confession, and that if he does so'."

Sir, this clause is practically in force in some Provinces—that is, under departmental instructions Magistrates are enjoined to tell a person who is put before them to make a confession, to tell him that he is not bound to make a confession. This clause is intended to give statutory force, to make it obligatory upon the Magistrate, to say that as well, to tell the man that he is not bound to make a confession and that if he makes a confession it will be used against him. There is no harm in this, it is only a safeguard.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, as my Honourable friend, Mr. Subrahmanayam, says, this is one of the precautions which are laid down in some Provinces by executive orders as to the course which a Magistrate must take before he records a confession. It is only one of many instructions which have been issued to the Magistrates to guard against any abuse of the recording of confessions. I do not think, Sir, that any very great purpose would be served by inserting it in the section; but we have no objection, if that is the wish of the House. But, of course, if it is inserted in this place, it must also be inserted in the memorandum.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, that amendment having been adopted, I should like to move the amendment of the memorandum:

"In clause 34, sub-clause (ii) (b) after the words 'that' insert the words 'he is not bound to make a confession and that if he does so'."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"That in clause 34 in sub-clause (ii) after sub-clause (a) insert the following sub-clause (aa), 'after the word 'unless' the words 'when satisfied that the deponent has been free from police influence for at least twenty-four hours and' shall be inserted'."

Sir, under the present clause when an accused is put before a Magistrate for recording a confession, the Magistrate may record it. What I wish to provide is that when the accused is put up before the Magistrate the accused should be kept away from police custody for about 24 hours before his confession be recorded. It may be within the experience of many of my lawyer friends that when an accused has been brought up before the court and has made a confession, he often retracts his confession afterwards,—sometimes before the trying Magistrate or sometimes in the Sessions Court. This retraction may be due either to his second thoughts or it may be due to the fact that he is away from police custody; and some times he confesses before the police but if Magistrates before recording such confessions put the accused in jail custody and when the accused appears the next day, he declines to make any confession. All these things go to show that when the accused is put before the Magistrate he is often under the police influence. In order, therefore, to do away with that influence it is necessary that some time should be allowed to enable the accused to think over for himself as to his best course and whether or not he should make a confession. Therefore I propose for the acceptance of the House that the insertion be made and the accused be allowed at least 24 hours time free from police custody before his statement is recorded.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: We should all agree that a confession made directly under police influence (to use Mr. Agnihotri's words) ought not to be admitted in evidence at all; on that we should all agree. Mr. Agnihotri seeks to prevent this by providing that no confession shall be recorded unless the deponent has been free from police custody for 24 hours; but let us see in what terms he proposes it. The deponent, he says in his amendment, shall have been free from police influence for 24 hours. I do not know how he seeks to define influence; nor how he will set and limit on the duration of the effects of a threat or of force. He supposes that the magistrate will have such psychological skill that he will be able to probe into the mind of an accused person—a mind disturbed and unbalanced by the recent commission of crimes and by arrest—and to determine exactly at what time, to the very second, the effect of such a threat or such inducement has passed away. An inducement in itself is not an easy thing to define. I have had the curiosity to look into a commentary on the Evidence Act and I saw that the discussion on what constitutes inducement, occupies some four or five pages; the effect of influence, if it could be defined would, I imagine, establish a case law which would occupy not five but twenty-five pages. But that is the sort of problem which he proposes to set before the Magistrate.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I will put in 'custody' instead of 'influence' if you like.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I do not like it at all; and wish to point out that when Mr. Agnihotri sets out to draft amendments to a Code of this complexity, which has stood so long in the Statute Book, he should exhibit more thought if he is to avoid the most obvious and glaring mistakes. However I shall not further argue the question of influence; because the Mover has already given it up. One could have developed, had it been necessary, a sufficiently interesting and even amusing argument on the subject. He would now, recognizing his mistake, propose that the deponent should not have been within police custody for 24 hours. Therefore, if the police find a murderer red-handed and glorying in his crime and bring him immediately before a magistrate, that officer is not to be allowed to record his confession. Again, will Mr. Agnihotri tell me how his stipulation is possible in practice? The magistrate has a man brought before him by the police. This will not do; he must send him to the jail. Here he must wait till 24 hours are up. But who, Sir, will bring him from the jail but the police? The magistrate is here again at a stop; he must send him back to jail until he can be brought back thence by some other agency, or keep him in his court for 24 hours in order that he may not see a policeman before his confession is recorded. It will all end in one thing only, the magistrate will in every case have to go to the jail to record a confession. Is all this reasonable? It is so unreasonable that I would again attempt to bring home this lesson to the Honourable Member, that a little more thought, a little more care, a little more prevision is required in attempting to modify a code which has served our purpose so long. I have answered Mr. Agnihotri; but lest any one should think that there remains the shadow of substance in what he says, I would refer the House to the very ample guarantees and safeguards that are provided already under section 24 of the Evidence Act in regard to confessions, and those safeguards ought to be sufficient.

The motion was negatived.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, this section 164 deals with the statements and confessions made to magistrates at any time before the commencement of the inquiry or trial. If they are accused persons they make confessions; if they are witnesses they make statements; but an accused person may make a statement which may not amount to a confession. We are now concerned with a magistrate who really takes part in an investigation, as is were, who assists in the investigation of a crime, not the Magistrate who actually tries the case. This is because this section deals with cases at any time, i.e., either during investigation or at any time afterwards before the commencement of the inquiry or trial. The object of my amendment is that any oral statement which may be made by the accused person to a magistrate who is taking part in this way in an investigation should not be used against the accused person. I have come across cases where the provisions of this section have not been complied with. Still the magistrate who holds the inquiry as it were in the course of the investigation prior to inquiry or trial sometimes gives evidence that the accused told me so and so, probably to contradict the defence which the accused may put forward later on. Supposing in the course of the investigation, the accused person is casually asked by the magistrate and he says something to the magistrate, that statement is sometimes used against the accused person at the trial or inquiry. I want to prevent the use of such statement and I do not want the accused person's statement to be brought in against him—that is as amounting to admissions but not amounting to confession. Of course if they amount to a confession, then they should be recorded in the manner required for a statement under section 364 and, under section 91 of the Evidence Act, oral statements cannot be used in evidence. I am quite alive to that, but there may be oral statements which may be used against the accused person but not amounting to a confession. In such cases sections 364 and 164 would not apply and it is not safe to rely on the memory of a magistrate who goes and takes part in an investigation or assists the police in investigating the crime and it is not safe to allow that evidence to be used against the accused person. That is the object of this amendment. Of course confessions do not require this clause. It is only statements which do not amount to confessions which will come under this saving clause which I provide and therefore I move, Sir, that to clause 34 the following sub-section be added, namely:

" To clause 34, add the following sub-clause at the end :

' (iii) After sub-section (3) the following sub-section shall be inserted, namely :

' Oral statements made to Magistrates by accused persons shall not be admissible in evidence against them unless the provisions of this section are complied with '."

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shaif (Law Member): Sir, under the main section, as my Honourable friend has admitted, it is only the confessions made by accused persons that are recorded in the manner prescribed. If the amendment which my Honourable friend seeks to introduce into the section were accepted by the House, it would mean that a Magistrate, during the course of the investigation, would be bound to record any and every statement that an accused person may make to him, whether it amounts to a confession or not, before he is able to make any statement in court with regard to such statement. I submit that neither the ends of justice nor any principles of law justify the enactment of such a provision as this by the Legislature. My Honourable and learned friend said that he had come across cases in which Magistrates had made statements in order to contradict what the accused stated in court, that is to say, they have stated that on a certain occasion during the investigation the accused had made such and such a statement. That may or may not be. When the Magistrate makes a statement like this in the witness-box he is just as much a witness as any other person produced as a witness by the prosecution. That statement by the Magistrate is subject to cross-examination by the accused and the counsel for the accused just as much as the statement of any other witness. If the Magistrate has told a lie, I have no doubt that the court will be in a position to judge for itself whether it ought or ought not to believe that statement. But to say that no Magistrate shall be allowed, practically it comes to that, to make any statement as a witness during the course of the trial with regard to statements made by the accused to him, statements other than confessions, is, I submit, carrying legislation a little too far. Such a provision introduced in an Act would be unreasonable and the Legislature is presumed to be reasonable in all the provisions that it may enact into a

[Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shaf.]

Statute. It seems to me, Sir, that when you remember that the witness who is deposing to an oral statement made to him by an accused person is not a police officer, is not even an ordinary witness but is a Magistrate, who prima facie at any rate is believed to realise the consequences, the serious consequences of any statement that he may make in the witness-box against an accused person, surely to exclude the Magistrate's statement, unless the oral statement to which he is deposing has been reduced into writing by him during the course of the investigation, is I respectfully submit somewhat unreasonable and I would earnestly appeal to my Honourable friend that the administration of justice will not be promoted if a provision of this kind is introduced in our Code.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I wish to add two words to what the Honourable the Law Member has said. Mr. Rangachariar has argued one amendment and then at the end he moved another. He explained that his intention in this amendment is to confine its operation to oral statements made to Magistrates by accused persons in the course of a Magisterial inquiry and he argued that they should not be admissible in evidence against them, unless the provisions of this section are complied with. Now, Mr. Rangachariar's amendment merely says that oral statements made to Magistrates by accused persons shall not be admissible in evidence. Sir, I want the House to realise how wide that is. I do not know whether Mr. Rangachariar has forgotten section 342 of the Code, which lays down how oral statements to Magistrates are to be dealt with. An oral statement is always an oral statement, if made by word of mouth, even though it has to be reduced to writing under section 164 or 364, and an oral statement made in the course of the trial therefore under section 342, according to Mr. Rangachariar's amendment, could not be used against the accused unless all the provisions of this section had been complied with. It is not this section that has to be complied with but it is sections 342 and 364, which have to be complied with in those cases. Section 342 is the section which enables the court to examine the accused for the purpose of explaining the circumstances appearing in the evidence against him and sub-section (3) of that section says:

"The answers given by the accused may be taken into consideration in such inquiry or trial and put in evidence for or against him in any other inquiry into or trial for, any other offence which such answers may tend to show he has committed."

Mr. Rangachariar's amendment is a direct contravention of that provision of sub-section (3) of section 342. I have one more point to make with regard to this amendment. Section 533 of the Code deals with the admissibility of confessions and statements made under section 164, and if Mr. Rangachariar wants to add anything to the provisions of the Code in that respect the amendment should be in section 533 and not in section 164. The present amendment is far too wide, is not confined to statements made under section 164 and covers any conceivable sort of statement made by an accused person to a Magistrate, and to require that the provisions of section 164 should be complied with in all cases is I think entirely unnecessary, if not ridiculous.

Mr. President: The amendment moved is:

"To clause 34, add the following sub-clause at the end:

'(iii) After sub-section (3) the following sub-section shall be inserted, namely:

(4) Oral statements made to Magistrates by accused persons shall not be admissible in evidence against them unless the provisions of this section are complied with."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 84, as amended, do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Twenty Minutes to Three of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Twenty Minutes to Three of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

Mr. President: The Secretary will now read a Message received from the Council of State.

Mr. J. Hullah (Revenue and Agriculture Secretary): In connection with that Message, Sir, have I your permission to make a motion in order to complete the Committee?

Mr. President: Yes.

Mr. J. Hullah: I move:

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the following six Members of the Legislative Assembly be nominated to serve on the Joint Committee to consider and report on the Bill to provide for the creation of a fund for the improvement and development of the growing, marketing and manufacture of cotton in India, namely:

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar,

The motion was adopted.

THE INDIAN OFFICIAL SECRETS BILL.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley (Home Member): Sir, I beg to present the report of the Select Committee on the Bill to assimilate the law in British India relating to Official Secrets to the law in force in the United Kingdom.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. President: The Assembly will now resume consideration of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Court-fees Act, 1870.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, to facilitate business, some amendments of mine which have been put in have been redrafted by the department, most of which I accept; only they have not accepted some portions. Therefore, I propose, with your permission to move them in parts, Sir. The first amendment relates to section 165, and I move it. It reads:

"That in sub-clause (1) of clause 35 in the proposed new sub-section (1) for the words 'in the diary hereinafter prescribed relating to the case' the words 'in writing' be substituted."

The object of this amendment is, so far as the search records go, they need not be embodied in the diary of the case. The object of the proposed amendment is, in case it is made in writing, not in the diary, then copies can be freely given to the persons who are entitled to copies. If it is made in the diary, there may be objection to showing the diary or giving copies of the diary to the persons interested. Therefore, there is no object served in maintaining the words "in the diary hereinafter prescribed relating to the case." I therefore move that the words "in writing" be substituted.

Mr. President: Clause 35. Amendment moved:

"In sub-clause (1) of clause 35 in the proposed new sub-section (1) for the words 'in the diary hereinafter prescribed relating to the case' the words 'in writing' be substituted."

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I accept that amendment.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I move my next amendment, Sir, which is as follows:

"In clause 35 (i) after the word 'belief' insert the words 'and specifying therein the thing for which the search is to be made.'"

Mr. President: It is on the printed paper.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Yes; it is there. The word 'and' is not there. I add the words "and specifying therein the thing for which the search is to be made". Honourable Members will remember that the scheme of the Code as regards searches is three-fold. First of all you can obtain warrants for search.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member wants to have the words 'therein' as referring to the writing and not to the diary?

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Yes.

Mr. President: It has been suggested to me that the amendment ought to run "and specifying in such writing".

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I accept it. Probably it is more correct. As I was stating, the scheme of the Code is when a thing could not be got at under section 96, the Magistrate is empowered to issue a search warrant for the production of any document or thing which is required for the purpose of a case, and the Magistrate is also empowered under section 105 to make a search himself for which he could issue a search warrant. Section 165 deals with cases where the police themselves can search without a warrant, in urgent cases where it may not be possible for them to go to the Magistrate to get that warrant, where perhaps the thing might disappear and all that. Therefore the Code provides that the police themselves may have the power in certain cases. Now, the section as it stands would enable a general search to be made of the person's house. As the section stood originally in the Code of 1898, Honourable Members would remember that the language there was:

"Whenever an officer in charge of a police-station, or a police-officer making an investigation, considers that the production of any document or thing is necessary to the conduct of an investigation, into any offence which he is authorized to investigate, and there is reason to believe that a person to whom a summons or order under section 94 has been or might be issued will not or would not produce such document or thing" then he was entitled to search himself, and the Calcutta High Court and other High Courts have held that under this section a general search is not possible, because you can search only for specified articles. Apparently to get rid of that ruling this amendment is made. I think, Sir, that it is a very vicious thing to allow a police officer to have power to conduct a general search. A policeman has to resort to this method as he believes he cannot go to a magistrate and get a warrant because time would be lost, it is only then the police are entrusted with power to make this search. Making a search without knowing what it is you are going to search for, but merely to see if you can find something incriminating in a person's house, is not contemplated nor wise to allow. I think it is not wise to entrust the police with such power. And this is recognised in the latter portion of this clause, even in the amended clause (3) of section 165 where the police officer authorises somebody else to make the search where he is unable to do it. Under clause (3) Honourable Members will notice he must give the other person an order in writing specifying the thing for which the search is to be made. So that when this officer has to ask somebody else to do it, he is called upon to specify the thing for which the search is to be made, and when he makes the search himself under this clause, why should he not be under the same obligation to specify what the search is to be made for? General searches ought to be avoided. General warrants ought to be avoided. And Honourable Members will notice that he has to satisfy himself, before he takes action, "that such a thing cannot in his opinion be otherwise obtained without undue delay." The clause itself contemplates that the man himself has some information and he thinks that such a thing cannot be otherwise obtained. Therefore that very clause itself contemplates that the man must know what it is that he is after, and it will be necessary for him to record this in writing and forward the record to the magistrate, so that it will be a check upon irresponsible general searches which have frequently disfigured the police administration in various parts of the country. Even as the section stood the police have resorted to general searches, and the Calcutta High Court and the other High Courts had to come down upon them and hold such searches to be illegal, and now the intention of the Government amendment is to get rid of that ruling. I submit it is no sound to do that and I therefore move that these words be inserted and specifying in such writing the thing for which the search is to be made.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I do not think that the ruling of the Calcutta High Court to which Mr. Rangachariar refers carries him quite as far as he would lead the House to believe. If I am correct what happened in that case was, a report of a dacoity had been made and the sub-inspector of police had been investigating it. A constable was sent to look for the accused person and get a search witness, and when a search was made in the house of the accused and while the search was going on the police party was attacked; certain persons were in consequence charged with rioting and assault of a police officer in the discharge of his duties. They were all convicted under these sections. The High Court said that section 165 refers to a specific document or thing which may be the subject of a summons or order under section 94. The main argument was that section 165 did not authorise a search for stolen property in the house of the absconding offender. The judges remarked (and this is the material part of the judgment) "remarkable as it may appear there is no other section, admittedly, which would cover such a search." The convictions for riot were set aside. I do not think that quite amounts to a statement on the part of the judges so general as was indicated. Still we may agree that a warrant should be definite and a search should, as far as possible, be for a definite object. We have in the succeeding sub-clause, as Mr. Rangachariar says, certainly provided, that where an investigating officer has to issue instructions to another officer, he should tell that officer what he is to search for, though we there put in the words "so far as possible." And I would agree myself that so far as possible, it is right that an investigating officer should state in writing, the object for which he is searching.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I accept the addition of those words.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: If the Honourable Member will accept that, I will not pursue my argument further; he will himself recognise that there is a very wide range of circumstances under which we could not insist on a precise statement of the object of search.

Mr. President: The further amendment to the amendment moved is:

"That the words 'so far as possible' be inserted after the word 'specifying,' in clause 35 (i)."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The amendment moved is:

"In clause 35 (i) after the word 'belief' insert the words 'and specifying in such writing, so far as possible, the thing for which the search is to be made'."

The motion was adopted.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I do not move the amendment to clause 35 (a) as printed but I move that:

"For the words 'in the diary relating to the case,' the words 'in writing' be substituted. I have already explained in my former remarks why I wish these words to be substituted."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: We accept this as a consequential amendment.

Mr. President: The amendment is:

"In clause 35 (ii) for the words 'in the diary relating to the case' the words 'in writing' be substituted."

The motion was adopted.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I move:

"That after sub-clause (iii) of clause 35 the following sub-clause be added, namely: (iv) After sub-section (4) the following sub-section be added, namely:

(5) Copies of any record made under sub-section (i) of sub-section (3) shall forthwith be sent to the nearest Magistrate empowered to take cognizance of the offence and the owner or occupier of the place searched shall on application be furnished with a copy of the same by the Magistrate:

Provided that he shall pay for the same unless the Magistrate for some special reason thinks fit to furnish it free of cost."

As Honourable Members will see, the object of this amendment is that, as soon as a search is made, an immediate report should be made to the nearest Magistrate. That is one of the objects. The second object is that the person whose house is searched should have copies of the records made under sub-clauses (i) and (iii). Sub-clause (4), as it stands, enables the provisions of section 103 to apply, that is, the general rules relating to searches are made applicable. Under section 103, the occupier of the place where the search was made gets only a list of the articles taken, but what I want him to get is the reason for the search which has to be recorded in writing, which has to be sent to the Magistrate, and he gets a copy thereof. That is the object of this further sub-clause (5) which I move, Sir, as it stands.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I accept the amendment. I do not think it is necessary to explain it any further than has already been done by my Honourable friend Mr. Rangachariar.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"That after sub-section (4) the following sub-section shall be added:

'(5) No search shall be made without having first given an opportunity to the owner or occupier of the place, if present, for the production of the thing for which the search is to be made.'

Sir, we have so far considered that the article that has to be searched for, should be specified. When we specify the article to be searched for to any police officer, that officer should, before entering the house ask the owner or occupier to produce that article, if possible. If he produces it the search may be abandoned; if he does not produce it the search may be made. The objection may be raised on the other side that, if such an opportunity is given to the owner or occupier it is just likely that he might hide or conceal it. My object is that it is not necessary to give him such a long time to produce it. The police might surround his house and ask him to produce it. If he does not produce it, then they may enter and search the house. It would obviate much of the inconvenience that is involved in searches, for instance, the damage or destruction of his property which is involved in such searches. To avoid such things, it is better that the police officer should, the moment he goes to search a house, ask the occupier to produce the article for which a search is to be made.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I am afraid my friend is under a misapprehension. If you enact this clause, you will be contradicting clause (1). Clause (1) contemplates that a police officer has to be satisfied that he cannot otherwise obtain it; then only he resorts to this course, and he has to record it in writing. That in itself is a sufficient guarantee. Therefore, it becomes unnecessary and it is a contradiction of clause (1).

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I beg your permission to withdraw this amendment, Sir.

The motion was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: I suggest an addition to this section, which I hope will be accepted by the Government. I want to add a sub-clause to this section that "a police officer before commencing a search shall offer himself and his party to be searched by the owner or occupier of the house searched."

I suggest this amendment for this reason, that in several provinces executive orders have been issued to all police officers undertaking a search to offer themselves and the whole of their party to the owner or occupier to be searched before they commence the search

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: May I interrupt the Honourable Member. I submit that it is not fair either to the House or ourselves to introduce at this stage without any notice of any kind whatever, an amendment of a substantive nature.

Mr. President: The Honourable the Home Member takes objection to the moving of the amendment, of which due notice has not been given. I think I must uphold the objection.

Clause 35, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I have amended the printed amendment somewhat, in order to suit drafting requirements. The amendment which I move will run as follows:

"That in sub-clause (2) of clause 36, to the proposed new sub-section (4), the following be added, namely:

'and shall also send to the nearest Magistrate empowered to take cognisance of the offence copies of records referred to in section 165, sub-sections (1) and (3)';"

and

"That in sub-clause (2) of clause 36, after the proposed new sub-section (4) the following sub-section be added, namely:

'(5) The owner or occupier of the place searched shall on application be furnished with a copy of any record sent to the Magistrate under sub-section (4):

Provided that he shall pay for the same unless the Magistrate for some special reason thinks fit to furnish it free of cost';"

This follows the previous amendment made in clause 35, and it is similar to it. I therefore, Sir, move it.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"That in sub-clause (2) of clause 36, to the proposed new sub-section (4), the following be added, namely:

'and shall also send to the nearest Magistrate empowered to take cognisance of the offence copies of records referred to in section 165, sub-sections (1) and (3)';"

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I accept that amendment.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"That in sub-clause (2) of clause 36, after the proposed new sub-section (4) the following sub-section be added, namely:

'(5) The owner or occupier of the place searched shall on application be furnished with a copy of any record sent to the Magistrate under sub-section (4):

Provided that he shall pay for the same unless the Magistrate for some special reason thinks fit to furnish it free of cost';"

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I accept the amendment.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 36, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, I move the amendment standing in my name, which is in these terms:

"In clause 37 (ii) insert at the beginning the following:—'in sub-section (2), after the words 'he may' the words 'either release the accused after recording reasons for taking that step or forward him to a Magistrate having jurisdiction to try him with his reasons for recommending the release or' shall be inserted and ';

Sir, in this section power is given to a Magistrate who has not himself got jurisdiction to try a case to order the detention of an accused in jail for a particular period. Sub-section (2) of section 167 runs as follows:

"The Magistrate to whom an accused person is forwarded under this section may, whether he has or has not jurisdiction to try the case, from time to time authorize the detention of the accused in such custody as such Magistrate thinks fit, for a term not exceeding fifteen days in the whole. If he has not jurisdiction to try the case or commit it for trial, and considers further detention unnecessary, he may order the accused to be forwarded to a Magistrate having such jurisdiction."

But, Sir, no power is given to the Magistrate himself to release the accused if he considers that no case has been made out for his detention.

[Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar.]

It may be said that as the Magistrate has got no jurisdiction to try, therefore, such a power should not be vested in him. But, if the House will turn to section 169, it will find that such powers are given to the police.

The police can have such powers under section 169, which runs:

"If, upon an investigation under this Chapter, it appears to the officer in charge of the police station that there is not sufficient evidence or reasonable ground of suspicion to justify the forwarding of the accused to a Magistrate, such officer shall, if such person is in custody, release him on his executing a bond, with or without sureties, as such officer may direct, to appear, if and when so required, before a Magistrate empowered to take cognizance of the offence on a police-report and to try the accused or commit him for trial."

If the police officer can be trusted to exercise his discretion as regards release, I submit that the Magistrate, who has been given power to order the detention of a man in jail, can be trusted to direct his release if he considers it desirable. It is for that reason that I have brought forward my amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I think some distinction can be drawn between the police officer who has investigated the case and who is empowered to release an accused person on bail if he has not found sufficient evidence, and the Magistrate to whom the accused person is taken for the purpose of getting a remand. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's proposal, I would point out, is not on the same lines as section 169. He makes no provision for bail. It is absolute release he provides for. A murderer is taken before a third class Magistrate. The only reason he is taken there is that that Magistrate is the nearest one and the police have not been able to complete the investigation within 24 hours. The law lays down that nobody should be retained in custody for more than 24 hours without an order from a Magistrate. Therefore he comes before a Magistrate. Now that Magistrate has very little information before him with regard to the case at all. He has not got jurisdiction to try the case or to commit it for trial, and therefore, Sir, is it reasonable that that Magistrate should be able to release the murderer forthwith and send him away—not even to take bail? I think the only proper provision in a case like this is for the Magistrate to report what he has done to the Magistrate who has jurisdiction in the case and for that Magistrate, who has jurisdiction, then to take such steps as may seem to him proper—either to release the man or to detain him in custody.

Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's amendment, I would point out, will read rather curiously in the section. As he would put it, it will run:

"If he has not jurisdiction to try the case or commit it for trial and considers further detention unnecessary he may either release the accused after recording reasons for taking that step or forward him to a Magistrate having jurisdiction to try him with his reasons for recommending the release or order the accused to be forwarded to a Magistrate having jurisdiction."

What is the difference between forwarding a person to a Magistrate and ordering him to be forwarded to a Magistrate? It does not read very well in the section, and I think it is undesirable that a Magistrate who has not jurisdiction should be allowed to release without any security whatever serious offenders whom he has not power to try or commit for trial.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. J. Ramaya Pantulu (Godavari sum Kistna: Non-Muhammadan kural). Sir, my amendment runs as follows:

"In clause 37, sub-clause (ii), omit the words 'and no Magistrate of the second class not specially empowered in this behalf by the Local Government'."

The present law is laid down in section 167, sub-section (1), which runs as follows:

"Whenever it appears that any investigation under this Chapter cannot be completed within the period of twenty-four hours fixed by section 61, and there are grounds for believing that the accusation or information is well-founded, the officer in charge of the police station shall forthwith transmit to the nearest Magistrate a copy of the entries in the diary hereunder prescribed relating to the case, and shall at the same time forward the accused (if any) to such Magistrate."

Then, the second sub-section empowers the Magistrate to order that the man be detained in such custody as he thinks fit, for a term not exceeding fifteen days in the whole. Well, under the law as it stands any Magistrate can order the detention of an accused person pending investigation by the police. The section as it is amended in the Bill takes away the power from a third class Magistrate and confines it to first class Magistrates. In the case of second class Magistrates, it says the power may be exercised by a second class Magistrate if he is specially empowered by the Local Government. My amendment would invest both first class and second class Magistrates with the power to detain in custody. I move this amendment in the interests both of the investigation by the police and of the accused himself. As a rule only Revenue Divisional officers are first class Magistrates, and they are in charge of large Divisions. Some of these Divisions are very large, being in some cases 100 miles from one end to the other; and if the accused, in the course of the investigation, has to be produced before a first class Magistrate for the purpose of obtaining an order of detention, it will take some time—a week or more to go and come back, and during all this time no investigation can be carried out. Now it is only an order for detention. After all, the case may go before a second class Magistrate, and a second class Magistrate has got the power of ordering detention in the course of the inquiry. So, two things will have to be done, if this section of the Bill stands as it is. Either there will be long delay caused in the investigation of cases by the police as the accused person will have to be taken long distances for the purposes of obtaining an order of detention; or the Government will have practically to empower all second class Magistrates to exercise the powers under this section. And if the Government invests all second class Magistrates, what is gained? Practically nothing is gained. I, therefore, think that in the interests of speedy administration of justice and in order to minimise the unnecessary detention of the accused himself in custody, my amendment should be accepted, so that all second class Magistrates can exercise the powers under this section.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Sir, Mr. Pantulu has explained the case clearly to the House. It is not a point on which we ourselves feel very deeply; but the Bill represents the views of the Joint Committee, and while naturally preferring their views, we are prepared to leave the decision to the House.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I beg to oppose this amendment. This power of detention should be given only to experienced Magistrates

[Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar.]

I would not even empower Government to empower second class Magistrates to do this. However, we may trust to the discretion of the Government in this, but let us not extend it further. This period of detention in police custody is just the time which is taken advantage of for extorting confessions and other things. Therefore, we have to be very careful that this power is given only to experienced Magistrates.

The motion was negatived.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, the amendment I propose is to clause 37, sub-clause (4), which Honourable Members will see, as at present drafted runs as follows:

"If such order is given by a Magistrate other than the District Magistrate or Sub-divisional Magistrate, he shall forward a copy of his order, with his reasons for making it, to the Magistrate to whom he is immediately subordinate."

The amendment I propose runs as follows:

"To clause 37 add the following sub-clause:

(iii) To sub-section (4) after the word 'subordinate' the following shall be added, namely:

'who may reverse it and order that a person ordered to be detained in the custody of the police shall be committed to jail custody or be released on bail or on his own recognizance as he may deem fit.'

Honourable Members will see that this express power which I propose to confer upon the magistrate to whom the proceedings of the police are reported is necessary and is not implied as might be suggested by the Honourable Members sitting on the Government benches. It might be argued that it is painting the lily and that magistrates do possess such power under section 496 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. But if Honourable Members will turn to section 496 they will find that the initial words of that section are:

"When any person other than a person accused of a non-bailable offence is arrested or detained without warrant by an officer in charge of a police station, or appears or is brought before a Court, and is prepared at any time while in the custody of such officer or at any stage of the proceedings before such Court to give bail, such person shall be released on bail."

That is only in the case of a bailable offence where bail may be given as a matter of right. Then section 497 says:

"When any person accused of any non-bailable offence is arrested or detained without warrant by an officer in charge of a police station, or appears or is brought before a Court, he may be released on bail, but he shall not be so released if there appear reasonable grounds for believing that he has been guilty of the offence of which he is accused."

Now, neither of these sections answers the purpose I have in view. The object of my amendment is to arm the magistrate with jurisdiction not merely to release a person on bail, but as I have pointed out, also to order that a person ordered to be detained in the custody of the police shall be committed to jail custody or be released on bail or on his own recognizance as he may deem fit. Now what is the object of a police officer reporting the matter to the magistrate? The section provides that the magistrate authorising detention under this section in the custody of the police shall record his reasons for so doing. The magistrate passes a judicial order that the accused, whether guilty of a cognizable or non-cognizable, bailable or non-bailable offence, might be detained in police custody instead of being sent to jail custody which is the ordinary rule. A copy of his order is sent to the Magistrate superior to him in jurisdiction under sub-clause (4). What is the object of sending up a copy of his order to his superior officer? The object obviously is that he may satisfy himself as to the propriety of the action he has taken in the case; and if that is the object it follows as a matter of necessity that such Magistrate should be empowered to reverse that order or to modify it in the manner suggested in my amendment, I think, therefore, Sir, that this is a salutary amendment and should be accepted by the House.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, in section 167, in the circumstances in which we are now dealing with, a Magistrate must have recorded reasons in writing for the detention of this person. He must then send a copy of his order to the District Magistrate or the Sub-divisional Magistrate if he is not a district Magistrate or a Sub-divisional Magistrate. My Honourable friend likened this amendment to the painting of the lily; he did however see that what he was doing was to affect another chapter altogether. He is affecting the chapter of the Code which deals with bail. Sir, when we were discussing an earlier clause on the motion, I think, on the suggestion of my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, it was decided that we should postpone consideration until we came to consider the bail provisions. That, Sir, is exactly the position with regard to this present amendment. I would like, however, to draw the Honourable Member's attention to the fact that he was reading section 497 as it stands in the Code to-day and not as it will stand in the Code, if this Bill ever does become law. Let me read section 497 which deals with the release of persons accused of non-bailable offences. As it is proposed to be amended by this Bill:

"When any person accused of any non-bailable offence is arrested or detained without warrant by an officer in charge of a police station or appears or is brought before a Court, he may be released on bail, but he shall not be so released if there appear reasonable grounds for believing that he has been guilty of an offence punishable with death or transportation for life:

Provided that the Court may direct that any person under the age of 16 years or any woman or any sick or infirm person accused of such an offence (i.e., an offence punishable with death or transportation for life) shall be released on bail."

Does, Sir, my Honourable friend intend by his amendment to modify these already very startling provisions as they stand in the Bill? Does he intend, Sir, to suggest that if a man is accused of an offence punishable with death or transportation for life and further if there are reasonable grounds for believing that he has been guilty of such an offence, that then it is necessary to give here, in another provision which deals with another subject altogether, power to the courts to release him? I think, Sir, the amendment is entirely unnecessary, quite misplaced, and I would suggest to my Honourable friend that he should withdraw it.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 37 do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 38 do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"That after clause 38 insert the following clause 39:

'39. In the proviso to section 171 of the said Code after the word and figures 'section 170' the words 'and declines to give his proper address' shall be inserted.'"

[Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri.]

Sir, section 171 was dealt in clause 39 of the Bill before it was sent to the Joint Committee but that clause 39 was omitted by the Joint Committee and I therefore propose that clause 39 be re-inserted and that the amendment which I beg to move be entered. Section 171 requires that a complainant or witness, refusing to attend or to execute a bond for appearance in court on the day on which the police case be put up, be taken into custody and sent to the court in custody. I beg to propose an amendment to the effect that the complainant or witness should not even though he refuses to execute a bond, be taken into custody but his name and address be taken and he may be asked to appear. If he declines to give his name and address, he may in that case be arrested and taken in custody. The practice in the mofussil is that a Government servant or a public officer is not required to execute a bond or is not required to attend on the date on which the police case be put up but is generally summoned by the court to appear when the case is taken up for consideration. That is when the police prepare their chalan, they take down the name of the witness if he happens to be a Government servant and instead of taking any bond from him or asking him to appear on the day on which the chalan is put up before the Magistrate, he is required to appear on receipt of summons from the court. Probably this is done to avoid interference in his duties and to provide that he should not be required to leave his work unless the head of the department is apprised of that fact. I suggest that a similar privilege or concession be extended to a person whose residence is known or who himself is known to the police or who gives his proper address to the police officer. It should not be necessary for him to appear in court along with the accused on the date on which the chalan is put up by the police. He may be summoned later on as is done in the case of the Government servant. Therefore I submit that though he refuses to execute a bond to appear on the day when the chalan be put up, he may not be taken into custody unless he declines to give his name and address. With these words I commend my amendment to the acceptance of the House.

Mr. H. Tenkinson: I do not know whether it is necessary for me to argue at length against this amendment. In section 170 of the Code it will be seen that the police officer has decided that there is sufficient evidence or reasonable grounds for sending the accused person up for trial. Then under sub-section (2) he sends to the Magistrate weapons, articles and so on and requires the complainant and so many of the persons who appear to such officer to be acquainted with the circumstances of the case as he may think necessary to execute a bond to appear before the Magistrate as thereby directed and prosecute or give evidence as the case may be in the matter of the charge against the accused. Now, section 171 which my Honourable friend proposes to amend is a section designed in the interests of the complainant and the witnesses, designed to obviate subjecting them to unnecessary restraint. The proviso, however, goes on to say that if any complainant or witness refuses to attend or to execute a bond as directed in section 170, the officer concerned is required to forward him in custody to the Magistrate. Now, will Honourable Members think of the stage we have reached. The final charge sheet of the police has been prepared. A list of witnesses is included in the charge sheet. That is laid before the Magistrate with the accused person and also the witnesses. That is the ordinary procedure for the beginning of a warrant trial. The Magistrate begins the trial at once. Now, according to the amendment moved by my Honourable friend witness A. B. is not there. He was a man who refused to attend who refused to execute a bond. He merely gave his name and proper address. What happens then? This witness may be one of the most important witnesses in the case. In that case all the witnesses are sent back to their homes and any person who has any experience of trying cases as a Magistrate will know how grievously witnesses object to being summoned again and again to appear to give evidence in Court. In that sense the amendment moved by my Honourable friend is very much against the interests of the class of persons in whose favour he proposes that it should be made. Take the case of the accused person. A number of Members of the House have objected very strongly to placing the accused person unnecessarily under restraint. The amendment that has now been moved would merely have the effect of lengthening the trial of every case in which a person has taken advantage of the privilege which my Honourable friend proposes to give to him and that must always be against the interests of the accused person. I will suggest also that the amendment is somewhat inconsistent with section 170, subsection (2), which requires a police officer to call upon the witnesses to execute a bond. I do not think it is necessary to argue this amendment any further. There is I submit no doubt that it should not be made.

Dr. Nand Lal: I oppose this amendment . . .

(Voice: "The question may now be put.")

Mr. President: The question is that the question be put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is:

That a new clause 39 be added to the Bill, namely:

"39. In the proviso to section 171 of the said Code after the word and figures section 170 the words 'and declines to give his proper address' shall be inserted."

The motion was negatived.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I beg to move, Sir, amendment No. 154 in a slightly altered form:

"That clause 40 be renumbered 40 (1) and that to said clause the following sub-clause be added, namely:

"(2) After subsection (3) of the same section the following sub-section shall be inserted, namely:

"(4) A copy of any report forwarded under this section shall on application be furnished to the accused before the commencement of the inquiry or trial;

Provided that the same shall be paid for unless the Magistrate for some special reason thinks fit to furnish it free of cost."

This amendment relates, Sir, to the supply to the accused person of a copy of the charge sheet in the case on which he is being prosecuted. There has been considerable difficulty in this matter on account of the rulings of various courts that copies of charge sheets should not be furnished to accused persons. Some courts went to the length of holding that till the accused begins his defence, a copy of the charge sheet should not be furnished to him. It has worked as a great hardship. The accused has to grope about in the dark as to what case he has to meet, who the prosecution witnesses are and what their evidence is going to be. This amendment is therefore very necessary. Before a case begins, or the inquiry or trial commences, an accused person ought to be furnished with a copy of the charge on which he is being prosecuted. Just as he is furnished with a copy of the complaint on which he is being prosecuted, so also this charge sheet is the information on which the Magistrate takes cognizance, and it is but right therefore that the accused should be granted a copy of it.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 40, as amended, and clauses 41 and 42 were added to the Bill.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, in moving my amendment, I wish to preface my remarks by saying that I have no doubt the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith will be able to say that it is a very badly worded amendment. I move, Sir, that:

"In clause 43 for sub-section (2) of proposed section 185, substitute the following:

"(2) Where two or more Courts not subordinate to the same High Court have taken cognizance of the same offence or of an offence which includes the one under the cognizance of the other Court, any of the High Courts which has jurisdiction over either of the subordinate Courts may direct the trial of such offender to be held in the Court subordinate to it, and on such decision proceedings against such person in the other Court shall be discontinued."

In the section as introduced by the Government there are some very obvious defects, and it is desirable that those defects should be removed. It is practically a new section. Difficulty was felt both in Madras and in Calcutta with the section as it was originally worded, and it is apparently with the object of removing those difficulties that this section has been introduced in the form in which it has come before the House. I will mention one or two defects which are on the surface. Section 185 (2) as drafted says: "Where two or more Courts not subordinate to the same High Court have taken cognizance of the same offence" Now the Government would realize that two Courts in two different places may take cognizance upon the same facts of two different offences. No provision has been made for that. For example, upon the same set of facts, in one Court a man may be charged for breach of trust, in another jurisdiction he may be charged for cheating. If you leave the words "for the same offence" as they are, a man is likely to be tried twice upon the same facts for different offences.

Another matter is, there may be a minor offence and a major offence. A man may be charged for theft in one place, and in some other court for extortion. Suppose there is a charge of theft in one place and extortion in another, is he to be tried on two occasions for these offences in the two places? These are the defects which I notice in the section as it has been drafted.

Another difficulty which has been felt in Madras, and I think the same difficulty was felt in Calcutta, was this. A charge may be brought against a person in a particular Presidency where the accused does not reside, and the prosecution may not be diligently pressed; in another place where the accused resides and has facilities for defence, the charge may be pressed against him. Why should we restrict the power for ordering stay of proceedings to the place where the original suit was instituted? If any of the High Courts is moved, and if that High Court finds that it is desirable in the interests of the accused that the case should be tried within its jurisdiction, then all the proceedings in the other High Court should be stayed. If you make a provision for that, there will be no difficulty, but if you leave the matter where it is, then the accused will be subjected to great inconvenience by compelling him to make the motion in the place where the charge was originally instituted. After all the convenience of the accused and the facilities he has for defending himself should be the guiding factor. Therefore, whichever High Court is moved for the purpose of stopping proceedings in another jurisdiction, the order passed in that High Court should be binding upon the other High Court. Those two factors should be taken into account; they must be provided for. It may be better to postpone the consideration of this section for the purpose of bringing in a section which will satisfy the two requirements which I have just now mentioned. Otherwise the section as it has been worded by the Government draftsman will not meet the cases. I move, Sir, the amendment standing in my name.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I admit that this is rather a difficult provision. It was drafted and re-drafted many times before it found its way into the Bill. My Honourable friend suspects me every time of distrusting his own drafting. I must admit, Sir, I found a little difficulty as to his intention in respect of those words—"an offence which includes the one under the cognizance of the other Court". I understand now what he means by those words from the remarks which have fallen from him in moving his amendment. What we have aimed at is as far as possible to get a rule of thumb for these cases which will bring finality. That is why we have provided that the first High Court to take action in the matter should be the High Court within whose jurisdiction the proceedings were started. There is no particular reason why that High Court should come in; but we must start somewhere and that is why we have selected that High Court. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar would leave it to any High Court to move, but I think that possibly he has not contemplated the case where both High Courts act simultaneously. It is not at all impossible. Both High Courts are moved and both give orders, each without the knowledge of the other; both give orders that the trial should continue in courts within their jurisdiction; what is the result? The two trials come on; there is no getting away from that. I think, Sir, the clause in the Bill will obviate that difficulty. At any rate we shall not get simultaneous orders from two High Courts. The High Courts will take it in rotation; if one won't move then the other will. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar thinks there will be some difficulty about the words used at the beginning of the clause "take cognizance of the same offence". It may be, Sir, that there are some cases which the clause in the Bill will probably not meet.

But it is impossible to draft this clause to make it comprehensive and to make it meet every possible case that will arise. We tried to do it, but we could not. The House must remember that until this clause was put into the Bill there was no provision whatever like this. We have gone as far as it is possible to go without unnecessary complications to remove this difficulty which has actually occurred in practice. I think the procedure which the clause lays down should be allowed to stand. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's proposal will leave us in a state of uncertainty in certain cases; there will be no finality at all.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadian Urban): May I suggest for the consideration of the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith the addition of the words "of the same offence or of different offences on the same facts". That might probably obviate the difficulty.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: It is not an expression which is used in the Code at all. Perhaps my Honourable friend has in his mind the words 'offences arising out of the same transaction'. But that is far too wide and I think my friend will agree with me.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 43 do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I move, Sir, the following amendment:

"In clause 44 before the words 'In the first proviso' insert the words—"

'In section 188 of the said Code for the words 'Her Majesty' the words 'His Majesty' and for the word 'Queen' the word 'Crown' shall be substituted."

I move this amendment with some regret, Sir, in that I am sure that the words which are dear to us should be removed from the Code as it stands. I think it is an oversight. I do not know if these words 'Her Majesty' and 'servant of the Queen' occur in other places, but they are an anachronism now. I do not know when we are revising the Code we should not put this right. The substitution of the words 'His Majesty' and 'servant of the Crown' will make it all right. I therefore move this amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, Mr. Rangachariar is correct in saying that the words 'Her Majesty' and 'Queen' are anachronisms now; but the unfortunate thing is that there are several similar anachronisms in the Code. It is not much use our putting it right in one place, unless we can put it right in every place. In sections 129 and 130 the words 'Her Majesty' occur, and also in sections 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150 and 151, and in innumerable places in the schedules to the Code. It is our intention to put these right. When this Bill is passed, and before two other Bills affecting the Code are passed, we shall introduce a consolidating Bill remedying these defects. It is not easy, I suggest, to take it in one particular place; we might leave it as it is for the present.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I accept the suggestion, Sir.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 44 before the words 'In the first proviso' insert the words—"

'In section 188 of the said Code for the words 'Her Majesty' the words 'His Majesty' and for the word 'Queen' the word 'Crown' shall be substituted."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clauses 44, 45 and 46 do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I do not know, Sir, if it is convenient to adjourn the House now. There is a function to which all of us have been invited. The next amendments relating to sanction will probably take some time.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We are unwilling to put our old friend aside even for a short time, but we are prepared to agree in this case.

Mr. President: It suits my personal convenience to adjourn the House. But, on the other hand, I should like to say here that the business of this House—and particularly business of this character—ought in the minds of Honourable Members to take precedence over everything, even of their own personal convenience. However, I waive that to-day and adjourn till Eleven O'Clock to-morrow morning.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Thursday, the 1st February, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

302. Mr. K. G. Bagde: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement showing:

- (i) The period during which (a) the Director and (b) the Assistant Director of the Central Bureau of Information were on tour in the years 1921, 1922 and 1923;
- (ii) The places which they visited;
- (iii) The travelling and other expenses incurred by the tours; and
- (iv) The purpose and result of the tours?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Statements giving the information required in parts (i) and (ii) will be supplied to the Honourable Member.

(iii) The total cost for the period mentioned is:

					Rs.	A.	P.
Director	5,761	7	0
Assistant Director	6,154	0	0
TOTAL					11,915	7	0

(iv) The Director and Assistant Director, Central Bureau of Information, go on tour under the direction of the Home Department for the purpose of consulting on publicity matters with provincial publicity officers and local Governments and sometimes local officials. The Assistant Director also has to be in Calcutta for several weeks in connection with the publication of the annual Moral and Material Progress Report which is presented to Parliament. The results of the tours have been satisfactory.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Have these officers any authority over the provincial officers in regard to publicity? If so, what?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: They have no such authority.

SECRET SERVICE GRANT EXPENDED BY CENTRAL BUREAU.

303. Mr. K. G. Bagde: Will the Government be pleased to state:

- (i) Is it a fact that an annual allotment is made to the Central Bureau of Information called the Secret Service Grant?
- (ii) If so, what were the allotments made, and how were they spent in the years 1921 and 1922?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Government are not prepared to make any statement regarding expenditure from funds provided for Secret Service.

M. K. Reddi Garu: Is any account kept of the Secret Service Grant?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Certainly; but I am not prepared to reveal it.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Is this grant placed before the Standing Finance Committee—the way in which it is spent? Will the Committee have a voice in deciding the matter.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Secret Service funds are devoted for secret purposes and it is not possible to consult our Committee as to the manner in which they should be expended.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: What are the objects upon which this fund is spent?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Secret objects.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is the amount spent for secret service votable or non-votable and is it open to the Assembly to criticise the expenditure for the secret purpose?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: It is part of the votable funds.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Are these accounts audited by the Auditor General?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Yes.

RE-EMPLOYMENT OF PENSIONERS.

304. Mr. K. G. Bagde: Will the Government be pleased to state:

- (i) Is it a rule that Government pensioners should not, after retirement from service, be re-employed in the offices of the Government of India?
- (ii) Have any such men been so employed?
- (iii) If so, what are their names, ages, and the offices in which they are working?
- (iv) Will they consider the desirability of adhering to the rule rigorously in future?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (i) No. Government pensioners can be re-employed on public grounds under Article 520 of the Civil Service Regulations.

(ii) Yes.

(iii) The information is being collected and will be supplied to the Honourable Member in due course.

(iv) This does not arise.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Instead of giving or furnishing information to the questioner, would it not be desirable, for the benefit of the public, that each and every Member of the Assembly should also be furnished with the information in question and that it should be published in the proceedings of the business of the House?

Mr. President: It is not necessary for every answer to every question to appear in the Report. If the Member of Government answering the question considers it to be of sufficient public importance, then he may, on his own responsibility, lay it on the table; otherwise it is an economical and proper procedure to supply the information only to the Member who asked for it. It is perfectly open, on the other hand, for any other Member to repeat the question and ask for the information in a public form.

RULES UNDER GOVERNMENT OF INDIA ACT.

305. Mr. K. C. Neogy: Have Government any information as to whether and when it is intended to make rules under Section 19A of the Government of India Act for the purpose of regulating and restricting the exercise of the power of superintendence, direction and control, vested in the Secretary of State and the Secretary of State in Council, so as to give effect to the purposes of the Government of India Act?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to the rules published with the Reforms Office notification No. 835-G., dated the 14th December, 1920.

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

MR. AGARWALA'S BILL re: IMPROVEMENT OF CATTLE.

132. Babu Ambica Prasad Sinha: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table Lala Girdharilal Agarwala's last Bill on the subject of the Improvement of Cattle with all correspondence on the subject?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: As the Honourable Member is aware there is no such Bill before the House.

In the exercise of his statutory powers under section 67 of the Government of India Act, His Excellency the Governor General refused his previous sanction to the introduction of Lala Girdharilal Agarwala's latest Bill on the subject of the protection and improvement of cattle. The Bill cannot therefore be introduced. The Government cannot see their way to lay on the table either the Bill or the correspondence relating to it as they consider that such a course would not, in the circumstances, be proper.

PROTECTION OF CATTLE.

133. Rai Sahib Lakshmi Narayan Lal: (a) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the resolutions passed for cattle protection in India at a public meeting of the citizens of Calcutta and suburbs presided over by Dr. H. W. B. Moreno in December last?

(b) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the following rules for the restriction of slaughter of cattle in slaughter houses contained in Government notification No. 1236-955-XIII of the Central Provinces dated 31st May, 1922 (referred to in resolution No. 2 of the said meeting):

"Rule 6 of the said notification.

The following animals shall be rejected and returned to the owner:—

(1) Any animal which in the opinion of the supervisor is

(a) pregnant or

(b) in milk.

(2) All cows.

(3) Any animal other than sheep or goats which in the opinion of the supervisor is of or under the age of 9 years."

(c) Are the Government aware that all-India Cow Conference has, year after year, been craving some substantial steps by the Government for the protection of the cattle?

(d) Are the Government aware that substantial steps have been taken for the protection of cattle in Afghanistan and Hyderabad?

(e) Will the Government be pleased to consider the advisability of addressing other Provincial Governments regarding the desirability of restricting the slaughter of cattle in their provinces, on the lines of the aforesaid Government notification of the Central Provinces and take such other substantial steps for the protection of the cattle as the Government think fit and proper?

(f) Will the Government be pleased to state whether the Government are going to do anything in the matter?

Mr. J. Hullah: (a) and (b) Yes.

(d) The Government have no information as to what has been done in Afghanistan and Hyderabad.

(e), (c) and (f). A full statement on the subject was made by the Honourable Member in the Department of Revenue and Agriculture in the Council of State on the 19th September, 1922. The Government have nothing to add to that statement.

THE INDIAN FACTORIES (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member): Sir, I move for leave to introduce a Bill further to amend the Indian Factories Act, 1911. I feel rather ashamed, Sir, standing before this Assembly with yet another Bill, but this time at least I can plead that it is a very small Bill. Sections 3, 4 and 5 are entirely unimportant. Section 3 clears up an ambiguity in the Act. Sections 4 and 5 correct obvious errors. The only clause of any importance is clause 2; and I hope, that if Honourable Members will read the Statement of Objects and Reasons, they will find that it fully explains why we have inserted this clause in the Bill. The fact of the matter is that when we introduced a Bill to amend the Factories Act two years ago we proposed to prescribe that the weekly rest day should always be on the same day. We did not propose to give employers any discretion at all to substitute other holidays for that day. That proposal was adversely criticised in many quarters, and it was represented very strongly that employers should be allowed to substitute an important Hindu or Muhammadan religious festival. Subsequently the Government proposal was turned down by the Select Committee and by the Legislature, and the Legislature left section 22 of the Act practically as it was before, that is to say, it enabled an employer to substitute for a Sunday a holiday any one of the three days preceding or any one of the three succeeding the Sunday. At the same time we introduced into the Bill a clause defining the week as beginning always on a Sunday and we also introduced into the Bill a prescription that the weekly hours of work must not exceed sixty. I am afraid that nobody realized what the effect of these three provisions, taken together, would be, and the effect of the three provisions taken together has been to neutralize what was the expressed intention of the Legislature. I can explain it by a very simple instance. Supposing an important religious festival occurs on a Saturday. The employer gives his workman a holiday on that Saturday and makes him work on the following Sunday. That employer is working 10 hours a day. The result is that in the first week he works 50 hours, in the second week he works 70 hours because the week begins on a Sunday and in the two weeks together he only works 120 hours; but in the second week he has worked 70 hours, and therefore he has infringed the law which prescribes a weekly limit of 60 hours. We have consulted Local Governments and also our Standing Departmental Committee, and we have decided to put up to the Assembly this proposal to amend the law in order to bring it into accord with the expressed intention of the Legislature when the Factories Amendment Bill was carried this time last year. I move, Sir, for leave to introduce the Bill.

Mr. President: The question is that leave be given to introduce a Bill further to amend the Indian Factories Act, 1911.

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I introduce the Bill.

RESOLUTION RE EMIGRATION OF UNSKILLED LABOURERS TO CEYLON.

Mr. J. Hullah (Revenue and Agriculture Secretary): I move, Sir:

"That this Assembly approves the draft notification which has been laid in draft before the Chamber specifying the terms and conditions on which emigration for the purpose of unskilled work shall be lawful to Ceylon, and recommends to the Governor General in Council that the notification be published in the Gazette of India."

This Resolution, Sir, is of a kind altogether unfamiliar in the history of the Indian Legislature. It is a direct outcome of section 10 of the Emigration Act which we passed about a year ago, and which lays down that emigration for the purpose of unskilled work shall not be lawful except to such countries and on such terms and conditions as the Governor General in Council by notification in the Gazette of India may specify in this behalf. The Act goes on to say that no notification shall be made under this section unless it has been laid in draft before both Chambers of the Legislature and has been approved by Resolution in each Chamber, either as it stands or with modifications. It will thus be seen that the Assembly has been given practically full power over the emigration of unskilled labour. It can not only regulate it, but it can control it, it can stop it, and let it begin, and so forth. That is a very big power and one which should obviously be exercised with the greatest care. It not only concerns the interests of the labouring population in India and the extent to which they should be able to avail themselves of outlets abroad, of work under conditions which are often far superior to those which they know at home, but it also involves the interests of those labourers when they reach the countries to which they emigrate and the interests of those who are already there; and lastly, it may involve, and I think it must involve, a very considerable degree of interference with the domestic arrangements of other countries and other Governments.

I hope that Honourable Members will bear with me for a while if I set forth certain facts many of which will be known to them; my reason for doing so is that although they are known to Members, it is possible that the important bearing which they have on the question before us may not be fully appreciated by those who have neither the time, nor the inclination perhaps, nor the opportunity to study the subject.

Ceylon, as we all know, is very close to India, being separated from India by the narrowest of narrow seas. The journey from India to Ceylon is as easy as that, say, from Delhi to Agra,—easier, certainly less formidable than the journey from London to Paris. Consequently, there is always a very great stream of traffic in both directions. Conditions in Ceylon are well known in southern India; conditions in southern India are well known in Ceylon. Many labourers have part of their families in one country and part in another; still more have their relations in Ceylon, though their own residence may be in India. The Indian population of Ceylon is very great. About a third of the Ceylon population consists of Indians and about a quarter of it consists of Tamils. In all there are more than 1,100,000 Tamils in Ceylon. A great deal of the movement between Ceylon and India consists of labourers going to Ceylon or returning from that country. In the last five years the average annual number of labourers going to the Ceylon estates has been no less than 49,000, and of those returning no less than 29,000. It is clear then that we have not here a new slate to write upon. It is not as though we were deciding whether to allow emigration to a country to which it is not allowed at present, such as Fiji, British Guiana, Mauritius or any other country which may desire Indian labour. We have to consider the conditions applicable to a movement which is already in force on a very wide scale and I think that our conditions should be such as to dislocate as little as possible a movement which has in the past been free and for the most part healthy. It was because we appreciated the difficulties of regulating this movement that we exempted, when we passed the Act last year, Ceylon and the Straits from the operation of the Act for a period of one year. But the Act will come into force in respect of these countries on the 5th of next month and we have therefore to make up our minds as to the conditions on which we shall allow emigration to proceed.

The coolie in Ceylon is on the whole well looked after. He lives in lines which are constantly inspected by the Government sanitary officers and the pattern of these lines was very favourably reported on by Mr. Marjoribanks and Sir Ahmed Thambi Maricair who were deputed by the Government of India to make an inquiry some years ago into the conditions of labour in Ceylon. There is plenty of provision for medical relief. There are 54 Government hospitals, 81 Government dispensaries, 63 private hospitals and 471 private dispensaries. There are numerous schools for the children of labourers and an Ordinance lays down that the Government Educational Officer can require any estate owner to establish a school on his estate. In practice that power has never been exercised because it is found that the estate owners are willing to establish schools and have done so on a very considerable scale. Recruitment for Ceylon at present is done by a body known as the Ceylon Labour Commission, which is financed by contributions from the estates. The Commission has a Commissioner in India with headquarters at Trichinopoly, who supervises all the arrangements and working of recruitment. Recruits are obtained by persons known as Kanganis, who are labourers themselves on the estates in Ceylon and are sent over by the estates to obtain labourers. When a Kanganis comes to India he brings with him from the estate an authority to the Labour Commissioner in India to obtain an advance for his expenses.

He is then given a certificate by the Labour Commissioner and he sets forth to recruit labourers, almost invariably in his own village or its neighbourhood; and the labourers which he recruits are usually his own relations or his own friends. In practice he recruits only about four labourers. He is not a professional recruiter; it has been the aim and object of the Ceylon Labour Commission throughout to discountenance absolutely the professional recruiter. Recruitment is simply done by one labourer coming over to India and inducing his friends to accompany him back.

Before we passed the Emigration Act and before we entered into negotiations with the Ceylon Government, that Government had already taken steps for the improvement of the conditions of labour in Ceylon. They repealed all the penal provisions of their labour law and they also tackled the very grave question of indebtedness among the labourers. They abolished a curious institution known as the Tundu. It would take me some time to explain exactly what that institution is, but briefly it is a contract to pay off labourers if the labourers pay off the debts due to the estate. Ordinarily the Kanganis were in debt to the estate and the labourers in their turn were in debt to the estate through the Kanganis in respect of advances which had been made to cover the expenses of their transport. In time abuses grew up. All kinds of advances were made by the Kanganis to the labourers and to a certain extent by the estates to the Kanganis; with the result that each Kanganis with his band of labourers was often saddled with a very heavy burden of debt. Now, when the Kanganis wanted more advances he went to the Superintendent of the estate and demanded them, and if they were refused he demanded a Tundu, the written contract that he could move off with his labourers if he paid up his debts. The Superintendent of the estate either had to give more advances or he had to stand the risk of the coolies leaving him by simply giving a month's notice, or he had to give the Tundu. The Kanganis then hawked the Tundu around the other estates and sold it, practically offering himself and his labourers as the price of the debt which he owed to his existing estate; he also demanded an extra advance for himself which he put into his own pocket and did not hand over to his labourers. The Ceylon Government has now abolished the Tundu altogether and has made its issue absolutely illegal. The penalty laid down in the law is a fine of Rs. 20,000 or two years' imprisonment.

So much for what the Ceylon Government had done. Before we entered into negotiations with them we held a meeting of our Standing Emigration Committee about June last, and settled the conditions that we should put forward to the Government of Ceylon. Those conditions were practically the same as we have now put before the House. I will briefly refer to them. The first refers to licensing. The fourth requires that the cost of recruitment shall be borne by a common fund to be raised in such manner and managed by such agency as may appear suitable to the Colonial Government. These were the only conditions to which the Government of Ceylon demurred. They said that they did not wish to be directly concerned with recruitment in any form. They said that the attitude which they desired to take up was one between the employer and the labourer and they pointed out that there were very serious disadvantages if the work of recruitment were practically thrown on them since it would then be necessary for them to appear, at any rate, to be identified with the interests of the planters. On the other hand, the Government of India took the view that the Colonial Governments who desire Indian labourers should be responsible for clean recruitment. The Standing Emigration Committee advised the Government of India to adhere to this attitude. We did so and the Ceylon Government has now accepted these conditions. The condition regarding contracts of service not exceeding one month was accepted without any difficulty at all; and it will be seen from condition (3) that the Ceylon Government will introduce legislation limiting contracts to one month. Condition No. (5) asks for the appointment of an agent; that was accepted without any hesitation by the Ceylon Government. Condition No. (6) refers to repatriation; that also has been accepted. Similarly the other conditions, which I need not detail, as they would only take up time, have been accepted. We also made certain inquiries and certain suggestions. The estates provide rice to their labourers, in many cases at below cost price. We asked the Ceylon Government to satisfy themselves that no profit was made on this supply of rice. A deputation that came over from Ceylon regarded that request with some surprise, and even with some amusement, pointing out that so far from any profit being made from these supplies of rice very heavy losses indeed had been incurred, especially at the time when the Government of India themselves imposed control of rice with the result that the price of rice abroad was extremely high and the Ceylon planters had to stand the loss. However, we have been assured that the estates make no profit on the supply of rice. We also asked for the prohibition of the employment of children below the age of 10 years; that has been accepted. We also threw out a suggestion for the introduction of compulsory education in Ceylon. We did not add that we had no compulsory education at the time in India. The Ceylon Government gave us a sympathetic reply, but they pointed out that power is already given by the Ordinance to provide schools at the expense of the estates, but it has never been found necessary to impose this by compulsion, and we have not pressed the point any further. We also asked for information regarding the cost of living and wages, and we threw out a tentative suggestion about the minimum wage. I will come to that later. We had the advantage of hearing a deputation from Ceylon and our enquiries, the enquiries which the Standing Emigration Committee made of that deputation, were exhaustive and lasted for several days. At those meetings a great deal of attention was concentrated on the subject of the minimum wage, but as one result of them we asked the Ceylon Government to make a further concession and undertake to repatriate not only those people who, as the condition lays down must be repatriated on the ground of their state of health, on the ground that the work which they are required to do is unsuitable or on the ground of unjust treatment, but also all persons who are thrown out of employment by a slump in the tea or rubber industries. That was a considerable concession to ask, but it has been granted.

[Mr. J. Hullah.]

The minimum wage, as I have said, was the subject of very prolonged discussion. The deputation that came over pointed out the difficulty of introducing a minimum wage and we fully appreciated those difficulties. But still we thought the matter was one of great importance and should be pursued. Finally the recommendation of the Standing Committee was "that the Ceylon Government should be asked to make an inquiry into the question of fixing a basic wage subject to a minimum and of the cost of living in relation to the wages now paid. In the meantime the Government of India should do its best to secure an improvement in wages. On receipt of the report of the inquiry suggested above the Emigration Committee will have to consider the findings and decide whether to ask for a Joint Committee to settle what should be the rate of wages and other details." That is how the matter was left. We asked for an inquiry into the possibility of fixing a minimum wage. They replied at once that they agreed to institute an inquiry as we desired; at the same time they pointed out the very considerable difficulties involved. It may interest the Assembly if I read out those parts of their reply which deal with this subject. They say:

"They will at once institute the inquiry. It must be noted, however, that the question is complex and that no satisfactory solution can be ascertained without very careful inquiry and consideration. There are several important factors tending to raise the rate of wages in general which are now in course of operation, the chief of them being the abolition of the tundu and of the penal clauses in the labour ordinance. The full effects of these factors have not yet had time to develop and cannot be ascertained without careful analysis. Conditions in Ceylon vary greatly in the different districts. Such operations as plucking tea and tapping rubber are generally performed a piece work and the unit rates of payment vary according to conditions. Again, it will also be necessary to investigate the cost of living in Southern India on a standard basis of comfort in order to compute the allowance for provision for old age which is asked for."

We asked incidentally that the minimum wage should include provision for old age.

"It will, therefore, be no simple task to analyse", they say.

"the statistics collected and ascertained whether they can be reduced with any degree of accuracy to a uniform datum for the whole Island. Unless this can be done, the probable margin of error in calculating any basic wage might well be such that the establishment of such a uniform wage might operate to the disadvantage and not to the advantage of a large proportion of the labour on estates."

In this way they have pointed out the difficulties and have asked for time, which we have practically offered them, for we told them, in communicating our views about the minimum wage, that the Government of India would not insert in the draft Notification placed before the Assembly any stipulation on the subject. The reason why the Emigration Committee were anxious to have introduced if possible a minimum wage was that, they considered the rates of wages in Ceylon were too low.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Who did not consider that?

Mr. J. Hullah: The Standing Committee considered that the wages in Ceylon were too low, though they are above the rates of wages in Southern India.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: That is not correct.

Mr. J. Hullah: If they are not above the wages in Southern India, why do the labourers go in such large numbers to Ceylon?

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: The Army of Kanganis.

Mr. J. Hullah: A possible suggestion, but one that I should not like to make, is that they are not so favourably treated by the landholders in Madras as they are in Ceylon.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: That is true also.

Mr. Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Mr. Joshi would not let them go if he could help it.

Mr. J. Hullah: The actual rates in Ceylon are unknown to us; they vary so much from estate to estate. We have had much difficulty in ascertaining them; so has the Ceylon Government in ascertaining them and giving them to us. The Labour Commissioner stated that the rates of wages for men are 6 annas 11 pies per day on rubber estates and 6 annas 9 pies per day on tea estates; for women 5 annas one pie and 5 annas respectively, and for children 3 annas 6 pies and 3 annas 8 pies but in addition the labourer is offered piece-work, and he can also, if he likes, work overtime. The rates with piece-work and overtime are for a man 8 annas 10 pies per day on a rubber estate, 8 annas 6 pies per day on a tea estate; for women 6 annas 10 pies and 7 annas 1 pie; for a child 4 annas in both cases. The information given to us by the Ceylon Government is in rupees per month. They tell us that the average rates with piece-work and overtime are, for a man 16 to 20 rupees a month on rubber estates, 12 to 16 rupees a month on tea estates; for a woman 10 to 12 rupees for rubber and the same for tea; for a child Rs. 6-8 per month for rubber and the same for tea. The cost of living for a man, his wife and two children is approximately Rs. 17 a month for bazaar supplies and rice, but does not include the cost of clothes, festivals and so forth. On this information as I have said, the Standing Emigration Committee were not satisfied that wages were sufficiently high, and they therefore proposed the institution of a minimum wage. We have asked that an inquiry should be made into the question of establishing such a wage and that the results of the inquiry may be submitted to our Emigration Committee, and possibly we may have to ask for a Joint Committee of India and Ceylon to investigate conditions before the minimum wage can be settled and imposed. It will thus be seen that a considerable time must elapse. The subject is an extremely difficult one. Conditions vary in different parts of the island; they vary between tea and rubber estates. There is always the possibility, almost the certainty, of considerable fluctuations in the products, rubber and tea; there is also the possibility that a minimum wage may not operate to the advantage of the labourer. For that reason we have not placed in our stipulations anything about a minimum wage, and we told the Ceylon Government that we should not insert anything of the kind in the notification that we should place before the Assembly.

I have now shown, I hope, Sir, that conditions in Ceylon are on the whole favourable, that it may be necessary to have wages raised, and that it may be necessary to have them fixed by Statute in the forms of a minimum wage. I have also shown that there is a very large movement of labourers in both directions, and that it would not be to the advantage of ourselves or of the labourers or of the Government of Ceylon that there should be any drastic interference with present conditions. I have shown that the Ceylon Government have met us as far as they can at present and that they have agreed to all that we have placed before them as the absolute conditions that we require. I now commend the Resolution to the House.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I move that the consideration of this question be adjourned to some day next week which you, in conjunction with the Leader of the House, may fix for the purpose. Sir, the Honourable Member who has just spoken has been very enthusiastic over the condition of the labourers in Ceylon. I am inclined to think that a planter could not have put it more enthusiastically and ably than the Honourable Member has done regarding the way in which the labourers are being treated in Ceylon. We, Sir, on this side of the House believe that the picture is quite different to what has been depicted by the Honourable Member. We consider, at any rate, that the materials placed before us are not sufficient to enable us to come to a definite conclusion upon the question which we have to discuss. For example, we should like to have some information regarding the wages which are being paid by various industries in Ceylon; we should like to have some information as regards the sex proportion in Ceylon; we should like to know what the Standing Emigration Committee recommended as regards the various matters placed before them. It is not enough that you place certain materials before the Standing Committee, but it is necessary, to enable the House to judge rightly upon the question, that these materials should also be available to the House. Whatever may be the deliberations of the Standing Committee, those deliberations must be made available to us to enable us to come to an impartial decision upon the matters placed before us. Without that information it would be impossible to decide the very important questions which have been brought forward for consideration in the rules which have been promulgated. One matter which the Honourable Member mentioned was that the Government of India have informed the Ceylon Government that they would not insist upon the minimum wage being included in the rules. I do not think, as at present advised, that this House would agree with the advice which has been tendered by the Executive Government to the Ceylon Government on the subject. We should certainly like to know something about the minimum wages which are paid and also what it costs a family to live in Ceylon. Unless these matters are clearly placed before us, we will not be in a position to give our decision on these questions.

Sir, Some statements were made as regards the wages paid in South India and it was said that these wages compare unfavourably with the wages paid in Ceylon. We join issue upon that question. Some of us know what we pay to labourers in South India, and it is not at all right to say that the wages paid in Ceylon, ranging from five annas and nine pices to nine annas, are more than what is paid in South India by landlords. However, Sir, I do not want to enter into a discussion of the various questions which will have to be discussed later on, but I do think that, having regard to the materials which the Government have placed before us, it would be impossible for us to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion at present. As my friends point out, there are no materials before us whatsoever. Whatever may be the materials that have been placed before the Standing Committee, we have no materials before us. We want all these materials to be placed before us before we can arrive at any decision.

I therefore move, Sir, that the consideration of this Resolution be adjourned to some day next week.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Sir, I desire to support the motion for postponement of the consideration of this Resolution. I am afraid, I cannot, like my friend Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, characterise the statement of Mr. Hullah, that has been placed before us, as very "enthusiastic," in the sense suggested by Mr. Seshagiri and must admit that it was a balanced statement of the case which has been very helpful. I wish we had the materials before us earlier. Mr. Hullah has told us that this is unfamiliar in the history of Indian legislation and that under section 10 of the Emigration Act we have certain powers that are large. Following him up I say that those who have powers must also recognise obligations; they cannot be expected to assent to any proposition, however seemingly simple, without thorough investigation. Sir, I do not for a moment wish to suggest that this House should again go into a Committee of the whole House for the purpose of traversing what our Committee has already done. Perhaps I am wrong in calling it our Committee, but I mean the Joint Emigration Committee which sat and will be still sitting. I think that every material that has been placed before that Committee should be made available to Members of this House. We tried to enlighten ourselves. We approached some of the Members of the Committee; they were good enough to talk to us, but when we asked them for papers, they said the papers were confidential and that they could not let us see them. Well, official secrets are being very well kept by those Members, and I congratulate them and the Government upon such loyal adherence to their instructions. At the same time, Sir, it cannot be expected that we, as a House, should agree to what is laid before us, without thoroughly knowing and appreciating the situation upon materials.

Sir, no one can deny that a considerable advance has been made in this direction. Thanks to Lord Hardinge's endeavours, indentured labour—shall I call it slavery—is at an end. We have just heard that the toonda system compelled people to go and sell themselves like King Harish Chandra of old at Benares, to keep himself out of indebtedness. That is a past thing now, but we should like to be satisfied that the Kangani, who has always lived to his own interest, is not able to profit by all the loopholes and openings there may be. Well, the indebtedness is wiped out; that is a matter for congratulation. Those who have gone into the matter know what that indebtedness was. It was mostly imaginary, such as any Kangani or soucar can work up, if he wants to. We have that in Bengal. I speak with some feeling, because it is not entirely a South Indian question. If the figures that I have got are anywhere near correct, about one-third of the labour goes from the Bengal ports. I do not say they are all Bengalis; there may be United Provinces people and Punjab people going through Bengal. But there is a point of view other than South Indian, and whatever the rapacious South Indian landlord may be doing, other parts of the country will probably claim to join issue in the same way that Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar joins issue with regard to South India. However, these are extraneous matters for the moment. What we in general wish to know is the exact condition of things. I quite agree that by the 5th of March some definite action will have to be taken because it affects many and large interests and probably the vexed question of minimum wages will have to stand over; and admittedly interim notifications will be needed, we shall be prepared to assent to them when we have the materials before us.

In the meantime, there are one or two points that have struck us, which will require elucidation. I do not want to go into the details now, if this motion is to be carried, but, if it is not, I should like to ask what is to happen after the expiration of the period of one year mentioned in article 6 of this notification? These are matters that require to be cleared up. We have provisions as to what is to happen between the expiration of the period of one month and one year, mentioned in item 6 of the notification, but, is it to be taken for granted that, if the man has been there for a year and has known all about the prevailing situation, that there is to be no further help afterwards? Several matters that are not in the notification have been mentioned by Mr. Hullah. It is very necessary that we should know all these definitely. Whether that is to be made a part of the notification or not is another matter, but, in order to enable us to judge whether we should assent to these notifications, these items of information which have been now furnished to us or foreshadowed should be available in a more tangible form. I do not want to labour these points at the present moment because we are now speaking on the motion for postponement of the Resolution and, if that is assented to, it will not be necessary to go into the details now.

With these words, I support the motion for postponement of the consideration of the Resolution.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma (Revenue and Agriculture Member): Sir, the question before the House is as to whether postponement should be granted, in order to enable Members to study fully the subject before they come to any definite decision. I may state at once that the Government do not intend to oppose the motion; we are entirely in the hands of the House. Government welcome the desire on the part of Members to obtain all the information available to the Government in order that they may adequately judge the material issues before them and then come to correct conclusions.

They have no desire whatsoever to withhold from any Member of the Assembly any information which the Colonial Governments 12 No 8. may not have marked as confidential which would help them in arriving at correct conclusions. I may state that that proviso that I have mentioned does not preclude us at all, as a matter of fact, from giving information, substantial information on all the questions that have been referred to by Mr. Seshagiri Aiyar. There seems to be some slight misapprehension as to the position which the Government and the Emigration Committee have been taking in this regard with reference to some of the matters which came up for discussion before them being kept confidential. Honourable Members will realise that we were not dealing entirely with domestic concerns, but were entering into negotiations with Colonial Governments, and they will appreciate readily the desire of the Colonial Governments to keep certain matters confidential. It was with that object that some of the papers were marked confidential, when they were circulated among the Committee members. But on an analysis the Government have found that all the information that is necessary and that Honourable Members of this House would desire can be supplied to them. There is nothing secret about the facts at all. The conclusions to which the Emigration Committee have come on the several subjects which came up for discussion before them will also be open to every Member of the House. It may not be possible for us, inasmuch as we have not enough copies of all these papers, to supply each Member with a separate copy. But the information will always be available at the office and we shall try also to place all the material papers in the Committee Room, and if possible circulate them to the Eastern Hostel and any other place where the Members live together. I hope that arrangements will be made for circulation of the papers to all those who are interested in the matter. I appreciate the desire on the part of Honourable Members to assist us in arriving at conclusions at an early date. As Honourable Members have seen, we must come to our conclusions here soon and then proceed with the Resolution in the Council of State, then define the rules; and all this has to be done before the 5th of March.

Mr. N. M. Samarth (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): May I suggest that a copy be placed in the library.

Mr. President: The question is that further consideration of the Resolution be postponed.

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: (Home Member): I think perhaps in the circumstances it would be most convenient if we were to take this discussion on the Friday or Saturday of next week for which we have not hitherto assigned any work. We have not yet decided whether we will sit on Friday or Saturday.

RESOLUTION RE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION IN AGRICULTURE.

Mr. A. H. Ley (Industries Secretary): Sir, I have to move the following Resolution:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that no action be taken on the Draft Convention relating to workmen's compensation in agriculture and the recommendation concerning social insurance in agriculture adopted by the Third Session of the International Labour Conference at Geneva in 1921."

Sir, I do not think I need trouble the House, for more than a few minutes on the subject of this Resolution, which, if I judge correctly, should cause no controversy, and, pace my friend Mr. Joshi, no material difference of opinion. It will be observed, Sir, that this Resolution refers only to agricultural workers, and it may be held that it is really so obvious, that I may reasonably be asked why it is necessary to trouble the House with the matter at all. I will briefly explain the reason. The reason is merely this, that India being a Member of the International Labour Organization, a Member of the League of Nations and a signatory to the Treaty of Peace, is obliged, under Article 405 of the Treaty of Versailles, to lay before the competent authority in India (that is to say, before the Legislature, in respect of matters which would require legislation) any draft Conventions or recommendations passed at any meeting of the International Labour Organization, within 18 months of the date of the Conference at which those Draft Conventions or recommendations were passed. Now, the Draft Convention and recommendation, which are dealt with in this Resolution, were part of various Draft Conventions and recommendations passed at the Geneva Conference in October 1921, and therefore they have to be laid before this House during the present Session, in order that India may fulfil its International obligation. That Sir, is the only reason why I have troubled the House with this subject at all.

Now it will be observed that the Resolution falls into two parts, two subjects which might be treated separately. But I have joined them together partly for the sake of brevity and convenience, and mainly because the principle which should determine the action taken on the Draft Convention is I submit exactly the same as the principle which should determine the discussion of the recommendation.

I think that Honourable Members of this House will have probably studied the recommendations and the Draft Conventions passed at the Geneva Conference. They have all appeared in Bulletin No. 26, published by the Department of Industries, which was circulated when published to every Member of this House. But perhaps it would be convenient if I just read the Draft Convention in question. I will take the question of Workmen's Compensation first. The draft Convention runs as follows: the material part of it—I omit the preamble and other matters which are irrelevant. "Each Member of the International Labour Organization, which ratifies this Convention undertakes to extend to all agricultural wage-earners its laws and regulations which provide for the compensation of workers for personal injury by accident arising out of or in the course of their employment."

Now, Sir, it would have been in many respects perhaps convenient—and certainly convenient for me—if I had had an opportunity of moving this Resolution a little later in this Session, at the time when we were considering or had just finished considering the Workmen's Compensation Bill, the report of the Joint Committee regarding which is already before the House. But I think it will be in the recollection of every Member of this Assembly, who has studied the subject at all, that that Bill was definitely and advisedly framed as a modest measure to begin with, in introducing an entirely new principle into India. It was definitely and advisedly limited to organised industries,—industries falling within the definition of the Factories Act, and to other occupations which fall under Schedule II of the Bill, such as hazardous occupations—occupations in which there is a material element of risk. I think in the first place, that that clearly does not apply to the case of agricultural workers. All Local Governments, every authority who has been consulted on the subject of workmen's compensation, I think I am right in saying nearly every authority, are agreed that that limitation is, in the existing conditions of India, a wise limitation. It is obviously impossible and impracticable to extend that legislation to all forms of agricultural labour. In fact, I do not think it is really necessary for me to argue that point further. There is one other point, Sir, which I should like to make—a practical point—in this connection, and that is this: that if this House, in disagreement with me, or if the Government of India, decide to ratify this draft convention, I think it is clear that they will be doing a disservice to workers in this country as a whole, and I will explain why. What would be the first result? The first and obvious result would be that the Workmen's Compensation Bill would have to be dropped; that is quite clear. It would be illegal, according to India's International obligations, for her to pass the Bill in its present form. It would have to be dropped altogether, and either the subject would be postponed until it becomes possible to rope in all agricultural workers in this country, or a new Bill would have to be framed in order to do so. I may observe in passing that it is impossible for India to ratify this Convention with reservations. They have either to ratify it or not to ratify it as it stands. The International Labour Organization and the League of Nations will not accept as fulfilling international obligations partial ratification or ratification with reservations. Well, it is perfectly clear that as far as agricultural workers are concerned, and indeed it has been admitted by everybody, that any measure of this kind at the present time is quite beyond the sphere of practical politics; (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "At any time.") At any time, possibly, but at this time certainly—and therefore I say that if this House and the Government of India were to ratify this Convention, all they would be doing would be indefinitely postponing, postponing for a period of years, possibly I think, as Mr. Rangachariar suggested, postponing to the Greek Kalends, what is, I think everybody will admit, a very desirable measure of social and economic reform. That is all I have got to say on the subject of workmen's compensation, and I think it is unnecessary for me to labour the argument further.

I pass on to the second part of this Resolution which deals with the question of social insurance. There is nothing very much in this, I think; and I shall read the recommendation in question. It runs as follows—I omit the preamble which is unimportant. "The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation recommend that each Member of the International Labour Organisation extend its laws and regulations establishing systems of insurance against sickness, invalidity, old age and other similar social risks to agricultural wage-earners on conditions similar to those prevailing in the case of workers in industrial and commercial occupations." Well, Sir, we have none of these laws at present, even with regard to industrial workers. We have no old age pensions; we have no laws relating to compulsory or state insurance of workers even in industrial undertakings; indeed, we have no insurance data on which such laws could be framed; and I think it is quite obvious that if ever a movement in this direction takes place it will first take place in regard to forms of labour in which it is easy and practicable, or may be found easy and practicable hereafter, to introduce such measures. That again, I think, is a point of view which it is perhaps unnecessary for me to labour.

In conclusion I would desire to express my opinion that the principle of this draft convention and this recommendation is in the case of India an unsound principle. The principle of it is to prevent any discrimination between industrial and agricultural workers in respect of laws which may be enacted to provide for insurance against accident, sickness, old age and the like; that is to say, it is designed to compel a nation which adopts it to legislate, at one and the same time and together, not only for industrial workers but for all kinds of agricultural workers. Whatever view may be held, Sir, as to the wisdom or the soundness of that principle in the case of countries like England and other European countries, whose agricultural and industrial workers are well-educated, comparatively speaking, fully organised and fully developed, I venture to put forward the view that it is an unsound principle in the case of a country like India where agricultural and industrial workers are not only uneducated on the whole, undeveloped and unorganised, but where the stages of development, education and organisation are so wholly different in respect of different classes of workers. It is much easier obviously to develop measures of this kind in the first instance in the case of organised industries, for example. It is surely a much better principle to adapt measures of this kind as time goes on to such classes of workers and in such conditions, in respect of which it may be found practicable and desirable to apply them. It is much better to do that, I say, than to make, if I may say so, a leap in the dark and adopt wholesale a measure for which I think it is obvious the country as a whole is not ripe. With these words, Sir, I move this Resolution.

Mr. N. M. Joshi (Nominated: Labour Interests): Sir, I beg to move the following amendment to the Resolution which has been placed before the Assembly by my Honourable friend, Mr. Ley. My amendment runs thus:

"At the end of the Resolution add the following, namely:

'and request the Government of India to inquire and report to the Assembly what action regarding these matters is necessary and practicable in the case of organised plantations in India'."

Sir, it is quite obvious from the terms of my Resolution that I am not opposing the main body of the Resolution at all. Although I do not approve of the attitude taken by Government in this Resolution, I do not propose to oppose it also for reasons which are obvious to Members of this Assembly. But Sir, the only thing which I asked the Assembly to do is that after having accepted the Resolution put forward by the Government we should ask the Government to do one little thing, namely, that they should inquire whether it is possible for them to take some action as regards these matters in the case of organised plantations. What I ask is only an inquiry. I do not anticipate the result of the inquiry at all. Now my reasons for asking for this inquiry are these. In the first place, from the speech of my Honourable friend, the Mover, it was not clear at all whether Government before placing this Resolution before the Assembly had made any inquiries whether any action could be taken or not. I had seen some Resolutions placed by Government about the Conventions and the Recommendations of the International Labour Conference before, and I had seen that in the case of those Resolutions Government had made certain inquiries, the Local Governments had been consulted, and we were placed in a position to know what the views of the Local Governments were and what the result of the inquiries was. I should like to know whether my Honourable friend, the Mover, had made any inquiries as to the practicability of certain action being taken on these Resolutions. From his speech it was clear that no such inquiry was made, and therefore it is quite obvious that this Assembly should insist that out of mere courtesy, if not respect, for the Conventions and Recommendations of the International Labour Conference, the Government of India should make an inquiry into these matters. But, Sir, when I ask for an inquiry you will find that I am not only not unreasonable but am more moderate than I ought to be. Sir, my Resolution does not ask for an inquiry as regards the application of these Conventions and Recommendations to the whole sphere of agricultural work in this country. I ask for an inquiry only into a very limited portion of the agricultural work in India, and that is, the agricultural work on organized plantations. The words "organized plantations" are, I think, well known to Government Members. (A Voice from the Government Benches: "No.") Well, somebody here says "No." Therefore for their benefit I would like to define these words. Organized plantations in my humble opinion are those plantations where a large number of people work under one master and in one place. For example, the tea plantations in Assam, the tea and coffee and rubber plantations in Madras, where 100, 200 or 500 or more people work under one master and in one small locality. Such plantations are called "organized plantations".

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): What do you want to do with that?

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Yes, I am going to explain that. Now I do not ask for an inquiry into the whole sphere of agricultural work. I ask for an inquiry only as regards the organized plantations. Government knows that some of these organized plantations in India are governed by some special laws. So it is not difficult for them at all to find out what those plantations are and I ask for an inquiry only as regards those. Now what is the inquiry going to be about? The inquiry is going to be about the two questions mentioned in this Resolution, namely: whether the Workmen's Compensation Act should be applied to the workers on these plantations. (A Voice: "What is the risk they run?") I will explain it presently. Secondly, whether any action on the lines of social insurance should be taken as regards these organized plantations. Sir, as regards the Workmen's Compensation Act, I am asked 'what is the risk that the workers on these plantations have to undergo? My Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, was, I think, a Member of the Committee that considered the Workmen's Compensation Bill, and as a member of that Committee he ought to know that in this Bill there is a provision for what are called 'occupational diseases'. This question of workmen's compensation was considered by a committee which was appointed by Government last year, and when the Committee discussed this question, it was urged that organized plantations should be included in the scope of the Workmen's Compensation Bill. If my Honourable friend, Colonel Gidney, who is an authority on medical matters had been here, he would have told the members of this Committee that Kala Azar, which is a disease from which the workmen on plantations suffer, may be considered as an occupational disease. Sir, this is only one matter.

Rai G. C. Nag Bahadur (Surma Valley cum Shillong: Non-Muham-madan): Hookworm also.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: My Honourable friend, Mr. Nag, says that hookworm also is very prevalent and that might also be regarded as an occupational disease. Therefore, it will be quite clear to Honourable Members that there is a sufficient case for an inquiry whether the workers on organized plantations should be brought within the scope of the Workmen's Compensation Bill or not. I need not take more time on this question.

Then, Sir, there is the other question of social insurance. My Honourable friend, Mr. Ley, said that in the first place, we should not discriminate between agricultural and industrial workers if we want to legislate for both of them together . . .

Mr. A. H. Ley: That is exactly the opposite of what I said, Sir.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: He says that he said quite the contrary. I can understand the partiality of my Honourable friend for the industrial workers. I am told that he is the Secretary of the Department of Industries. It is quite natural that he should say that the industrial workers should be first given the benefit of these ameliorating reforms. But, Sir, may I ask my Honourable friend whether as Secretary to the Department of Commerce and Industries he has ever read an Act called the Assam Labour and Emigration Act?

Mr. A. H. Ley: Yes.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: He says 'yes.' Sir, section 135 of that very Act by legislation provides that the employers on plantations should make provision against sickness for the workmen on these plantations. He therefore ought to have known that the Government of India had already legislated in the case of agricultural workers before they had done anything as regards the industrial workers. Therefore, it seems to me that the views which he has propounded at least did not find favour with the Government of India of 20 years ago. Moreover, my Honourable friend Mr. Ley, being in charge of this department, ought to have seen the Report of the Assam Labour Committee which was appointed only last year, and which has reported very recently. I will read only one sentence from that Report. My Honourable friend has already told the Assembly that the social insurance relates to the provision against old age and provision against invalidity. I have told him how the Government of India themselves have made provision against invalidity in the case of these plantations. I wish to tell him from this Report what the planters of Assam have done for old age, etc. "Some gardens give small pensions in cash to deserving coolies who have earned them by long and faithful service on these estates, but the practice can hardly be described as common, though it is admitted that there is scope for the extension of the system." The Committee itself recommends that this system of giving pensions for old age for the workers on the plantations should be extended, and here is the Government of India saying that no action should be taken as regards social insurance. Sir, it seems to me that my Honourable friend was unnecessarily frightened by these modern words 'social insurance' and such things. As a matter of fact, these ideas are quite well known to the Government of India and the planters in Assam. Therefore, there is nothing wrong if the Government of India makes an inquiry on these questions as regards these plantations. As a matter of fact, on these matters inquiry has been made. My only regret is that the Government of India did not care to consult the Assam Labour Committee whether these Conventions could be brought into practice or not. If the Government of India had been serious as regards these Conventions and recommendations, they could have placed these Conventions before this Committee and this Committee could have expressed its opinion on these matters, as it has already done on some questions, and the expression of view of this Committee is absolutely in my favour. I, therefore, hope that the Members of the Assembly will agree to my amendment for which there is the approval of the Government of India of old itself as well as of the Committee which was appointed by the Assam Government and which has recently reported.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, my friend, Mr. Joshi, claimed this morning that he was extraordinarily and unusually reasonable in his amendment which he has moved. After he elaborated his argument, it seemed to me he was beginning to suffer from some occupational disease himself—his occupation probably being labour legislation. Just as there are political idealists in this country who think Swaraj could be achieved before the 31st of December every year, there are also, I fear, a few labour idealists who think that, even in the matter of agriculture, the millenium could be reached by legislation within a very short time, even the short time assigned to a Member of this Assembly, namely the three years of his term of office. It seems to me, Sir, that, in the first place, the amendment of my friend, Mr. Joshi, is in a sense a direct negation of the original proposition. The original proposition of Mr. Ley said that no action be taken on the Draft Convention. My friend, Mr. Joshi, states on the other hand that some action by Government may be taken. I leave it to the House to reconcile these two things. Then, again, Mr. Joshi wants a limited inquiry and he claimed by reason of the very fact that he wanted a limited inquiry, that he was reasonable. He overlooked the fact, which Mr. Ley pointed out, that, so far as the Draft Conventions of the International Labour Organisation went, you can either take full action with reference to these Conventions or no action at all, and there was no question of a limited application or reservation with reference to the confirmation or ratification of any Convention of the International Labour Organisation. Even supposing the Government concede that there should be a limited inquiry with reference to the organised plantations, what would be the result? They can report the result of their inquiry to this House only but they cannot send a message to the International Organisation of Labour that they are prepared to take any action with reference to organised plantations for the simple reason that, under the rules of the International Labour Organisation, there could not be any such thing as a limited ratification at all.

Now, speaking on the merits of this inquiry, Sir, it seems to me my friend, Mr. Joshi, is carried away by a little bit of zeal, as I said in the beginning. Those who were on the Committee of the Workmen's Compensation Bill have realised how difficult it is even in matters of industrial concerns to legislate at the present stage of India for compensations. We have all our sympathy for workers, and I think it should be the duty of this House to extend to them the privileges of compensation, wherever it is possible and feasible, but in the field of agriculture which though it may be the mainstay of this country the field and the scope of enquiry are too large and yet the conditions so very difficult. I believe it would be premature even to begin to give compensation in the organised plantations to which my friend, Mr. Joshi, referred. Eventually, when we have tried industrial compensations and we see the result of the experiment, it may be possible to extend the privilege and the advantages of compensation to agricultural workers. But at the present moment, I believe the question is outside the sphere of practical politics and it would be nothing but a waste of time to go into this question, so far at any rate as the ratification of the Draft Convention of the International Labour Organisation is concerned. I, therefore, think the Members of this House should not support Mr. Joshi's amendment.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I just wish to add a word or two to what has fallen from my Honourable friend, Mr. Kamat, and I may at once say that I stand up to oppose the amendment of my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi. I do not know, Sir, whether I am suffering from any occupational disease, but, if there is any in me, I suppose it is the disease of the brakesman. I want to put on the brake whenever I find the coach of the social reformer is proceeding at a breakneck speed. My submission to the House is that, in this matter of agriculture, just as in other matters where labour is employed there are already elements present which go to protect the labourer. What I mean to say is: that in affairs relating to employment of labour it is very often the self-interest of the employers themselves which leads them to provide healthy conditions for their labourers and so forth. And Government to some extent, is doing what it can in that respect. In the case of Kala Azar or hook-worm, the Government is not idle. It is looking after these evils and trying to prevent them. But to suppose that an employer of agricultural labour should be made responsible for Kala Azar or hook-worm where the disease is not caused by anything organised by the employer himself, and is due to natural causes alone, it seems to me, Sir, that such a supposition would amount to extending the principles of compensation unduly. We must also bear in mind that it is to the self-interest of the employer himself to induce labour into his organisation by old-age pensions, etc., and in that respect we see that these principles are to some extent in operation already. In the case of Government, it pays pensions to its servants. Other employers also often pay pensions. But the real question is whether these things should be organised on the scale on which Europe is organising them, whether the conditions in India are such as to induce us to import wholesale all these principles which have been adopted in England under conditions altogether different from those existing in India. These are considerations which ought to actuate us. Because some means are adopted on a certain scale in European countries, owing to the necessities of the situation in those countries, is it any reason that we should adopt those means without waiting to consider what their effect will be in our own country? I submit, Sir, that such a policy will not be a wise policy on the part of ourselves. My Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi, might ask "What is the harm in starting an inquiry?" My submission on that point is that Government should spend money only when there is a prima facie case for starting an inquiry, that is, where the conditions are such as to justify the Government in spending money. Every inquiry means money. In the present instance when we know from existing circumstances that a case has not been made out for an inquiry—because conditions here are widely divergent from those existing in Europe and America, when we know on the face of things that the conditions are such, we should not unnecessarily ask the Government to start an inquiry. I have very little more to say, Sir. In relation to the present question, the principle of compensation already exists in some form or other, in this country, though it may be, in a more or less elementary form. I think, Sir, the ordinary responsibilities of Government should not lead it to take action wherever it thinks action to be unnecessary. The crux of the whole question is, whether in the present case, we should adopt that complicated machinery which exists in the highly organised countries of Europe or America and similar places. I submit, Sir, that the time has not come when India should go in for legislation of a social character like that contemplated by the Honourable Mover of the amendment, and I oppose it.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, when I saw this Resolution tabled, I was wondering what had possessed the Government of India in asking the Assembly to affirm the obvious, and when I see there is a friend of the labourer, Mr. Joshi, I now see why the Government of India had felt the necessity for a motion of the kind which has been tabled. One observation, Sir, strikes me, and that is that the Government of India are not doing the right thing nor all they should in sending representatives to the International Labour Conference. I am afraid they are not choosing the right representatives. I think the agricultural interests, the vast interests of this country, are not sufficiently represented at that Conference. I must emphasise this point. Instead of the Legislature being asked to affirm obvious Resolutions of this sort I think this must be driven home to the Members of that Conference that these Conventions should not apply at all to India. Somebody should be there to tell them the real agricultural conditions of India and take note of all these things. I am afraid idealists alone go there without reference to practical politics. (Mr. N. M. Joshi: "Mr. Chatterjee had gone"). Then I am sorry I will have to classify him also as an idealist. Probably he is far remote from practical agriculture because he is in high heights and therefore does not condescend to go to his village and look after his land, if he has any. Sir, I think the time will come when we may not be able to cultivate our wet fields, where the unfortunate labourers have to go with bare feet and work in the mire, and my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi, may tell us "Give them thire-proof boots." All this counsel of perfection may be given to us, and in the meanwhile, the country which is already a poor country will grow poorer. There will be no food to consume. The landlords are poor and the labourers are poor. As regards the plantations, I do not know why an invidious distinction should be made in the case of the plantations. Not that I am quite satisfied with the lot of the labourer there, but improvement is needed in other directions. You can improve their wages. You can remove the penal clauses which exist in local legislative measures. I am quite willing to assist Mr. Joshi in those directions. I fail to see, Sir, how all these ideas of social insurance in agriculture are going to be inculcated in the minds of even the educated people in this country, not to speak of the labourers. These are ideas which are quite foreign to this country and which will be quite impracticable. I think we will be landing the country in trouble if we allow things to go on like this. I think, Sir, it is time that the Government of India should send along with Mr. Joshi to the International Labour Conference some real corrective, some heads of Agricultural Departments. I am not sure whether my Honourable friend on my left (Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar) who himself is a big landlord, and others like him should not go to this Conference at least at their own expense in order to see that such ideas are not promulgated there. I therefore oppose the amendment and strongly support the Resolution.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, it seems to me that Mr. Joshi in his enthusiasm for the agricultural labourers is undoing the service that he is here to render to the cause of industrial labour. I have not here, a copy of the Draft Convention before me, but so far as I recollect, I think the Draft Convention lays down that no distinction should be made between the measures to be adopted in the case of industrial labour and in the case of agricultural labour. (The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: "Yes.") That was probably due to the fact that there was a preponderance of agricultural labour representatives at the Conference, who, seeing that all the benefits were going to the industrial labour insisted that the benefits should also be given to them (agricultural labour). Now, we either ratify the Convention or do not ratify the Convention. If we ratify the Convention with regard to agricultural labour also, we are precluded from having a separate legislation for industrial labour. The immediate practical effect of ratifying the Convention or of instituting an inquiry pending the ratification would be that Mr. Joshi and this Legislature will be unable to legislate on the lines of the Workmen's Compensation Bill that is coming before this Assembly in a day or two. I wonder if in his enthusiasm for agricultural labour Mr. Joshi is doing a service to the cause of industrial labour which it is within the sphere of practical politics for this Assembly and for this country to render service to by means of legislation. Conditions in this country do not permit at the present moment of undertaking legislation to benefit agricultural labour, in the same way as you can undertake legislation for industrial labour for this it will be recognized, that this House at the initiative taken by Government has already accomplished much. I therefore think that Mr. Joshi, considering this point, will see his way to withdraw his amendment.

Rai Bahadur S. N. Singh (Bihar and Orissa: Nominated Official): I move, Sir, that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The original question was:

"That this Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that no action be taken on the Draft Convention relating to workmen's compensation in agriculture and the recommendation concerning social insurance in agriculture adopted by the Third Session of the International Labour Conference at Geneva in 1921."

Since which an amendment has been moved that :

" At the end of the Resolution the following be added :
' and requests the Government of India to inquire and report to the Assembly what action regarding these matters is necessary and practicable in the case of organized plantations in India . "

The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that the following Resolution be adopted :

" The Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that no action be taken on the Draft Convention relating to workmen's compensation in agriculture and the recommendations concerning social insurance in agriculture adopted by the Third Session of the International Labour Conference at Geneva in 1921."

The motion was adopted.

RESOLUTION RE PROTECTION OF WOMEN WAGE-EARNERS IN AGRICULTURE.

Mr. A. H. Ley (Industries Secretary): Sir, the next Resolution I have to put forward before the House is in the following terms :

" This Assembly having considered the recommendations concerning the protection before and after child-birth of women wage-earners in agriculture, the night work of women, children and young persons employed in agriculture and the living-in conditions of agricultural workers adopted by the Third Session of the International Labour Conference at Geneva in 1921, recommends to the Governor General in Council that legislation to secure their enforcement should not be introduced at the present time."

I feel, Sir, a little diffidence in moving this Resolution. I recollect, two or three days ago when we were dealing with the Mines Bill, a certain amount of criticism, good humoured criticism I may say, was expressed on the want of practical acquaintance with mine labour displayed by certain Honourable gentlemen who took part in that debate. My friend, Mr. Joshi, if I remember rightly, anticipated an attack from the Honourable Member in the Industries Department that his knowledge of the subject was more theoretical than practical. Well, Sir, I must say that in regard to the present Resolution my sympathies are entirely with Mr. Joshi. I am in much the same position. I shall rightly be accused of having nothing more than an academic knowledge of this subject. But, Sir, while this is no doubt the case, I claim to yield to no one in my consciousness of the serious importance of the subject. It relates to matters which do merit the serious consideration of this House, as far as certain kinds of work are concerned. But I think it is obvious to everybody, whether he has any practical or any theoretical acquaintance with the subject, that as far as agricultural work is concerned, legislation of this kind is, in present day conditions in India, not only unenforceable and unnecessary but quite beyond the sphere of practical politics. I will just go through these recommendations. I have grouped them together in one Resolution for the sake of brevity. They all relate to more or less kindred subjects. The first one deals with protection before and after child-birth. The recommendation runs as follows :

" The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation recommends that each Member of the International Labour Organisation take measures to ensure to women wage-earners employed in agricultural undertakings protection before and after child-birth similar to that provided by the Draft Convention adopted by the International Labour Conference at Washington for women employed in industry and commerce, and that such measures should include the right to a period of absence from work before and after child-birth and to a grant of benefit during the said period, provided either out of public funds or by means of a system of insurance."

It will be observed, Sir, that the recommendation refers back to a Draft Convention passed at Washington, I think it was in 1919 (if I am wrong in my dates my friend the Honourable Mr. Chatterjee will no doubt correct me). That Draft Convention sought to impose compulsory absence from work for a period of six weeks before and after child-birth of women labourers in industrial and commercial undertakings and to provide for compulsory maternity benefits. There were other provisions as to the production of medical certificates regarding the condition of women during these periods. That Convention has not, like the Convention I was dealing with in my previous Resolution, been laid before this Legislature for the simple reason that India was never asked to ratify it; presumably because it was realised that it was premature to apply it to this country. India was not asked to ratify it, but was asked to make a study of the question. India was asked by a Resolution passed at the Washington Conference "to make a study of the question of the employment of women wage-earners before and after confinement and of the maternity facilities before the next Conference and to report on these matters to the next Conference." Well, that inquiry was made. It was made of all Local Governments and of everybody interested in the subject and a report was drawn up and was laid before the next Conference at Geneva in 1921. The result of those inquiries was that all Local Governments and everybody consulted were agreed that it was beyond the sphere of practical politics to adopt them at this time in connection with industrial workers. It will be obvious that it would be equally impossible to adopt a measure of this kind in respect of agricultural workers. The conditions of life of course are in their case much healthier and therefore the need is much less urgently felt. I pass now to the other parts of this Resolution. As regards the recommendation regarding the night work of women, children and young persons employed in agriculture, I do not think I need read these recommendations out,—they simply provide for a period of rest at night time—9 hours in the case of women and young persons and 10 hours in the case of children. Everybody knows—even I know,—that women and children in this country do no agricultural labour at night; even during harvest time they do not work at night at all; I believe I am correct in saying that,—and what is more, it is obvious that if you pass legislation of this kind, it will be quite impracticable to enforce it. It is easy enough in the case of industries for which there are factory inspectors; I do not know whether you contemplate having agricultural inspectors in all the villages of the country, groups of villages all over the country, looking to see when women go to bed and when they get up in the morning. It is clearly out of the question. Finally, Sir, I must refer to the living-in conditions of agricultural workers. I think I must read the recommendation out, though it is somewhat longer. The General Conference of the International Organization recommends:

"That each Member of the International Labour Organisation, which has not already done so, take statutory or other measures to regulate the living-in conditions of agricultural workers with due regard to the special climatic or other conditions affecting agricultural work in its country, and after consultation with the employers' and workers' organisations concerned, if such organisations exist."

Secondly :

"That such measures shall apply to all accommodation provided by employers for housing their workers either individually, or in groups, or with their families, whether the accommodation is provided in the houses of such employers or in buildings placed by them at the workers' disposal."

And thirdly :

"That such measures shall contain the following provisions :

- (a) Unless climatic conditions render heating superfluous, the accommodation intended for workers' families, groups of workers or individual workers, should contain rooms which can be heated ;
- (b) Accommodation intended for groups of workers shall provide a separate bed for each worker.. shall afford facilities for ensuring personal cleanliness ; and shall provide for the separation of the sexes. In the case of families, adequate provision shall be made for the children ;
- (c) Stables, cowhouses and open sheds should not be used for sleeping quarters."

And finally—this is important :

"That each Member of the International Labour Organisation take steps to ensure the observance of such measures."

The International Labour Organization, I may say, did not indicate what kind of steps would be practicable in a vast agricultural country like India ; obviously it is not practicable. Indeed, Sir, it is also obvious that this particular recommendation was framed solely with a view to conditions in certain parts of European countries,—it was clearly also framed, I think, more to provide for the moral than the material well-being of agricultural workers in certain circumstances. No one can suggest, I am the last person to suggest, that there is an evil of this sort to be dealt with in India at all, as far as agricultural workers are concerned,—and I say that it is all to the credit and fair name of India that that is so. I can say this with absolute certainty of the full support of the House.

I move the Resolution, Sir

Mr. K. Ahmed (Rajshahi Division; Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I rise to oppose the Resolution. The Resolution contains the words "at the present." What is the present time? What is the real situation now in the country? My friend, Mr. A. H. Ley, has not described that. And if, Sir, this Convention of the Third Session of the International Labour Conference at Geneva have passed and accepted this recommendation, why does it not suit India? If it suits labouring women in other countries why is it not suitable for our labouring class women here? Are they not persons who deserve the same sympathetic treatment as the agriculturists and labourers across the sea in other countries? These are the people who pay five rupees Chaukiduri tax per year and these are the people whom we represent here in this Assembly. On Mr. Ley's previous Resolution speaker after speaker spoke, and Mr. Joshi tried to move an amendment to the main Resolution on the right direction. But my friend from Poona, who must be sitting in a non-Muhammadan seat, is probably a contractor, and therefore possibly he likes to see the miserable condition of the labourers continuing to the profit of the contractors of this country. From such people, these unfortunate agriculturists and labourers can have no sympathy. He tried to twist the tail of my friend Mr. Joshi, because he had moved the amendment which did not suit his views. As a matter of fact, Sir, Mr. Joshi is a nominated Member representing the labour of India. Mr. Joshi was sent by the Government of India, who picked him up as the representative of Indian labour to go across the Mediterranean to represent India at that Conference last year, and I supposed the year before as well, 1921-22. My friend, Mr. Joshi, unhappy man, wanted to ameliorate the conditions of these poor people. Government allowed him to represent India at the International Labour Conference held at Geneva, but now when he speaks on behalf of the people, what is the answer of the Government? He is thrown over-board. Mr. Ley says that his own Resolution is the best and therefore it should be carried. I wish the Government of India had sent Mr. Ley as their own representative and not of the people across the Mediterranean. I know the facts, Sir. Government and not the people of this country are represented. I know that my friend the Honourable Mr. Chatterjee was sent to represent India, also his colleague, our intimate friend, Mr. J. N. Gupta, who wanted to take a trip on account of ill-health. These gentlemen were sent instead of the Government selecting persons who are real representatives of the country and are the fittest persons to represent India at the International Labour Conference at Geneva. Yes, Sir; a one-sided statement has been made on behalf of the Government by Mr. Ley that effect should not be given to the recommendations of the Labour Conference at Geneva giving concessions to workmen and labourers. Sir, if it suits the civilised people, the labourers and the agriculturists of the West, it will suit certainly the labourers and agriculturists of this country as well; otherwise it is a shame. Members representing these poor people have come here to ameliorate their condition. We are not here to support the Government, every Member of which is drawing a salary after every 30 days. Here I quote Lord Curzon. Lord Curzon while inquiring into the condition of the agriculturists and the labouring population of India, said that these persons, viz., the agriculturists and the labouring classes, are the backbone and the sinews of the country. Every copper that comes from their pocket is an addition to the revenues of the country, and their case should be considered and condition looked into by the Government. Is this the time, may I ask, is this the proper time, for Mr. Ley to move a Resolution not to give effect to the recommendations of the International Labour Conference at Geneva? It is given effect to in the case of the agriculturists and labourers of those prosperous countries and we protest against effect not being given to the recommendations in the case of the miserable agriculturists and labourers of this poor country. My friend, Mr. Rangachariar, speaking for the landholders of Madras, said in regard to the other Resolution that this sort of concession is not fit for Indian Labour. He represents the Non-Muhammadan labourers and agriculturists. He forgets that the agriculturists and the labourers have been paying Chowkidari tax. He is supposed to represent them and do things which are proper and fit for the country and to try to uplift the condition of these poor agriculturists and labourers. Mr. Mukherjee, who himself is a landholder and who represents the landholders, forgets the poor condition of the millions which form the great majority of the population, especially in the province of Bengal. I suppose, Sir, this Resolution which Mr. Ley has moved is not a properly worded Resolution. My friend says that he has consulted all the provincial Governments and some other persons with regard to the actual situation. I want to know who those other persons were. My friend is putting his case probably in a one-sided way—as we say sometimes in legal language, “the judgment of the learned Judge is one-sided and not properly worded and explained. It is a stereotyped one.” And that is the summary way in which a case has been put in the Assembly for this House to accept. A Resolution of this description, Sir, is an obstacle in the path of progress of this country, and in the path of progress of the world. Why should India be kept out like this, and why should not these poor people have the same kind of concession given to them as the people of other civilized countries? And why should not India and the people of this vast country be properly represented at the International Labour Conferences? I know, Sir, the secret fact. It is not easy to pick out a man from the West to represent this country, and thereby the poor unhappy people of this country of more than 300 millions most of whom are agriculturists are left without any light. They are totally ignorant because they are kept ignorant. My Honourable friend, Mr. Ley, at the time he was moving the Resolution, said that the Indians are very orthodox and said that these agriculturists have got different religions and different castes (I hope I am not wrong), but how does the question of caste come in with regard to this concession being given to these poor people?

Mr. A. H. Ley: Sir, I never said anything about caste at all.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Different kinds of people having different ideas in this country. If a child is dead, whether the child is an Indian child or a mixture, or whatever that child may be, the concession for that poor unhappy child is the same in this country as the concession for a child of a prosperous country. The International Labour Conference at Geneva has passed this concession and we are here to act according to it, but my friend says no, this is the recommendation of the Governor General in Council that this legislation to secure enforcement should not be introduced at the present time. The time is very bad, Oh! it is a troublous time, any my friend might say that there is a war going on, the Bolsheviks might come Indian children might become prosperous; they will be properly educated; they will be properly fed, they will be strong enough to ameliorate their own condition, and then there will be the time when from the department of my friend, Mr. Innes, a Resolution of this kind should be moved. And we representing the people of this country, are we here to support that sort of proposal of the Government Member in charge? Sir, I vehemently oppose the Resolution and think it should not be accepted by this House.

Mr. N. M. Joshi (Nominated: Labour Interests): Sir, I beg to move the following amendment which stands in my name

"At the end of the Resolution the following be added:

'and requests the Government of India to inquire and report to the Assembly what action regarding these matters is necessary and practicable in the case of organised plantations in India.'

Sir, at the outset may I make one request to those people who would like to criticise my amendment, that they should first take care to understand the terms of the amendment and then criticise it. Sir, I will again bring to the notice of the Honourable Members of the Assembly that my amendment does not touch the whole agricultural sphere. My amendment only touches agricultural work as confined to the organized plantations. If any Honourable Members here want to criticise my amendments let them show that no action need be taken or can be taken in the case of these organized plantations. If I am going to be held responsible for remarks which I do not make or for terms which I do not put in my amendments, it will be difficult for me to make any reply to such critics.

Sir, the original Resolution deals with 8 or 4 things. It says that no legislative action should be taken as regards the protection of women before and after child birth, no action should be taken as regards the prohibition of the employment of children in agriculture nor as regards certain improvements in the living-in conditions of agriculturists and as regards the prohibition of night work of women, children and young persons employed in agriculture.

Now, I wish to take each of these items, one by one. In the case of legislation for the protection of women before and after child birth, may I again draw the attention of the Honourable Mover of this Resolution to the fact that already on organized plantations a good deal is being done by employers in helping women during their pregnancy. I shall only read one or two sentences from the same report from which I quoted a few minutes back:

"The Budla Beta Tea Company gave leave for three months before and three months after birth with full pay for the whole period."

"The Doom Dooma Company allow a similar period of leave with five seers of rice a week, free of cost, and Rs. 1'8 in cash."

Several other companies mentioned in this report make provision for the protection of women before and after child birth. But, Sir, in a case of this kind, it is necessary that there should be legislation, otherwise, those employers who are generous-hearted and who are willing to spend money, cannot do so on account of the fact that our industries are based on the system of competition. The employers, who are generous-hearted, cannot introduce reforms because they feel that they will be beaten in competition by their less generous rivals. For this reason, in order that the condition of the working classes may be improved, there should be legislation. And it should not only be national legislation, but it has been found that, unless all countries join and there is international legislation, there cannot be much improvement in the condition of the working classes.

Sir, my critics will find that, when I ask that there should be legislation for the protection of women before and after child birth, I am not asking for something ideal. My plan is not merely theoretical or the plan of an idealist; it is being put into practice by a large number of generous-hearted people like my Honourable friend, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: it is not only the plan of an enthusiast who talks without practical experience.

The second question, Sir, is that the employment of children should be prohibited during their childhood. Now, I will also read something about conditions on plantations.

It has been found that when schools are started on these plantations at the suggestion of Government or by the free will of the planters, they do not get sufficient students. Why? Because—I will explain the reason which is given by the Committee—in the first place, children are a valuable asset to the garden—their work is a valuable asset to the garden; they are earning a welcome addition to the family income. Therefore the employers gain and the parents gain by the employment of children. But is it right that children should be so employed?

Mr. A. H. Ley: Sir, I rise to a point of order. There is nothing in this Resolution about the employment of children at all except at night.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I am sorry and I apologise to the House. There is the question of night work for children and night work for women. Sir, nightwork has been prohibited by our factory law both for young persons as well as for women. It is not a new thing that we are going to introduce. The legislation for prohibiting night work exists in India. My amendment only seeks that that legislation should be extended to women working on these plantations. Sir, there are real dangers for women if they have to go out and work on these plantations at night. I do not wish to dilate on these dangers here; I may do so on some other occasion. Then, Sir, there is the question of the living-in conditions. I want Government to find out whether they can legislate for improving the living-in conditions of the workers on plantations. As a matter of fact, while speaking on the last amendment, I did tell my Honourable friend that there exists some legislation on the statute-book of the Government which provides for improving the living-in conditions of workers on plantations. If he refers to sections 132, 133 and 134 of the Assam Labour and Emigration Act, 1901, he will find that that Act makes provision for house accommodation, water supply, sanitary arrangements for labourers, supply of foodgrains, provision for rest, for medical attendance, etc. These matters have been dealt with by legislation by the Government of India as regards the very people for whom I want legislation. The only difference is this—this Act was intended for people who entered into contracts for which there was a punishment of imprisonment. Now those contracts in a large number of cases are not now made. But there is a very large number who are free labourers. My one contention is that the benefit of this legislation which already exists for the contract labourers, should be given to free labourers. Sir, is there any Member here who will say that they will give the benefit of such beneficent legislation only to those who enter into what are called penal contracts, but they will not give its benefit to the free labourers. Everyone will see now that there is no difficulty in legislating on such matters. Legislation exists. The only thing is that we give the benefit of such legislation to a workman when he is prepared to sell his liberty and to become a slave. My friend, Mr. Kannat has no objection to the legislation passed on these lines. But if a labourer wants to be free, then, he is not to benefit from such legislation. Sir, this is the democracy which unfortunately I have to see in this Assembly.

Sir, it has been said by my friend, Mr. Rangachariar—"How can we legislate only for planters?" As a matter of fact there is no difficulty. We have been doing that all along. When we legislated in the matter of industries, we legislated only for the organized industry. Our Factory Act defines a factory as a place, a workshop where there are 20 people employed and where there is some mechanical power used. We do not legislate all the industrial workers at all. So, what is the difficulty that he finds when we want to legislate only for the organized factories. We therefore can legislate for organized plantations, and there is no difficulty. There is no discrimination if we legislate for organized plantations, because we have been doing that.

Then, Sir, my Honourable friend, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, without troubling to understand the terms of my amendment said that I wanted the ratification or non-ratification to be hung up. I do not want that. My amendment does not say that any action need be taken for the present but that an inquiry should be undertaken.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadian Urban):
It would be implied.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I do not see how it can be implied. I have not changed the original words of the Resolution at all. I accept that no action should be taken for the present, I accept that part of the Resolution. I only say that you should begin an inquiry. If you want to write to the International Labour office to-day, write that you cannot take any Legislative action to-day. But there is nothing to prevent your making an inquiry even from to-day. Then, Sir, some capital is made out of the fact that the terms of the Convention cannot be changed and that if we want to accept it the whole of it should be accepted. That is true. But what prevents your taking action here? If you cannot accept the convention to its very letter, it does not prevent your taking action in the spirit of the convention. I cannot understand, Sir, what prevents our taking action in the spirit of the convention. After all if my Honourable friend, Mr. Kamat, or if my Honourable friend, Mr. Jannadas Dwarkadas, consent to vote for some legislation in favour of labour, do they do it for the sake of the International Labour Conference, or do they do it for the sake of their country and for the sake of their countrymen? If they are not doing it for the sake of the International Labour Conference, there is nothing wrong in their not ratifying the convention, and at the same time taking some action. I therefore hope that my amendment will find favour with this House.

Sir, there is only one word more. Some people wonder why I go on moving amendments when there is not much support to my proposals. Sir, I am an optimist both by nature and by training. I do not despair. If only a few people vote with me and none speaks for my proposal, I hope there will be a time and not a very distant time at that when instead of one man speaking for labour there will be several Members speaking for labour in this House. I feel sure also that there will be a time when the labour Members make speeches people like my Honourable friends, Mr. Jannadas and Mr. Kamat, instead of trying to pour ridicule on them will consider themselves fortunate if the labour Members smile upon them or speak to them a word or two. With these words, I put my amendment before the House.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee (Education Member): Sir, it has often been my very pleasant duty to be associated with my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi, in advocating the cause of labour in this House, and it is with the greatest regret especially after his most eloquent peroration that I rise to oppose his amendment. Mr. Joshi, Sir, is an idealist; I have also been described with a certain amount of sarcasm during this morning's debate as an idealist; but I think, Sir, that I am not quite as impatient an idealist as the Honourable Mr. Joshi. That is why, Sir, I feel that I cannot agree with Mr. Joshi's views as propounded in the present amendment. My difficulty is entirely a practical one. Mr. Joshi wants an inquiry made into the possibility of certain reforms being carried out in organised plantations. On the first Resolution which we disposed of a little while ago, Mr. Joshi defined organised plantations as places in agricultural districts where a certain number of persons worked under one master and in one locality. Sir, if that definition is followed, I think we will have probably to include practically every Zemindar, every landholder, practically every large tenant cultivator in the whole of India. Does Mr. Joshi wish us to make an inquiry of this all-embracing character? As a matter of fact, Sir, the Government of India have not been neglectful in this matter. They have made inquiries. Mr. Joshi himself has quoted copious passages from the Report that has quite recently been made in Assam over the conditions prevailing in plantation labour there. That only indicates, Sir, that the matter is already engaging the attention of the Government of Assam. Similar inquiries on specific subjects have been made in the Dooar tea plantations in Bengal. On the earlier occasion Mr. Joshi said that no inquiries have been made with regard to workmen's compensation being extended to agriculturists all over India. Mr. Joshi knows perfectly well that inquiries had been made. On the original letter that was issued by the Government of India, it had been distinctly stated that the Government of India would like to know whether the provisions regarding workmen's compensation could be applied to agricultural workers or not. Mr. Joshi says that certain provisions are already made in the Assam Labour and Emigration Act, and therefore it is quite in the competence of Government to make further provisions. Earlier during the morning, Sir, Mr. Joshi passed very laudatory remarks with regard to the Government of 20 years ago as compared with the Government of to-day. I do not wish, Sir, to defend the Government of to-day, but I leave it to the House to determine whether the Government of to-day has been behindhand in the matter of social and economic legislation. As a matter of fact, Sir, Mr. Joshi himself has given the answer to his own question. He pointed out that the Assam Labour and Emigration Act applied to persons who entered into certain penal contracts, and it was the duty of the Legislature, it was the duty of the State particularly to protect those persons. When free contracts are made, when an agricultural labourer goes and works for a tenant cultivator or for a landholder, I do not think it is particularly incumbent on the State to make provision for his well-being unless a special case is made out for such provision. Mr. Joshi has not given an iota of fact to prove that conditions amongst agricultural labourers either in the plantations or elsewhere are bad. There is no necessity for any special inquiries beyond those that are being made by Government, and those that have already been made.

Similarly, Sir, Mr. Joshi wanted legislation prohibiting the night work of women and children in agriculture. My Honourable friend, Mr. Ley, has already pointed out that even if legislation is adopted it would be absolutely impossible to enforce such legislation. We, in India, Sir, have always taken care, we have always taken credit to ourselves that when we do pass legislation, we take steps to enforce that legislation; we do not want shop-window legislation.

Then again, Mr. Joshi has talked about living-in conditions. My Honourable friend, Mr. Ley has already read out the passages from the draft recommendation on this point. While we were at Geneva, Sir, we took care to point out to the Conference there that these recommendations were absolutely inapplicable to the conditions prevailing in India. I know my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has taken us to task for not having done our duty at the Conference. I think, Sir, if he had only taken the trouble to read the reports of the Conference, he would not have accused us of indifference towards the interests of India. We pointed out there that those conditions were absolutely inapplicable to India. But, Sir, these International Conventions are passed not with reference to the needs of any particular country but with reference to the needs of the whole world. As a matter of fact, we did succeed in carrying a suggestion that these recommendations, these proposals regarding agriculture, instead of being embodied in Draft Conventions which have a very much stricter authority, should be embodied as Recommendations. We did succeed to that extent, and this House has not got the same responsibility with what are technically called Recommendations as they have with regard to Draft Conventions. I do not think, Sir, that my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi, has made out a strong case, or for that matter, any case whatever for the acceptance of his amendment by the House, and with all due respect to his love for labour and the work that he has done for the betterment of the conditions of Indian labour. I respectfully beg this House not to accept his amendment.

Munshi Iswar Saran (Cities of the United Provinces: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I had no idea at all of taking part in this discussion, but the remarks made by some of the speakers incline me to the view that I should not let them pass unchallenged. Sir, I am not one of those who invariably express approval either of Government action or of Government choice, but I must say that Government were very wise in sending Mr. Joshi as our representative. (Hear, hear). Remarks have been made, which, when read outside this House might lead to the impression that Mr. Joshi had not our confidence. I wish to say that Mr. Joshi has our confidence, and we wish to pay our tribute or admiration for the work that he has done outside India and for the work that he is doing in this country. It has been said, Sir, that Mr. Joshi has got the vocational disease, but some people have got the ague of sobriety, which leaves them cold, and it is impossible for them to be moved to action or to any generous impulse or generous enthusiasm. If Mr. Joshi under the influence either of vocational disease or under the influence of patriotism is moved to action, it is not open to those who may perhaps be dead to those impulses to cast reflections upon him. Sir, I deprecate those references, and I protest against the remarks that have been made by some of the speakers here in this hall. Whom do they want to send? Some big landholder who engages thousands upon thousands of coolies to represent labour? (A Voice: "Why not?") Well, why not send a wolf to represent the sheep?

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I had not intended to intervene in this debate, but my Honourable friend, Munshi Iswar Saran, as he usually does, tries to please when he says he is not out to please. All that I said was that the Government of India should associate others with him and not that they did wrong in sending Mr. Joshi. It was far from my intention to say so. What I said was that the Government of India should associate other people with the deputation to represent the actual conditions from their point of view.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: You won't like that.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Some employers may be represented, and not the landlords.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: If landlords sleep, what can be done?

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: If they sleep, it is the duty of the Government of India to awake them, it is the duty of Mr. Joshi to awake them. But I do not think that they are really sleeping. We in this country do not think that these Labour Conferences really represent India or Indian views. That is the view we take. We do not take them seriously. It may be wrong to do so.

Well, now, to turn to the subject having regard to practical conditions, let us take the case of night work of women, what is night? After 6 P.M. I suppose it is night. (A Voice: "After 10 P.M.") Well, if it is after 10 P.M. I do not think even men work after 10 P.M. It is very very seldom that even men work after 10 P.M. and that too perhaps in the very busy harvest season. There may be some work to be done after 10 P.M., but it is very rare indeed. I have not come across such cases even in our temperate climate in Madras where people like to spend their nights in the open rather than inside a house or a shed; even there their work seldom goes beyond 10 P.M. Well, mention has been made about pregnant women. I think work for pregnant women will do a lot of good before delivery. In fact, women of the working classes have their confinement very easily, whereas for women who are confined to their homes like our girls in their luxurious homes, we have to employ midwives and nurses and sometimes call in doctors; who can deny work outside in the open air does them a lot of good. After all, what is the work that these working class women do? They pluck leaves, remove weeds, they transplant, and they take their hours of work easily. I do not know whether it does them any injury at all. Three months before child-birth and three months after child-birth! Can any country afford to get labour at such a cost? I ask this question in all earnestness. I hope I am not conservative or orthodox in these matters. Orthodox I may be, and very crude perhaps I may be supposed to be, but I am bound to give expression to my views in this matter. Does my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi, really expect labour women in this country to desist from labour for three months before child-birth and three months after child-birth? My Honourable friend read that some generous planter has made provision like that. If it is true, he must be a very generous man indeed. I do not think I can find the like of him in this world—at any rate not in the provinces of this country. (Mr. K. Ahmed: "What about other countries?") We are not in other countries. We are here for India, and we are here to legislate for Indians in India. We are not in other countries. This is a counsel of perfection. Even in your own homes, do not your women work generally in that period? Do they not draw water from wells, and attend to all other domestic work? These are idealist's theories incapable of being carried into effect. Does my Honourable friend, Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed, observe this rule with reference to his own servants? (Mr. K. Ahmed: "I do.") I am glad to hear that. Then, Sir, as regards these various living-in conditions which were mentioned, what is to be done? Take any planter. Take a planter in the Nilgiris. What do you expect him to do? You want so many rooms, you want so much accommodation. You know our gregarious habits. We live in a joint family system. The people would put up with any amount of inconvenience and live in the same house. Even if you provide a separate house, they won't go in there. Therefore, I think these are conditions which are incapable of being applied in this country. I quite sympathise with the object of improving conditions of labour and their wages. By all means remove all the penalties provided by special legislation for the benefit of the planters and enforced labour. But at the same time, where free labour is resorted to why should we interfere? I do not think that all planters after all are so bad as we suppose them to be and as they are painted. After all they have brought wealth to this country. The hills which were wastes have been brought under cultivation and they have got good seasons and bad seasons too. I know many a planter went to ruin in Mysore, in Nilgiris and in Wynad. I do not think it is after all correct to assume that they are making huge fortunes. Therefore, I do not think these are practical propositions. I therefore heartily support the Resolution and I am sorry with all respect to my friend, Mr. Joshi, that I cannot support his amendment. I do not want to cry down his work. In fact, I won't say this. It is not necessary for me to say this but for the fact that Munshi Iswar Saran supposed that I did cry down Mr. Joshi's work. I disclaim any such intention on my part. On the other hand, I have every admiration for his work. But at the same time I consider him an idealist in these matters.

Mr. N. M. Samarth (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): I move, Sir, that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The original question was that :

" This Assembly having considered the recommendations concerning the protection before and after child-birth of women wage-earners in agriculture, the night work of women, children and young persons employed in agriculture and the living in conditions of agricultural workers adopted by the Third Session of the International Labour Conference at Geneva in 1921, recommends to the Governor General in Council that legislation to secure their enforcement should not be introduced at the present time."

Since which an amendment has been moved that :

" At the end of the Resolution the following be added :

'but so far as the organised plantations are concerned requests the Government of India to consider the advisability of undertaking legislation to introduce these reforms'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that the Resolution be adopted.

The motion was adopted.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Quarter to Three of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Quarter to Three of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. President: The House will now resume consideration of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898 and the Court fees Act, 1870.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces, Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, I beg to move :

" That in clause 47 in the proposed sub-section (1) clauses (b) and (c) all words after the words 'is subordinate' be omitted."

Sir, under section 195 in the existing Code, it was laid down that the Magistrate was not to take cognisance of any of the offences enumerated therein without the sanction of the Court concerned or of the Court to which it was subordinate and under the present Bill and its proviso, we have removed the provision requiring the sanction and have retained that the cognisance could only be taken on the complaint of that court or the complaint of the court to which it is subordinate. We also go a step further and provide that the court can also take cognisance of the offence on the complaint made by order of or under authority from the Local Government. I beg to object to and move the removal of this additional clause which provides that cognisance may also be taken on the complaint made by order of or under authority from the Local Government. Sir, by the omission of a provision of this kind I am sure the administration of justice will not be hampered in any way. The courts in which the offences specified in this section are committed will be watchful and competent enough to file a complaint as required and in cases in which the courts concerned have not filed a complaint, the Local Government could if thought desirable, request those subordinate courts to take such action. It is not necessary to provide herein that the complaint be filed by order of the Local Government or under their authority. It will not only encumber the provisions of this Code but will also be undesirable in the ends of justice. For instance, where a Local Government orders the filing of a complaint before a subordinate Magistrate of the district, the subordinate Court will naturally think that that complaint has been filed by the Local Government, after good and thorough consideration of the facts concerned, and that the Local Government's opinion formed after consideration of these facts must be very sound and, on that basis the Magistrate will have no alternative in his own mind but to convict such person. Therefore Sir, I suggest that this provision authorising the filing of the complaint on orders of the Local Government be deleted. Moreover, Sir, the provisions that have been provided in these two sub-clauses (b) and (c) relate to the offences that have been committed in the Courts during the trial of cases before them and they relate to such offences, for instance, perjury, making false statements or using them as true or filing false or fraudulent suits, removing property from being taken possession of under processes of the Court or for contempt of Court or filing or using as genuine forged documents. For these offences committed in courts it is unnecessary that the Local Government should order the filing of a complaint. The Magistrate in whose courts these offences have been committed or their superior courts will be the best persons to decide whether or not such complaints be filed; therefore, I suggest, Sir, that this provision be deleted.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 47 in the proposed sub-section (1), clauses (b) and (c), omit all words after the words 'is subordinate'."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): It is true, that this is an addition to the existing Code. The reason for making it is given in the Report of the Lowndes Committee,—which I would again remind the House was not a Government Committee in any sense of the term. Section 195, they thought, caused constant difficulty:

"We have no doubt that it will not be possible to remedy the evils which are connected with this section so long as private individuals are allowed to prosecute for offences connected with the administration of justice. In our opinion, the only effective way of dealing with this section is to allow a prosecution to be launched only by the Court or, in exceptional cases, by the Local Government—who no doubt before long will be represented in such matters in their own provinces by a Director of Public Prosecutions."

It was intended therefore to provide only for exceptional cases in which the Local Government might find good reason for launching a prosecution. Mr. Agnihotri says this is dangerous—because if the sanction or complaint is made by the Local Government, the Magistrate will no doubt consider that such complaint could only have been made after due and proper consideration. In that, of course, my Honourable friend is quite right; such a complaint would only be made after due and proper consideration, but I see no reason why Mr. Agnihotri should use this as an argument against allowing a complaint to be made by the Local Government.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: It will be prejudicial to the accused.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Why it should be prejudicial to the accused that the complaint is made only after due and proper consideration is a mystery which I will not attempt to solve. He has forgotten, I think, equally that we have the sanction of the Local Government in such a case under section 196. Is that, again, prejudicial to the accused? If so, I think that it is worthy of note that no body has so far ever attempted to amend section 196—indeed in the whole course of our exceptional legislation, if I may say so, there has been one continual demand on the part of critics, namely, that prosecutions should not be launched without the sanction of the Local Government; and there is, of course, very little difference in so far as it affects the accused between the Local Government lodging a complaint through the proper agency and the Local Government giving sanction to the complaint. But I have given the sole reason, why this addition has been made in this section of the Bill.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, after hearing the Honourable the Home Member I feel convinced that the amendment is right and the explanation given by the Honourable Home Member is both unconvincing and wrong. Honourable Members will find that the offences categorised in clause (b) of section 195 are offences described in the Indian Penal Code as offences committed in the course of judicial proceedings, except in very exceptional cases to which I need not advert. The Honourable the Home Member has referred to the difficulty which both judges and practitioners felt in the working of section 195 coupled with section 476 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. I shall briefly advert to that difficulty. Under the existing law the courts were empowered either to complain on the motion of the party aggrieved or quo motu in respect of any offence committed in the course of proceedings before them. If they complained the matter was not open to revision and the accused had no redress except in a trial held in pursuance of that complaint. If, on the other hand, the court merely recorded a sanction for the prosecution of the accused, the accused had the right of appeal and revision, and the order of the court concerned was revisable both by the court of appeal and the ultimate court of revision. The difficulty to which Sir George Lowndes and his Committee advert is a difficulty of a different character upon which the High Courts in India have been at variance. The difficulty was not so much with reference to the complaint or sanction under section 195, but with reference to the inquiry possible under section 476. So far as the question of complaint is concerned, no difficulty arose, but when the question of granting a sanction to the party aggrieved was concerned, it sometimes happened that the person obtaining sanction did not prosecute the case within six months and he came to terms with the would-be accused; and there were other difficulties. These are the difficulties which confronted Sir George Lowndes' Committee and it was suggested by that Committee that it should do away with the distinction between complaint and sanction. I welcome that change. So far as the artificial distinction between complaint and sanction was concerned the present Bill is an improvement. But when it goes further and arms a Local Government with the power of ordering a prosecution or complaining, as required by section 195, clauses (b) and (c), there is occasion to pause and consider. The Honourable the Home Member has told the Honourable Members here what differences there are between a complaint made by a court and a complaint made by the Local Government. Surely, Sir, the Honourable the Home Member could not be unaware of the fact that a complaint made by a court is made by a judicial authority after hearing all parties concerned, while a complaint by a Local Government is made by an executive authority without giving the party aggrieved any chance of complaint or redress in the lawfully constituted courts of the country.

That is a vital difference between a complaint of a judicial officer and a complaint by an executive authority. I, therefore, submit that 3 P.M. the distinction between the two must be borne in mind by Honourable Members before they record their votes. Then, it has been said by the Honourable the Home Member, what difference would it make if the Local Governments are empowered to complain under section 195, when, as a matter of fact, they had possessed the power of complaining under section 196? Honourable Members have merely to advert to section 196 to see the difference between the two sections and the power of the Local Government in the one case should not be extended in the case of the other. Let me read to Honourable Members section 196 to which reference has been made from the Government Benches. That section, Sir, reads as follows:

"No Court shall take cognizance of any offence punishable under Chapter VI of the Indian Penal Code (except section 127), or punishable under section 106A, or section 153 or section 294A or section 505 of the same Code, unless upon complaint made by order of, or under authority from, the Governor General in Council the Local Government, or some officer empowered by the Governor General in Council in this behalf."

These, Honourable Members will observe, are disabling provisions which prevent any complaint being lodged except upon the motion of the Local Government, while section 195 (b) and (c) are intended to extend the powers of the Local Governments by placing within their jurisdiction cases which would not otherwise be within their jurisdiction. That is a difference, and, I submit, a very important difference. The analogy of section 196 is rather against the contention raised by the Honourable the Home Member and not in favour of it. It simply places an embargo upon all complaints against certain persons and in respect of certain offences except on the complaint of the Local Government. It is intended to protect certain persons from vexatious and frivolous prosecutions. That is not the object of the amendment which is inserted in clauses (b) and (c) of section 195. These clauses are intended to give the Local Government, as chief executive authority, power to initiate prosecutions on their own authority and it is that which is the gravamen of my friend, Mr. Agnihotri's contention. Mr. Agnihotri, Sir, has rightly observed, that, constituted as the Courts are in this country, it is very difficult for the poor accused to defend himself against a prosecution launched under the aegis of the Local Government. The Courts will assume: 'Here is a prosecution launched by no less a person or body than the Local Government. This man who stands here to defend himself has not a ghost of a chance.' The prosecution, I submit, play with loaded dice, the defence on the other has a forlorn hope. That, I submit, is the danger of arming the executive

[Dr. H. S. Gour.]

Government with a further power of complaining and ordering prosecutions. Sir George Lowndes' Committee contemplated, Sir, the institution of the office of a Director of Public Prosecutions, and if I understood the report of the Committee aright, they wanted to do away with section 195 as such and to substitute therefor an independent machinery for the purpose of dealing with cases referred to in section 195. That is entirely a different matter. If the Government had introduced in the present Code an amendment to the effect that all prosecutions against public justice for perjury, making false charges and the rest, are hereafter to be investigated and initiated by a special judicial officer, call him either the Director of Public Prosecution or the Prosecutor General as the case may be, and that officer will give the party aggrieved a chance of defending himself and showing cause why the order against him should not be recorded, I do not think this House would have any ground for complaint. It would be the creation of an independent tribunal to examine and judge of the prima facie culpability of the persons against whom such prosecutions are initiated; but to give this power of a purely judicial character to an Executive Government who will not hear the accused, who will act in camera, and order prosecutions, is, I submit, a reactionary piece of legislation, against which this House should vote.

Munshi Mahadeo Prasad (Benares and Gorakhpur Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): I beg to associate myself with what has fallen from the Mover of the amendment. When we look at the Criminal Procedure Code we find that the offences dealt with by section 195 are offences connected with contempts of lawful authority of public servants, and also offences relating to false evidence and offences against public justice; and when we refer to section 196 we find the offences referred to in that section are offences against the State. So the analogy between sections 195 and 196 is not sound. Further when the Court tries a case and goes into its pro and cons, both parties have a right to be represented by counsel. But Sir, when the matter goes to the Local Government, everything is done in camera, and I submit, Sir, the arguments put forward by Dr. Gour have very great weight and I support the amendment moved by Mr. Agnihotri.

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, I rise to offer just a few remarks with reference to those which fell from my Honourable and learned friend, Dr. Gour. I wish, Sir, to explain the type of cases in view of which this provision has been inserted. It will be seen, Sir, that this section, read with section 476, abolishes sanction in these cases and substitutes complaint. The idea was, Sir, that in cases of complaints by the High Courts it might be difficult to get them to move and that it was therefore desirable in these exceptional cases—and the provision will only be used in very exceptional cases—to take this power for the Local Government to institute a prosecution by means of a complaint in these particular cases. My Honourable friend also stated that in cases instituted on the complaint of the Local Government the counsel for the defence were working against loaded dice. I would suggest that some 50 per cent. or more of the important prosecutions in this country are made under the orders of the Local Government. This, Sir, is also, I would submit, a provision very similar to provisions in the English law. If we take the Vexatious Indictments Act of 1859, perjury is one of the offences included there, and the indictment may be made by His Majesty's Attorney General or His Majesty's Solicitor General.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Is that the Local Government?

Mr. H. Tonkinson: His Majesty's Attorney General and His Majesty's Solicitor General are part of the Government.

Dr. H. S. Gour: They are Law Officers of the Crown.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: They absolutely make indictments on behalf of the Crown in exactly the same way as the Local Government moves here: there is no difference whatsoever.

Then, as regards the Director of Public Prosecutions, I was surprised, Sir, to learn that this officer was to be a judicial officer, an officer who was to make judicial inquiries. When we have been considering the appointments of Directors of Public Prosecutions in the past, we have always assumed that they were to be officers of the same character as the Director of Public Prosecutions who was constituted in England in 1879. That officer exercises no judicial functions at all, and I would submit that my Honourable friend is quite mistaken in what he assumes to have been the intention of Sir George Lowndes' Committee in their reference to a Director of Public Prosecutions.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally (Sind: Muhammadan Rural): I rise, Sir, to support my friend, Mr. Agnhotri, and, in addition to the reasons advanced by my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, I shall only advance one more reason in support of the amendment. Suppose, Sir, I am an aggrieved party and I apply to the Court that it do lodge a complaint against the person at whose hands I am aggrieved, and the Court refuses to lodge that complaint. I then approach the Government, and Government, without reference to the Court, lodges a complaint on its own initiative. What happens? The Court is discredited by the Government, and the Government on its own initiative lodges a complaint against the considered opinion of a Court of law established by itself. If the Government wish to have a complaint lodged in cases of this kind, there is nothing to prevent it from moving the Court to lodge the complaint. That would be the proper procedure to adopt and not direct action on their own initiative. I therefore support the amendment.

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan (Tirhut Division: Muhammadan): Sir, I rise to oppose the amendment. Here is the amendment. It runs:

"In clause 47 in the proposed sub-section (1), clauses (b) and (c), omit the words 'is subordinate'."

Now, Sir, I do not understand why when the subordinate court has power to sanction a prosecution, the prosecution should not be started at the instance of a court higher than that or by the Local Government. It cannot be supposed for a minute that the Government would be so foolish as to act against the interests of its subordinate officers.

Mr. P. P. Ginwala (Burmah Non-European): May I know, Sir, whom the Honourable Member is addressing. We cannot hear him.

Mr. President: He is addressing the Chair.

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan: So I do not see any necessity whatsoever for this amendment, which would stop a court to which that court is subordinate from starting a prosecution or stopping the Local Government from doing so. This procedure will not help the administration of justice and I therefore oppose the amendment.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I beg to invite the attention of the House to one point to which no reference has been made so far, and it is this. According to the amendment of section 195, which has been proposed in the Bill, the right of appeal, if I may so describe it, which now exists under clause (6) of the section, has been taken away. Clause 6 of the present section says that any sanction given or refused under section 195, Criminal Procedure Code, may be revoked or granted by any authority to which the authority giving or refusing it, is subordinate. "No sanction shall remain in force" and so forth.

Mr. President: I do not quite see the relevance of that to the amendment. I am not a lawyer like the Honourable Member, but it is a matter of common sense.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: Therefore Sir, the question arises whether by vesting the Local Government with power to complain or order the prosecution of a person an important right which was reserved to the party who has been put upon his trial has been taken away. So that the position is this. The Local Government does not hear the case, the Local Government has no direct knowledge of the facts. Somebody represents to the Local Government that somebody ought to be prosecuted, and the conclusion that is formed by the Local Government or the representative of the Local Government is come to behind the back of the person who is going to be put upon his trial. Now, Sir, as I have pointed out, there is an important provision as to appeal under section 486 of the Criminal Procedure Code where certain offences of the nature of contempt have been committed. That section provides that if an offence is committed in the presence of a Court, the Court can put him on his trial under certain sections of the Indian Penal Code.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Those are not the sections here.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: Those are not all the sections of the Penal Code mentioned in section 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. I say those sections of the Penal Code, in respect of which an accused has been deprived of his right of appeal by clause 17 of the Bill, are different from the sections mentioned in section 486 of the Criminal Procedure Code. A complaint has been made by a person who has no direct knowledge of the facts. It is otherwise in the case of contempt proceedings. Therefore, Sir, the question arises whether the Local Government should be vested with powers of setting the criminal law in motion under these circumstances. I submit, Sir, when the right of appeal has been taken away, there can be no control of the orders of the Local Government. A complaint has to be tested when it is made before a Magistrate. The complainant has to be examined in all cases, and if a Magistrate has reason to distrust the complainant, a police inquiry is ordered, or something of that kind takes place. The inquiry that takes place at that stage is an open inquiry, a judicial inquiry, and the Magistrate has the right to dismiss a complaint under section 203, Criminal Procedure Code, for an adequate cause. Whereas in the case in point, the Local Government formulates its order behind the back of the person who is going to be put on his trial. It comes to a conclusion in his absence, and he is deprived of all the safeguards which exist in the Code in the case of all complaints before a Magistrate. Surely, Sir, there is some value in the principle of testing a complaint, which principle the Criminal Procedure Code recognises to the full, and here is a provision which is going to be introduced by clause 47 of the Bill which will deprive the person who is going to be put on his trial, of a very important right, I have, therefore, great pleasure in supporting the amendment of my Honourable friend.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That in clause 47 in the proposed sub-section (1), clause (b), omit all the words after the words 'is subordinate'."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"In clause 47 in the proposed sub-section (1), clause (c), omit all the words after the words 'is subordinate'."

Sir, this is the same amendment which I moved in respect of clause (b) and I need not say anything further. It is consequential.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, my amendment is a very modest one and I believe that the Government are rather inclined to favour me this time. Sir, my amendment is this. In the proviso in the third clause of section 195 which reads thus:

"For the purposes of this section, a Court shall be deemed to be subordinate to the Court to which appeals ordinarily lie from the appealable decrees or sentences of such former Court, or, in the case of a Civil Court from whose decrees no appeal ordinarily lies, to the principal Court of ordinary civil jurisdiction within the local limits of whose jurisdiction such Civil Court is situate."

I move, as agreed to by the Government, to omit the word "of" and substitute the words "having ordinary". That carries out the idea which I have in view.

I move, therefore:

"In clause 47 (4) in proposed sub-section (3) after the words 'principal Court' omit the word 'of' in order to insert the words 'having ordinary'."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): Sir, the Government supports the amendment moved by my Honourable friend. The motion was adopted.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, I will move my amendment in separate parts:

"In clause 47 after sub-clause (4) insert the following sub-clause:

'(5) After sub-section (4) of the same section as renumbered the following sub-sections shall be inserted, namely:

'(5) The person against whom proceedings are intended to be taken under this section shall be given an opportunity to show cause against the same'."

Honourable Members will notice that under section 195 there are three classes of cases in which proceedings are intended to be taken. The first portion, clause (a), deals with an offence that is committed in relation to contempt of the lawful authority of public servants (172 to 188). Then clauses (b) and (c) are offences committed in relation to matters which come before the courts. Now, the public servant concerned or some other public servant to whom he subordinates may complain under clause (a). Under clauses (b) and (c) as now amended the court or any court to which such Court is subordinate will have to make the complaint. It is not clear to me—I raise this question now—whether the complaint referred to in clauses (b) and (c) of section 195, whether in making that complaint that court has to adopt the procedure which is laid down for it in 476. Apparently it is the intention to do so, in which case I should like the word "complaint" to be followed by the words as provided in section 476 or some such thing introduced. If it is the intention of the Government that in making the complaint under clauses (b) and (c), that court has to adopt the procedure under section 476, it is not made clear. Even so 476 contemplates only "after such preliminary inquiry if any, as it thinks necessary". But that is not enough. I want to make it obligatory upon the court also that it will give notice to the accused of the charge against him and make him show cause against the proceedings. That is so far as the courts are concerned. The courts, the public servant or the superior authority, I think it is better that all of them should give an opportunity to the person against whom they intend to take proceedings to show cause against the same. Ordinarily in practice they do it but I want to make it a statutory obligation; in this way public money will be saved and vexation avoided. Much annoyance will be avoided and no harm will be done by giving an opportunity to the person against whom proceedings are intended to be taken to show cause against the same.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, with reference to this amendment, I think it is desirable to take the different classes of cases dealt with under clauses (a), (b) and (c) of sub-section (1) of section 195 separately. That has been done, I admit to some extent by my Honourable and learned friend, Mr. Rangachariar. Take the case, first, Sir, of prosecutions for a contempt of the lawful authority of public servants which are dealt with under clause (a). Those sections, Sir, are the offences punishable under sections 172 to 188 of the Indian Penal Code. Honourable Members will observe what class of offences they relate to: Intentionally omitting to give notice or information to a public servant by a person legally bound to give such notice or information; Knowingly furnishing false information to a public servant; Giving false information to a public servant in order to cause him to use his lawful power to the injury of another person and so on. Now, Sir, these are offences against the authority of a public servant. It is true that we ought as we do in section 195 to prevent prosecutions in such cases being made on the complaint of a common informer, but why should not the public servant be able to complain himself in those cases just in the same manner as an ordinary private person can complain when he is the aggrieved person? Imagine, Sir, a Sub-Inspector of Police having to complain under clause (a). Suppose a Sub-Inspector of Police has received false information. He has gone to great trouble to inquire into the offence, and then he decides that the evidence is absolutely false and that he will proceed under section 182 of the Indian Penal Code. Why should he not be able to make a complaint? The person who gave information to him had sufficient opportunity to show cause during the inquiry into the offence. Why should he not then be able to go and make a complaint at once? Why should he have to ask the man to show cause before he makes a complaint? What is the procedure going to be in such cases? I presume, Sir, you will have to include all these papers among the police papers, and they shall not be produced in court. The Honourable Member is unable to trust this Sub-Inspector of Police. As regards the offences under clauses (b) and (c), as suggested by my Honourable friend, the intention is that the Courts should proceed under sections 476A and 476B in such cases. I should think, Sir, that this is quite clear; there is in fact a definite reference to section 195, sub-section (1), clauses (b) and (c) in section 476 as it is proposed to be revised by this Bill. What will happen if a Court decides to complain under these clauses? It can take action under section 476 after such preliminary enquiry as it thinks necessary. Now, Sir, we have similar words to this in section 476 of the Code at present and everybody knows what the meaning of those words is. Of course, Sir, the Courts will at once apply the old rulings to the interpretation of this provision. But we have gone beyond this in the proposed section 476. There is full power of appeal and so on in section 476B, and I submit it is entirely unnecessary, as regards the Courts, to make such a provision as has been proposed by my Honourable friend. It is worse than unnecessary in the case of offences dealt with under clause (a).

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, the short answer to my Honourable friend Mr. Tonkinson is this. He has only referred to certain sections enumerated in clause (a) but he has omitted to mention the rest, and I shall do so. Section 172—Absconding to avoid service of summons or other proceeding from a public servant. Section 173—Preventing the service or the affixing of any summons or notice, or the removal of it when it has been fixed. Section 174—Not obeying a legal order to attend a certain place in person or by agent. 175—Intentionally omitting to produce a document. 176—Intentionally omitting to give notice or information. 177—Knowingly furnishing false information to a public servant. 178—Refusing oath when duly required to take oath. 179—Being legally bound to state the truth and refusing to answer questions. 180—Refusing to sign a document. 181—Knowingly stating to a public servant on oath that which is false. 182—Giving false information to a public servant. 183—Resistance to the taking of property by the lawful authority of a public servant. 184—Obstructing the sale of property offered for sale by the authority of the public servant. 185—Bidding for a person under legal incapacity to purchase that property at a lawfully authorised sale. 186—Obstructing a public servant in the discharge of his public functions. 187—Omission to assist public servant when bound by law to give such assistance. 188—Disobedience to an order lawfully promulgated by a public servant. These are the various offences categorised in clause (a) of section 195, sub-clause (1). These offences may be committed before any public servant. They may be before a Collector. They may be before a public servant other than a sub-inspector of police instanced by my friend the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson. There is a conglomeration of these various sections in one particular clause and if these sections have been collected under clause (a) it is perfectly obvious that there are numerous cases in which the party aggrieved may have a very good defence and which he would be deprived of if he is not called upon to show cause. I therefore submit that it is idle to contend that these are cases in which nothing is gained and much would be lost by giving notice to the accused. I think, Sir, Mr. Rangachariar's amendment is a necessary amendment and the House should vote for it.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson put this question to us. If a private person has got the right of complaining, why a public servant may not exercise the same right? That is the main question which has been put. The answer is obvious. If a private person lodges a complaint and eventually it is established or determined by the court which tries that case that the complaint was unfounded then that private person, who was the complainant, wasted his time and money and then he is defeated. There are a number of private persons. They lodge complaints. Their complaints are dismissed and they do not mind and the public has not got notice of that, I mean the public at large. But if a public servant goes to the court without examining fully what explanation the accused has got to give and he lodges the complaint and if the complaint is dismissed, in the first place, public money is wasted. In the second place, who is defeated? The public servant, and that defeat will give a bad name to the executive department, because that defeat will minimise the prestige and it will go to indicate and may be talked over that the public servants do not do things with that amount of carefulness which they should observe. That is the answer which I can give to that question. Now, Sir, if a man who is going to be prosecuted is given the chance of explaining his conduct and the explanation which he gives is satisfactory, then there will be no necessity for lodging the complaint, and if the same explanation is not taken before the complaint is lodged and subsequent to that that explanation is given in court and considered sufficient, then the whole procedure in connection with that prosecution will be considered futile, and therefore, it is very desirable that before a public servant comes to the Court, he should try to see whether there is some force in his complaint, whether there is not sufficient rebuttal which could be given by the other side subsequently, and consequently this amendment in regard to this clause (a) is a very commendable one. As to clauses (b) and (c), the Government benches

(Honourable Members: "We are not concerned with them.")

Dr. Nand Lal: All right. Therefore I, Sir, strongly support this amendment, which commends itself.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, my friend, Dr. Nand Lal, has said that public servants may make complaints on their own initiative without giving the accused persons an opportunity to show cause, that some of these complaints may be false, that a horrible disaster will happen, and that public time and public money will be wasted. The Government is to be blamed for that. Hundreds of complaints are lodged every day in the Courts of this country by private individuals which lead to nothing—they are dismissed, perhaps dismissed under section 203; hundreds of complaints lead to nothing and public time and public money is wasted. Who is to blame for this I should not like to say,—but it is not the Government. Why a distinction should be drawn in this matter between the private complainant and the public servant who wants to complain I entirely fail to understand.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Is it not that a private complainant is fined for a frivolous prosecution?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: He can be fined for a frivolous prosecution, yes, but we are not talking about frivolous prosecutions. Public servants do not waste their time by making frivolous prosecutions at all. They are all too busy. Dr. Gour, Sir, read long extracts from the Second Schedule to the Criminal Procedure Code, and I thought he was going to build up some argument. He apparently decided not to do so after he had read out a description of the offences that are included in section 195 (1) (a). Let me take one of these, Sir. He read out to the House section 188: disobedience to an order promulgated by a public servant, that is, an order issued under one of the preventive sections of the Code. The man to whom it is issued takes no steps to comply with the order,—takes no steps to show cause why he should not comply with the order; the public servant thereupon calls upon him to come and show cause why he should not be prosecuted for not having complied with the order. Sir, there will be no finality in this matter. Surely the public servant can be trusted in this case to exercise his discretion wisely and well. Mr. Rangachariar, Sir, suggested that it was the practice at the present moment for public servants to call upon persons whom they intended to prosecute to show cause. That is not my experience at all. I have never heard of such a suggestion, that it is the practice, nor, until this moment, have I ever heard it suggested that it should be the practice.

[Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith.]

Dr. Gour's main argument, which came out in his well known peroration, was to the effect that the man might have a very good answer to the charge indeed, and that if you don't enable him to come and show cause, you are depriving him of a very valuable defence. Sir, I hope the House will not be deceived by that argument. The trial has not begun yet. The complaint is going to be lodged. If the man has got a very good defence, he will have ample opportunity to raise it. Take the case, Sir, of a process server who wants to lodge a complaint. He goes to his superior officer and says to him, "I desire to lodge a complaint against this man who has refused to obey my orders." Is the process server going to issue notice to the man to come and show cause before him? If the man does appear to show cause how is the process server to hold a judicial inquiry and decide whether the complaint should be lodged or not?

Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din (East Central Punjab: Muhammadan): Sir, under the existing law, when the offences enumerated in clauses (a), (b) and (c) could be taken cognizance of by courts on the complaints of private individuals with the previous sanction of courts or the public servants there was at least this satisfaction that the public servant or the presiding Judge of a court, when he decided upon the application of a private individual as to whether sanction to prosecute should be accorded or not acted as a judge or arbitrator, that is, as a third party. But under the proposed law, he himself is to be the complainant. In all cases in which he can complain under the proposed section, offences will not be committed in his presence and very often he will have to form his opinion upon the report of one of his subordinates or menials, say, a process server. Therefore it is not only fair but I think quite consonant with judicial principles that before initiating proceedings he should call upon the person concerned to show cause; and if, after examining and hearing him, he is satisfied that there is really a good case against him, he should start the prosecution. But if, on the other hand, simply on the report of a menial, he is entitled to start a prosecution or initiate a complaint, that in my humble opinion will be an injustice to the person proceeded against. Therefore, no complaint should be lodged by any public servant or presiding Judge in regard to offences enumerated in clauses (a), (b) and (c) without giving an opportunity to the person concerned to appear before him to show that the complaint which is proposed to be lodged against him is not warranted.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, how halting Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith's opposition to the proposed amendment is was shown by the way in which owing to his enforced halt in his speech more than one Member of the House was deceived and rose in his place to address the House before he had as it proved quite finished. I am surprised, Sir, that this very necessary, important and valuable safeguard should be resisted by the Government as they have done. We have not heard anything from the Government Benches yet which is likely to convince this House of the necessity for rejecting this amendment. The state of things has partially changed. Complaint has been substituted for sanction. Whether that is good, bad or indifferent is quite another matter. In the changed order of things it would be more than a safeguard to have this preliminary inquiry. Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith asked whether a man who refused to attend was to be called upon to show cause why he should not be prosecuted for not attending under certain circumstances. Does he not remember the story of the Irishman who came in his father's stead to show cause why his father had not appeared as a juror. He had thirty-nine reasons, Sir, and the first was that his father was dead. Well, Sir, in many of these cases, as Chaudhuri Shahab-ud-din has pointed out, on the report of a process server or a menial—sometimes a very coloured and exaggerated report—proceedings have been ordered to be taken and then it has turned out that there was absolutely no substratum of truth underlying the whole of the proceedings. Before all that elaborate and expensive procedure has been gone through, what do we ask? We simply ask that the man should have an opportunity of explaining his conduct if he has any explanation to offer, and then if that is not satisfactory, you can go forward. I think enough has been said, Sir, by more than one Member to support the amendment. There is just one matter that I should like to suggest to Mr. Rangachariar to consider, viz., if he is pressing his amendment—as I hope he will—whether he would not like to consider the phraseology. The amendment ends with these words: "Shall be given an opportunity to show cause against the same." Against what? Is it against the proceedings? I take it that Mr. Rangachariar's intention is that the person should have an opportunity of showing cause against the proposal to lodge complaint. (Dr. H. S. Gour: "We all see it.") I am glad Dr. Gour sees it. It is sometimes impossible for him to see things for the time being. I hope he will consider that and with your leave suggest such verbal alteration as is necessary and press the amendment.

Mr. P. E. Percival (Bombay: Nominated Official): I only wish to point out to my Honourable friend that the word "complaint" existed in section 195 (a) under the old law. There has been no change in section 195 (a) in regard to any substitution of "complaint" for "sanction"; so that the proposal now made is an addition to the existing law in section 195 (a), against which no objection has been raised hitherto. My Honourable friend Dr. Gour quoted different sections—section 172 and other sections. I would like to point out that these offences are of a very mild character—section 172 "absconding to avoid service"—punishment, simple imprisonment for one month. And similarly with regard to the other sections, the offences are of a very mild character. We have to remember that at this stage the man is not being tried for any offence. In respect of other offences a man may be put on his trial without any complaint or anything of the kind. Merely the Police send up the case. But in the cases now under consideration the officer in question has to give his approval to the prosecution before it is started. Now, it is proposed to go still further. Suppose that the public servant gives an order and that the man does not obey his order. First of all the public servant has to call upon him to show cause why a complaint should not be made and then he has to make a complaint; all this for the matter of a sentence of one month's imprisonment. After all these things are done, then the trial begins. (Dr. H. S. Gour: "Section 177—punishment 2 years.") That may be so in some cases. We cannot take an extreme case. As observed by my Honourable friend Mr. Tonkinson, in respect of clauses (b) and (c) the amendment will not make much difference. But the important clause is clause (a); and there is no ground whatever, I submit, for making any change in respect of section 195 (a).

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, if we look to clause (a) of section 195, we find that it has been inserted with the object of protecting the public against the prosecutions or complaints, filed by a public servant vexatiously or lightly, and with this view, the old clause provided that except with the previous sanction, or on the complaint, of the public servant concerned or of some public servant to whom he was subordinate any cognisance of the offence was not to be taken. Here, you have removed the words "with the sanction of the public servant." We do not object to that, but by removing "sanction" you have also removed the clause (6) which existed in the old Code. Under clause (6) if a sanction to prosecute was given by a public servant, that sanction could be revoked by a higher authority. We have taken away that provision from this new section; and, therefore, now we leave the matter absolutely in the hands of the public servant aggrieved to file a complaint if he so pleases and no authority has been given to revise or revoke it. It therefore becomes necessary that the amendment which has been proposed by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, be seriously considered and inserted in this section.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I wish to point out to the House

4 P.M. how very far it proposes to go in this respect. Our Criminal Procedure Code lays down certain rules for Courts. Incidentally it also lays down certain rules as regulating those proceedings of the police which are preliminary to action being taken by the Courts. Here you propose to go much further; you propose to lay down proceedings for revenue servants, executive servants of all kinds. If a revenue officer has to file a complaint you first of all demand that because he is a revenue officer, he should undertake semi-judicial proceedings in advance . . .

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: They do it. The Evidence Act applies to them also in certain matters.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Whether any arrangement can be made for bringing the proceedings taken by that public servant before the review of any Courts to see if they were adequate or appropriate or not I am not sure. I will only remark that the amendment refers to complaints made by all public servants, and the definition of public servant occupies over a page in the Code. They therefore apply to a very numerous class of persons for whom the Code usually lays down no rules of procedure whatever; and you are proposing that this extensive class of public servants should be placed under an embargo on making complaints which any man in the street can undertake. We are told that the time of the Court should not be wasted on infructuous prosecutions. Then why do you not, in justice and logic, lay down that any person, before he files a complaint before a Magistrate, should give the person against whom the complaint is to be filed an opportunity to show cause why the complaint should not be made? Every argument you have urged against the right of the public servant applies equally to the rights of the private individual.

Mr. President: The amendment moved is:

"That in clause 47 after sub-clause (4) insert the following sub-clause:

'(5) After sub-section (4) of the same section as renumbered the following subsection shall be inserted, namely:

'(5) The person against whom proceedings are intended to be taken under this section shall be given an opportunity to show cause against the same'."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I should like to know whether we are asked to vote on this amendment with reference only to clause (a) or to all the clauses?

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I have no objection to putting it clause by clause.

Mr. President: There can be no misunderstanding about it. The question I have put means that the new sub-section proposed by Mr. Rangachariar affects the section, that is, the whole section (a), (b) and (c).

Does the Honourable Member wish to make any verbal alteration?

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I am prepared to make a verbal alteration so that the last part of sub-clause (5) will read "shall be given an opportunity to show cause against the proceedings."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Against the making of the complaint I suppose the Honourable Member means.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I accept Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith's amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: It is not my amendment.

Mr. President: The amendment will read :

"The person against whom proceedings are intended to be taken under this section shall be given an opportunity to show cause against the making of the complaint."

Mr. K. Ahmed: Wouldn't the words "proceeded against" be more appropriate, Sir?

Mr. President: I did not catch the words of wisdom which fell from the Honourable Member from Bengal.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I repeat, Sir, I think the words "proceeded against" would be better and more appropriate.

Mr. President: Amendment moved :

"In clause 47 after sub-clause (4) insert the following sub-clause :

"(5) After sub-section (4) of the same section as renumbered the following sub-section shall be inserted, namely :

"(5) The person against whom proceedings are intended to be taken under this section shall be given an opportunity to show cause against the making of the complaint."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I move the following; I do so with some diffidence:

"In clause 47, after sub-clause (4) insert the following sub-clause:

'(7) In Provinces where a Provincial Director of Public Prosecutions has been appointed, any complaint by him in respect of offences mentioned in this section shall be deemed to be a complaint under this section'."

Then the Explanation:

"The Local Government may appoint from among persons qualified to be Judges of the High Court a Director of Public Prosecutions for the Province."

Sir, as has been pointed out just a few minutes ago, the Lowndes Committee on which so much reliance is placed by the Government Benches have recommended this and therefore I have the highest authority, that authority of the Lowndes Committee, for recommending this procedure in the case of prosecutions in this country. Sir, it will be a very welcome addition to our criminal procedure if prosecutions, not only in cases in which the Government are interested such as offences against the State but ordinary prosecutions for murder and other serious offences, the initiation of proceedings and their conduct can be placed in charge of a Director of Public Prosecutions as is the case in England. It will be a very good departure indeed. Much of the complaint against the administration of criminal justice in this country will disappear if we can place prosecutions in the hands of a responsible officer, a legal gentleman who can bring a judicial mind to bear upon the conduct of prosecutions—not hold judicial proceedings as Mr. Tonkinson misunderstood. As it is now, in each province you have got only public prosecutors in the districts who are seldom consulted in the case of prosecutions before Magistrates. Before Magistrates you have got the police as prosecutor in the shape of prosecuting inspectors of police. I am speaking of the system which is prevailing in my province—I do not know if a similar system prevails elsewhere. Again there is a very responsible function to be performed by the Local Government in these matters. There are offences against the State; there are offences which we have just been dealing with—contempt of lawful authority of public servants—and there are offences of a serious nature such as big conspiracies and other things and in which before undertaking a prosecution if the Government have the assistance of a person like this it will be very helpful indeed. The system of Director of Public Prosecutions has been tried in England from the year 1879, and, Sir, he occupies a very important position indeed. All the serious prosecutions are in his hands; the police are bound to give him such information as he wants; he takes charge of prosecutions at any stage he thinks fit; he can appoint assistants; he can appoint counsel to conduct the prosecutions in various cases and, Sir, I think it will be a very right departure to make. Sir, we have advanced very far in this country. We are not in those ancient days when the country had not got the advantages of that education and other amenities that we have now. Therefore the time has come for each province to appoint a Director of Public Prosecutions who will be very useful not only in conducting prosecutions and in advising prosecutions and in initiating criminal proceedings against subjects of the Crown, but also useful to the Crown in cases where appeals against acquittals have to be preferred. Sir, what happens now? Under our present Criminal Procedure Code, the Government has got the power to appeal against acquittals. How is that power exercised? Some investigating officer is dissatisfied with the verdict of acquittal given in a Sessions case and he moves his District Superintendent of Police who moves the District Magistrate who moves the Secretary in the Home Department of every Local Government. Sir, how can you expect the Government to bring a judicial mind to bear in respect of these matters? What machinery have they at their disposal? No doubt some times they consult the Public Prosecutor in the High Court whether an appeal should be filed or not. Sometimes they are consulted, sometimes not. Public Prosecutors in the High Court have their hands very full indeed with their ordinary criminal work, appeal work and revisional work which they have to look after. In England you have got not only an Attorney-General, but a Solicitor-General and a Director of Public Prosecutions, and this Director of Public Prosecutions performs a very important function. There are three pages in this book where the duties of such Director of Public Prosecutions are described. The procedure adopted there is conducive to the sound administration of criminal justice:

" Before 1879 there was no provision for the systematic prosecution of offences in England such as there was in Scotland and in most countries on the Continent. Except in those cases in which the Attorney-General intervened on the ground that they were of special public importance, the initiation of prosecutions was left to the injured parties, encouraged by the provision made for defraying the costs of the prosecution out of the public funds. By the Prosecution of Offences Acts, 1879 and 1884, more adequate provisions were made for a national and public system of prosecutions.

" By the Act of 1879 a new department of 'Director of Public Prosecutions' was created, to be distinct from the previously existing legal departments of the Crown. By the Act of 1884, this department was merged in that of the Solicitor to the Treasury. But this arrangement was found not to work well, and accordingly, by the Prosecution of Offences Act, 1908, the two departments were again separated and power was given to the Secretary of State to appoint a Director of Public Prosecutions, and such number of Assistant Directors as the Treasury may sanction."

Then :

' He is subject in all matters including the selection and instruction of counsel, to the directions of the Attorney General. He is 'to institute, undertake or carry on criminal proceedings'

Mr. President: Order, order. I observe that the amendment turns upon the existence of an office known as the Director of Public Prosecutions. Now the Honourable Member apparently proposes to create that office by an unusual procedure, namely, by an Explanation. On looking at the Code I find that there is a Chapter, Chapter II dealing with the constitution of Criminal Courts and Offices. It seems to me that it is a very unusual procedure to attempt to create a new and important office under the criminal law of the country by a sub-section which deals with a comparatively small matter, and unless the Honourable Member can satisfy me that such office already exists, I don't think that his amendment is in order.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I am sorry, Sir, no such office exists, and my object is to educate the Government on the necessity of such an office

Mr. President: I have given the Honourable Member a fair opportunity of educating Government, and I must now rule his amendment out of order.

Clause 47, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Mr. B. N. Misra (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, I propose that clause 48 be omitted. Clause 48 is section 196B, which is entirely a new section in this Code. Section 196B says "In the case of any offence in respect of which the provisions of section 196 or section 196A apply, a District Magistrate or Chief Presidency Magistrate may, notwithstanding anything contained in those sections or in any other part of this Code, order a preliminary investigation by a police officer not being below the rank of Inspector, in which case such police officer shall have the powers referred to in section 155, sub-section (3)." Sir, the offences contemplated in sections 196A and 196B are very serious offences. They are practically offences relating to Chapter VI, namely of committing depredation on the territories of any Power in alliance with Her Majesty or receiving property taken in war or committing the depredations mentioned in sections 125 and 126. They are really very serious offences. Section 196A provides that "No court shall take cognisance of such offences except on the complaint of the Governor General in Council or the Local Government." I submit really that when such a thing as a depredation on a foreign territory takes place or if anybody receives property or commits the depredations mentioned in section 125—when such serious offences take place—it will be known throughout the country, and the Governor General in Council and the Local Government will certainly not remain idle or fail to inquire, and will accord sanction to such offences being tried. But when both the Local Government and the Governor General in Council do not take the matter into their consideration, it must be that either no such offence was committed or it must have been really a false case that might have been represented to the District Magistrate. If really the state of affairs is such that the offence is not very serious, then to allow the District Magistrate to make an inquiry through an Inspector of Police would be unnecessarily troubling the people. Of course, Sir, we have already in this Code provided for several actions to be taken by the police in the security proceedings and so on and I do not think really an inquiry should be made by the District Magistrate where the Local Government or the Governor General in Council do not take any steps. The inevitable result will be to put the people in a state of commotion when they are at peace, if you have this inquiry by the District Magistrate or through the Inspector of Police. Sir, there is a saying in our country that if you have no business, or if you have nothing to read, you go on coughing and disturbing people. If an inquiry is made by the Inspector of Police it will simply make the people believe that they are being unnecessarily harassed. An inquiry in such cases will cause needless annoyance to the people. I submit that if steps are to be taken they must be taken under 196A, and 196B should be omitted from the Code. With these words I propose this amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 48 was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I have been authorised by Bhai Man Singh to move the next amendment, No. 164, which stands against his name. It runs as follows:

"In clause 49, sub-clause (i), for the words 'the authority having power to order or, as the case may be, to sanction the removal from his office of such Judge, Magistrate or public servant' substitute the words 'the Local Government'."

Sir, under the old clause 197 of the existing Code the Judge or the public servant could not be removed from his office without the sanction of the Government of India or the Local Government and if he were accused as such Judge or public servant, the cognizance of the offence could not be taken without the previous sanction of the Local Government.

The Honourable Sir Malcom Halley: May I be excused for interrupting the Honourable Member? I do not know if anybody else wishes to oppose his amendment: I do not desire to do so.

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley (Home Member): I move, Sir:

"That in clause 49, sub-clause (ii), after the word 'substituted' the following words be inserted, namely:

'and after the word 'Judge' the word 'Magistrate' shall be inserted'."

The reason for this, Sir, is sufficiently obvious. The word "Magistrate" has dropped out in drafting this clause.

Mr. President: The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 49, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move that:

"In clause 50, in the proviso:

(a) For the words 'some other person' substitute the words 'a guardian or a close relative having care of such person.'

(b) omit the words 'with the leave of the Court'."

Sir, I beg to move both amendments (a) and (b) together. Under this clause 50, any person with the leave of the court could file a complaint on behalf of a minor or a person of unsound mind or a female or an idiot or any person who owing to sickness or infirmity cannot make a complaint himself. By my amendment, Sir, I provide that instead of 'some other person,' the 'guardian or a close relative care of such person' should file such a complaint, and that in the case of such a person, no leave of the Court should be necessary. I move my amendment.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 50, in the proviso:

'(a) For the words 'some other person' substitute the words 'a guardian or a close relative having care of such person, or an agent'."

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I do not think he moved the words "or agent".

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Yes, Sir, I did not move the word "agent".

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I do not think he moved it, Sir.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 50, in the proviso:

(a) For the words 'some other person' substitute the words 'a guardian or a close relative having care of such person'."

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I do not know whether it is really necessary to oppose this amendment. Let us consider for a short time what it really means. A guardian. What does my Honourable friend mean by a guardian, Sir? When we use the expression two or three sections later (in the proposed section 199A) we have indicated clearly what it means. Here we have the word "guardian" used without any qualifying word to indicate the meaning which is to be attached to it. Then, Sir, he goes on to say "a close relative". Who, Sir, is a close relative? Does the Honourable Member include a second cousin or step children? What does he mean by "close relative"? Really it seems almost useless arguing against an amendment of this character. He objects also to the provision in the Bill which enables the Court to give leave to the person who shall make the complaint. Why should he not do like my Honourable friend Mr. Rangachariar and trust our Magistrates? I would suggest, Sir, that there is no doubt that an amendment of this character should not be accepted.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 50 stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"That in clause 51 after the words 'said Code' all words from 'after the' to the words 'same section' be omitted, and that after the word 'absence' in the original section the words 'may with the leave of the court' shall be inserted and to the same section the following proviso shall be added, that is, that the leave of the court should not be made necessary in the case of persons except on a complaint under section 199 of the Code."

I therefore move this amendment.

Mr. R. A. Spence (Bombay: European): How will the section read as amended by this amendment? The Honourable Member has not read out the section as it would appear after amendment.

Mr. President: The section will read thus:

"In section 199 of the said Code, the following proviso shall be added, namely:

"Provided that where, etc."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: The reason why the Joint Committee made an amendment here in this respect was that the Lowndes Committee undoubtedly by an oversight provided twice over for the absence of the husband. In section 199 of the Code as it stands (and they left it unaltered), there was a provision that in the absence of the husband complaint may be made by some person who had the care of such woman on his behalf at the time when such offence was committed. The Lowndes Committee then provided also for the absence of the husband in the proviso, and for that reason the Joint Committee cut 'absence' out of the proviso and left it in the main section. The Joint Committee thought that we should have the leave of the court for making of a complaint by some person in the absence of the husband. The reason is very simple. The person having the care of the woman at the time the offence was committed may have interests which are entirely inimical to those of the husband. The Court will have to satisfy itself that there was an identity of interest between the person who desired to make the complaint and the absent husband. If no leave of the court is required in this case, there is, I think, a very grave danger of false charges being brought up by a person who desired to score off an enemy during the absence of the husband using the unprotected woman as his tool in the matter.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.
The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The other two parts of Amendment No. 172 fall out.

The question is that clause 51 do stand part of the Bill.
The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 52 do stand part of the Bill.
The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 53 do stand part of the Bill.
The motion was adopted.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, in moving the amendment which stands in my name, I am quite prepared to adopt the draft prepared by the Government. Namely,

"That in clause 54, for the proviso to the proposed new sub-section (1) of section 202, the following be substituted, namely,—'provided that no such direction shall be made unless the complainant has been examined on oath under the provisions of section 200, or (b) where the complaint has been made by a Court under the provisions of this Code'."

Mr. President: Do I understand that the Honourable Member is not moving the first part of Amendment No. 179?

Dr. H. S. Gour: I shall very briefly explain, Sir, what my amendment amounts to. I accept the alteration suggested by Government to clauses (a) and (b), and I simply suggest to the Government the advisability of adopting improvements which I submit I have made in the first clause, that is to say, in clause 54 (1), for the words 'thinks for reasons to be recorded in writing', substitute the words, 'for reasons to be recorded in writing, considers that there are grounds for thinking that the complaint is not true'. It is merely a drafting change, and I hope the Government will accept it also.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 54, sub-section (1), for the words 'thinks for reasons to be recorded in writing' substitute the words 'for reasons to be recorded in writing, considers that there are grounds for thinking that the complaint is not true'."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I regard this amendment of Dr. Gour's as slightly more than a matter of drafting; I think there is some substance in it, and in so far as there is substance in it, I think the House ought not to agree to the amendment being made. If Dr. Gour's amendment is embodied in the Code, it will prevent a Magistrate ordering an inquiry unless he can record in writing the reasons which lead him to consider that there are grounds for thinking that the complaint is not true. Sir, there are many cases in which the Magistrate really, on the complainant's statement, cannot make up his mind, cannot form an opinion even, whether the complaint is true or false. The complainant appears and makes a statement, but in some cases he cannot tell you much about the case—he says, 'the facts I have mentioned have been told me by my servants; they saw it during my absence'—and in that case, Sir, I think it would be rather hard to lay down that the Magistrate . . .

Dr. H. S. Gour: I am quite prepared, Sir, to accept the Government amendment in substitution of the whole of my amendment.

Mr. President: The question is that leave be given to the Honourable Member to withdraw the amendment which I have just put.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That in clause 54, for the proviso to the proposed new sub-section (1) of section 202, the following be substituted, namely,—'provided that no such direction shall be made (a) unless the complainant has been examined on oath under the provisions of section 200 or (b) where the complaint has been made by a Court under the provisions of this Code'."

The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I beg to move that in clause 54, sub-clause (1) . . .

Mr. President: The Honourable Member's amendment is covered by the amendment which Dr. Gour has just moved and which has been accepted by Government.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu (Godavari cum Kistna: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Not exactly, Sir.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: The Honourable Member has not heard the revised amendment which Dr. Gour has read.

Mr. President: The amendment which the House has carried is a different amendment to the one standing on the printed paper. It has just been unanimously carried by the House in view of the fact that Dr. Gour and the Government had come to an agreement.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, I beg to move that:

"In clause 54 (i) after the proviso to proposed sub-section (1) insert the following further proviso:

'Provided further that no complaint against any police officer shall be referred to any other police officer for inquiry'."

Honourable Members will find that under section 200 of the Criminal Procedure Code as soon as a complaint is made, the Magistrate has to take down the substance of the evidence and if he thinks it is a good case, he at once issues warrant or summons as the case may be. But if he finds any difficulty in coming to a decision, he has, after recording the substance of the evidence, to pass an order to the effect that a police officer or some Magistrate other than the Magistrate passing the order, shall make an inquiry. But I ask, Sir, in the event of the complaint being made against a police officer, is it in the ordinary course of business likely that an inquiry by another police officer into a brother officer's delinquency will be made in a fair and just way and the true inquiry report placed before a Magistrate? I therefore say, Sir, that when a complaint is made against a police officer it should not be inquired into by another police officer. And my view, Sir, is supported by a recent ruling of the Patna High Court, Volume No. 9 or 10. In that case, Sir, it has been decided very recently that a complaint of this kind made against a police officer ought not to be inquired into by another police officer, and it was held that a Magistrate was not justified in passing such an order of inquiry held by the police. In this particular case the complaint was found to be a true one; and the Patna High Court held that the learned Magistrate ought to have sent the case for inquiry to some other judicial officer. That being so, Sir, I suppose my friends will support me.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: May I ask the Honourable gentleman to read the ruling?

Mr. K. Ahmed: I am sorry the Government of India has not got it, and I am sorry at the same time that I could not carry it from my own library all the way.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 54 (1) after the proviso to proposed sub-section (1) insert the following further proviso:

'Provided further that no complaint against any police officer shall be referred to any other police officer for inquiry.'

The question is that that amendment be made.

Mr. President: I think the 'Noes' have it

Chandhri Shahab-ud-Din: Sir, may I take it that this amendment has been put to the vote without any Member being given an opportunity to speak and without the Government opposing it? I want to speak in favour of it. I think this is a scandal in the country and the Government should remove it. I can point out cases

Mr. President: Order, order. The Honourable Member must have observed that I looked round the Chamber and nobody gave any indication of getting up.

Chandhri Shahab-ud-Din: The usual practice is that after an amendment is moved the Government Member stands up to oppose or accept it. We are bound therefore to await and see whether the Government Member stands up or not and then we stand up. If Government does not want to oppose the amendment, I think we may take it that it is accepted ('Voices: 'No'); otherwise we stand up and support or oppose the amendment.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: Our action in these cases is intended to avoid wasting the time of the House. If I think an amendment is not going to gain support, I do not take the trouble of arguing it. I did not possibly assume that an amendment of this nature was likely to be supported by anybody.

Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din: Sir, I seek the leave of the Chair to support the amendment for reasons which are within my knowledge. There are District Magistrates in certain districts of the Punjab who have issued orders that all complaints against police officers should be sent to the District Superintendent of Police. I know of a district where a number of complaints were made against certain Police officers and all those complaints were made over to the Superintendent of Police. He sat over them and he never reported on them. When the police came to know who the complainant is either he does not appear or compromises the case. Justice requires that this should not be allowed to go on. I do not depreciate the services of the police. The Police Department is a very useful Department, but there are black sheep in that department as in all others, and I think the Government should not hesitate to protect the law-abiding and poor citizens from the machinations of certain police officers. Corruption is rampant in several districts in the Punjab and I think police officers are robbing right and left; and the civil authorities are helpless. In certain districts there is police rule and not civil rule. The civilians are very honest and upright. There is not that relation between the subordinate Magistrates and the civilian District Magistrates which exists between the District police officers and their subordinates. Therefore, the District police officers protect their subordinates, and consequently whenever there are complaints against the latter, the former do not pay much heed. Consequently it is only fair that whenever there is a complaint against a subordinate police officer it should be inquired into by a Magistrate or by some other authority, and not by the superior officer of the subordinate against whom the complaint is lodged. The proposed amendment is a very wholesome one and I request the House in the interests of justice to support it and thus protect innocent people from the police. Government should welcome such an amendment. If there are any complaints against the police, no one can maintain that they should not be inquired into. Then why should not, I ask, those complaints be inquired into by a Magistrate and why should those complaints be referred to the Superintendent of Police? He may sit over a complaint and may not submit his report, and the subordinate Magistrates have not the courage even to call for the reports. Sometimes they send reminders but they are not heeded. If the Government wants any information, I shall confidentially give some particulars. I request the House to support the proposed amendment very strongly.

Mr. R. A. Spence: Sir, may I, in the interests of justice, also ask that the floor of this House be not made the place for attacking the police when they are given no opportunity of refuting such attacks? The Honourable Member who just sat down has stated that he is able to produce definite cases. I say, if so, why does he not go to the competent authorities instead of coming to the Legislative Assembly and making this Assembly a place for absolutely unjustifiable and unwarranted attacks upon the people who exist for the protection of the interests of law-abiding citizens. I protest against this Assembly being made the place where attacks, such as we have just heard here, are made.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I rise to support the amendment moved by my Honourable friend Mr. K. Ahmed. It is very surprising that even such a modest amendment should not be allowed or accepted by the Government. On the contrary opposition is offered if we make any suggestions for improvement in the procedure. My Honourable friend, Mr. Spence, has given us a lecture on the point whether we should make suggestions and insinuations based on our own experiences of the working of the police in our Provinces. Sir, we make those remarks here and if the official Members who represent the Local Governments think those insinuations are not based on good grounds, it is certainly open to them to request the Member who makes them to give definite information on the point. But it is not clear to me that if a matter has been referred to a Court of Law and from the Court of Law that matter has been sent to the District Superintendent of Police for a report and if the report is not sent to the Court of Law, how can those complaints be made to the Government officers outside the Court of Law? The only proper procedure in these cases is to proceed to the Appellate Courts. We cannot approach the superior executive officers. Our suggestions are based on personal experience and surely a Member is allowed to put his experience before the House for the consideration of the other Honourable Members so that they may judge from their own experience whether or not the remarks of a particular Member are correct. As far as the question before the House is concerned, it goes without saying that, if a complaint is made against a police officer in 90 per cent. of cases the police officer to whom such complaint is made for inquiry will be inclined to believe a person of his own department rather than some one outside. We have seen here champions of the Services who champion their cause even in this House, so it is possible and probable that the officers of a particular department may be inclined to be partial to their own departments. Probably it will be a surprise to my Honourable friend, Mr. Spence, if I were to tell him of one case within my own experience which happened in my own district. A complaint was filed by a pleader of the district against a police head constable. The Magistrate issued a summons to that head constable for appearance in his Court and the District Superintendent of Police, through whom the summons on the head constable was to be served, refused to serve it, and wrote back on the summons: "I decline to serve the summons as no sanction has been taken from me under section 42 of the Police Act." When police officers can go to such a length to shield their officers . . .

Mr. E. A. Spence: Was he justified?

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I think he was not, and that order of the Superintendent of Police was criticised by the Sessions Judge and he was taken to task for it. Sir, when the Police Superintendents can go to such lengths to shield their officers, is there not a probability that these police officers may shield their subordinate officers in the inquiries also? Moreover, Sir, the inquiries that are made by the police officers are not made under oath. A man may go and say what he likes before a police officer and there is nothing to show that the report of the police officer is a proper and good one. Therefore I suggest that in 90 cases out of a hundred there is a possibility of justice not being done if the complaints against these officers are submitted for inquiry to the police officers. I submit that the amendment is quite an appropriate one and should be supported by everyone in this House.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I am sorry that we should have been led into a discussion on a very old theme. As 5 P.M. I said before, it is our custom, when we think that an amendment is not likely to be debated in the House, to avoid troubling the House with discussion; and it is for that reason that we did not proceed to argue the amendment of Mr. Kabeer-ud-din Ahmed. It has given an opportunity, however, to Mr. Shahab-ud-Din, speaking, I think, with added warmth, because he thought that he had been excluded from the discussion, to make a general attack on the police. He used language such as the machinations of the police; and the difficulties under which the ordinary man labours of securing justice owing to those machinations. He used in short language which on calmer reflection he would probably desire to modify. After all, I am sure that he, as much as other Members of this House, recognise the great difficulties under which the police work, the sterling good work which that force does, and the magnificent loyalty to Government which has characterised the police in spite of many unjust attacks and provocations during the last few years. It would have been welcome if at this late stage of our discussions on the Criminal Procedure Code we could have avoided these depreciatory references to the work of the police which some Members found themselves obliged to make when we were dealing more specifically with the police sections. General accusations of that kind prejudice the debate and add very little to the wisdom of our deliberations, nay, they tend to confuse the issues. I am not at the moment intending to pose as a champion of the police or of any other Service; I think it is unnecessary to say more than this, that the police work in this country, taking it generally and discounting all that you sometimes have to discount, is such that it entitles them to the gratitude instead of the condemnation of the general public. I shall say no more on the subject.

Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din: May I interrupt with a word of explanation? I am one of those who admire and have always admired the working of the police. I think they are to be admired for keeping peace and order in the country, and I believe that in the police force there are excellent officers, some of them very sympathetic, and they are indeed very useful both for the country and for Government. I referred only to those who were actually black sheep, and I do not think that Government or anybody else can maintain that there are not both good and bad people in the Police Force. We have got very good officers in the Punjab and most of them very upright and honest. I admire them and their work. Perhaps when addressing the House, I was excited or was a little misunderstood.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I was quite sure that Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din did not really wish by hasty expressions to prejudice the views of the House on the subject of this particular amendment; for after all it is only this particular amendment, and not the general attitude of the police that we are discussing. As he says, the police force, like every other force, contains its black sheep. It is unavoidable. The very large numbers of men that we have to employ, the somewhat poor pay that until recently we were able to give them, made that inevitable. I do not think that you can say with justice that the police contains more black sheep than the revenue or any other department. But, ought we to legislate in every case on the basis of the existence of some few black sheep in the department? Ought we so to frame our legislation that it takes account only of extreme possibilities, instead of providing a fair working rule for ordinary action under ordinary circumstances?

This amendment makes it impossible for any Magistrate to investigate through the police a complaint in which any police officer is concerned. Examine the implications of this. We will take it that a police officer has been charged with theft of Government property. The Magistrate desires to know more about the case; he is not able to let another police officer investigate even a case of this kind. Then again, we will take such cases as an assault by a constable. It may not be a grave offence. The Magistrate wishes to know more about it; but he cannot send it for investigation by a police inspector, and why? Because Mr. Agnihotri says that the police inspector will be inevitably so prejudiced in favour of the constable that he would not be prepared to make a fair investigation. Honestly, I think we ought to waive that kind of thing aside. We know that there are in the Police Force, as Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din has said, black sheep, but we also know that in the upper ranks at all events there are men whose lives and character would disprove at once such an insinuation as that put forward by Mr. Agnihotri.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I said there was a possibility. I never said that all police officers are like that.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: But, as a result, you rule out entirely investigations which may be very helpful to justice. I could understand that a Magistrate, where a case comes up which gravely concerns the local reputation of the Police Force, which has aroused a good deal of public attention, and which, if given against the police, might seriously affect their local prestige should hesitate to send the case for investigation by another police officer. That is obvious. And if he is a sensible Magistrate, he will not do so. But do not place on the Statute Book an amendment which would have the effect of ruling out the possibility of investigations which may give you correct and proper results merely because you are afraid that in one or two cases that system of investigation may be wrongly utilized by Magistrates. Let me again suppose—I will proceed with my illustrations—that a somewhat complicated case arises which a Magistrate desires to send to the police for further investigation. Is it realised that by an amendment of this nature you would prevent an officer of justice from utilising the services of the one trained detective agency which they have for the purpose? On a question like this, I think the House might very well leave the matter to executive instruction, and not place an absolute embargo, as the Honourable Member proposes to do, on investigation by the police in cases in which police officers are concerned. It might be left to the discretion of Magistrates not to send to the Police for investigation cases in which they know that the interests of the police are so much concerned that the investigation will not be a fair one. That ought to be sufficient.

Mr. Darcy Lindsay: I move that the question be now put.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, I think there is a good deal more in my friend Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed's amendment than meets the eye. The Honourable the Home Member has adverted to one aspect of the question, but he has not adverted to all aspects of the question. Let me present them to him. A Sub-Inspector of Police is accused of extortion and corruption before a Magistrate. The Magistrate refers the complaint for investigation to his superior officer, the Circle Inspector.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (and other Honourable Members):
Not necessarily.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Ordinarily: the Circle Inspector will order the villagers to appear before him and substantiate the complaint. The villagers meet and say "These are all birds of the same feather. He has taken a bribe to-day; that fellow will take it to-morrow. How are we going to appear before him and make a complaint at all?" It is not that the sub-inspector is corrupt; it is not that the circle inspector is unfair; but it is the widespread and popular apprehension in the minds of the public to go before a police officer to accuse his comrade. Surely, Sir, the Home Member could not be unaware of such a term as esprit de corps, and surely the police officers who discharge their duties in this country so efficiently on the whole do so because they possess that esprit de corps, and it may be, consciously or unconsciously there is a bias in favour of a member of their own service, and consequently, without going to the length to which some of the previous speakers have gone of saying that the police officers in investigating a case are consciously and perversely biased in favour of a brother officer, I make bold to say that there is an unconscious leaning towards a member of their own service, firstly, because they are members of their service and secondly because if the offence is brought home it would bring discredit upon the whole police force. Consequently, I submit it is in the interests of public justice that when an inquiry of this character is to be made it should be made by persons free from such prejudice or bias, or at any rate free from the suspicion of such prejudice or bias which witnesses must necessarily feel in a case of this character. Now it has been said by my Honourable friend the Home Member—he took a very apt illustration which certainly suited his arguments. Suppose, he said, a police officer is charged with the theft of Government property. But how many cases are there against the police for bribery and corruption, and how few cases there are of theft by police of Government property? We are dealing here with normal cases, not with a certain few individual stray abnormal cases. Now, Sir, there is no aspersion cast upon the police force; if such an aspersion is cast, it has been cast by the Statute law of this country. Is my friend, the Honourable the Home Member and his colleagues who adorn the Treasury Benches unaware of the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act which prohibit the making of a confession to a police officer, and any confession made to a police officer as inadmissible in evidence? Sir, some protagonists of the police may rise and say that it is an obnoxious provision, that it casts an unmerited slur upon the police force and that the Indian Evidence Act is an anachronism enacted as it was in 1872. But it is not against individuals that the provisions of that Act are directed; it is not against individuals that this amendment is directed; it is against a system and against a human weakness which surely members of the police force cannot be said to be innocent of. Surely, esprit de corps camaraderie and a friendly feeling does exist amongst the rank and file of the police and that makes for the solidarity of the force and for strength of character; and all that the Honourable the Home Member has said I echo as regards the services that the police force in this country is doing. But that is entirely wide of the mark. We are here concerned with a short and narrow issue, that if a police officer is accused before a Magistrate of an offence and the Magistrate thinks it necessary that it should be inquired into, whether it should go before another police officer for inquiry or before an independent tribunal. It is with this short question we are concerned, and I have no doubt, Sir, that the House will support this amendment.

Rai Bahadur G. O. Nag (Surma Valley cum Shillong: Non-Muham-madan): I move, Sir, that the question be put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"That in clause 54 (i) after the proviso to proposed sub-section (1) insert the following proviso:

'Provided further that no complaint against any police officer shall be referred to any other police officer for inquiry'."

Mr. President: I think the 'Noes' have it.

Mr. K. Ahmed: 'Ayes' have it.

Dr. H. S. Gour: We don't want a division.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Did you order a division, Sir?

Mr President: Honourable Members must make up their minds before I put the question a second time. The division must now proceed.

The motion was negatived.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: We are not concerned now with the police, we are concerned with Magistrates in my amendment.

My amendment reads as follows:

"In clause 54 (ii) after the word 'oath' insert the words 'and, may, if he thinks fit, allow the person complained against to attend his inquiry'."

Now Honourable Members will notice that clause 54 (2A) provides that "Any Magistrate inquiring into a case under this section may, if he thinks fit, take evidence of witnesses on oath". I propose that he may also, if he thinks fit, allow the person complained against to attend that inquiry.

[Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar.]

Sir, I know there is a practice in the Presidency Magistrate's Courts in Madras—I don't know how far it prevails elsewhere, that when a Magistrate does not issue process for compelling the appearance of the accused whom he wants to inquire into the truth of the case beforehand, the Presidency Magistrate always allows the accused person to be present in the inquiry which he makes under section 202. After all, it is the Magistrate who is examining and he is examining the persons on oath. I give it only as a discretionary power to the Magistrate, I don't say it should be done in all cases. If the accused asks for it, and if the Magistrate has no objection, he may allow him to be present. The object of his presence is this, because at this stage you are committing persons to certain statements on oath, and it is always the case that when a person against whom you give evidence is present, witnesses hesitate to speak lies, but when the person against whom you give evidence is not present, witnesses are prepared to tell any amount of lies, so that you will be safeguarding the interests of the persons against whom you will be giving evidence by allowing him to be present. If the Government do not agree to this, we are sure to lose the amendment, but if the Government accept it, I will be thankful to them.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I think it is only necessary in opposition to this amendment to read the sub-section as it will stand if the amendment is made. The sub-section will run as follows:

"Any Magistrate inquiring into a case under this section may, if he thinks fit, take the evidence of witnesses and may, if he thinks fit, allow the person complained against to attend his inquiry."

What, Sir, is the use of these words that my Honourable friend proposes to add to the sub-section? It is no use for his purpose at all. He himself has informed us that in Madras at present it is the practice for the person complained against to appear at the inquiry. As he says himself, Sir, it only gives a permissive power. Why, then, put it in? There is nothing whatever in the Code to prevent a Magistrate doing it without any words of this kind being added to the sub-section.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Sir, I rise to support the amendment. I have got magisterial experience and I know several Magistrates are in the habit of allowing accused persons to appear, and notices are issued to the accused if they wish to appear. But in some cases I know Magistrates have actually refused to allow the accused to take part in the proceedings even if they appeared in the courts of their own accord, and that, I think, is not right.

Mr. President: I cannot regard Honourable Member's argument as relevant. The amendment gives the discretion to the Magistrate.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Yes, Sir, if the discretionary power is given to the Magistrate, it will follow that as a rule they will have to allow accused to appear and that will safeguard their interests. I don't think that anything is lost by allowing the accused to appear when the witnesses are being examined in a preliminary inquiry.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 54 was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri Sir, I beg to move:

"To clause 55, add the following:

'And to the same section the following proviso shall be added, namely: provided that when the investigation or inquiry was made by police under section 202 the Magistrate shall before dismissing the complaint give an opportunity to the complainant to prove the complaint.'"

Sir, I need not say that the clause which I wish to insert becomes much more important owing to the defeat of the amendment of Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed. In its acceptance we will have one safeguard that in case a complaint against a police officer has been adversely reported on by another police officer, the complainant shall have an opportunity of adducing the evidence before the Magistrate and the Magistrate could then dismiss it if he found that there was no case against the police officer or he could continue if he found that there was a case against him. Apart from this, Sir, it often happens that, in cognizable cases where the police officer does not take cognizance of the offence, the complainant runs to the Magistrate and files a complaint against the accused and if in such cases the complaint is sent back to the police for inquiry, it will happen as it generally happens—that the police, in order to keep up their own opinion will try to substantiate their own previous report submitted to their officer for declining to interfere in that case, and will submit to the Court a report similar to the former. And, Sir, this will be avoided if this clause be inserted. Further as I pointed out before, that before the police officer the statement may not be given on oath or the complainant may not like to appear before the particular police officer or the witnesses may not state the truth, in which case it will be a very hard case for the complainant if his complaint were to be dismissed on the adverse report of the police officer. Therefore, I submit, Sir, that in such cases the complainant may be given an opportunity to prove or substantiate his case if he so likes. It might be argued, Sir, from the Government Benches that the very object for which this section has been inserted, will be defeated by allowing insertion of this clause. My reply to that will be, Sir, that the object was to do justice in all cases. And, if in certain cases the complainant finds that he has a grievance against the police officer, that his case was not properly inquired into by the police officer, why should he not be permitted to put in and adduce his evidence. If the complaint has been sent to a Magistrate for inquiry it would be reasonable not to allow and I also do not provide that the complainant should be given such opportunity. Because the subordinate Magistrate who, on being required by another Magistrate, inquires into such cases will examine the witnesses on oath and will have nothing to do with the cognizable or uncognizable nature of the case. Therefore, I submit that my amendment will be more desirable especially after the defeat of the amendment moved by Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, there are, I think, two simple answers to my Honourable friend's amendment. The first is this. The Magistrate has decided that he will have an inquiry made into the case. It means that he has doubts in his mind as to whether he ought really to proceed, because if he has no doubt in his mind, under section 201 he issues a summons at once for the attendance of the accused. He sends the case to be investigated. In this particular case we are dealing with, he has it investigated by the police. It is quite possible that in a case where the Magistrate already has doubts and sends the case to the police, the police will confirm those doubts and the Magistrate then proceeds to dismiss the complaint. Now, if we are going to lay down in our law that in every case where a Magistrate dismisses a complaint after reading the police report the complainant is to be allowed to come up and say: "we ought to have another inquiry by the Magistrate," what will be the result? The Magistrate will not send cases to be investigated by the police at all. He will say, "I am wasting time. I expect that the police report in this case will be hostile to the complainant. Therefore, why should I waste time by sending to the police when I shall have to do it over again myself? I will do it myself now." The other answer, Sir, is simply this. Honourable Members have, I think, in the debates on sections 202 and 203 overlooked the fact that the dismissal of a complaint is not necessarily the end of the matter. They have probably overlooked section 437 of the Code in which a High Court or the Sessions Judge can direct a further inquiry by the District Magistrate into the dismissal of a complaint under section 202. I think that in itself is a safeguard which is an answer to my friend's amendment.

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, no doubt the amendment does not seem to be very happily worded, because it is of a general character. But there may be two cases in regard to which this amendment may deserve sympathy. Those two cases are as follows:—Firstly, suppose a police officer, say a constable, has assaulted a private individual and the latter has lodged a complaint. That complaint has been forwarded to the police department. The officer who may investigate into the truth of that complaint may be an honest man. He may hold an inquiry in the right method. But yet there will be room for criticism that this complaint was against a constable or a police officer, that it has been forwarded to the Police Department, and that therefore justice has not been done to him. In order to meet that criticism it seems to me desirable that this amendment may be countenanced. The other case is this. Supposing there is a cognizable case, the complainant, who may be taken as an informant, goes to the police thana. He makes a report purporting to say that he has been robbed of his property or that a theft has been committed in his house or that his house was broken into. All these offences are cognizable offences. The police officer in charge of the thana or any other police officer competent to record that report does not hear him. He says 'Go to the Court.' The report is not recorded and he is forced to lodge his complaint. That very complaint has been forwarded to the police officer, perhaps the same officer who was in charge of the same thana where he went and he attempted to make a report and his attempt was not given a very favourable response. In that case that police officer, barring a few noble exceptions, will be the last person to hold that the complaint of the complainant is correct. If he arrives at that conclusion so far as the report goes then it will go against him to a certain extent. Therefore, in order to meet such sort of cases also, it seems very desirable that the Government Benches may very kindly give favourable consideration to this amendment, though it is of a very general character. On these two grounds I very seriously support this amendment with reference to those cases, which I have enumerated above before the House.

Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din: Though the amendment proposed by Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din has been lost, yet I fail to see any force in the amendment proposed by my Honourable friend Mr. Agnihotri. There is absolutely no force in his amendment. The words of section 203, as amended, do not make it obligatory for a Magistrate to dismiss a complaint after the receipt of the report but it is discretionary with him to do so. If after considering the statement made by the complainant and the report made by the inquiring police officer, the Magistrate thinks that in his opinion there is a good case for further investigation or inquiry, he is not precluded from ordering or holding it under the section. Therefore I oppose the amendment as unnecessary.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: The amendment as worded now is no doubt untenable but, I would, with the permission of the Mover of the amendment, make a slight alteration at the end of it: "give an opportunity to the complainant to show cause why the order of dismissal should not be made." The effect of this amendment will be this. If a complaint is made to the magistrate and forwarded to the police for inquiry and the police make a report to the magistrate, the magistrate dismisses it without the party knowing anything as to what was done by the police, that is, behind his back. What I suggest is that before passing an order, he should give notice to the party saying that the police have reported that the complaint has not been proved and asking the party to show cause why the complaint should not be dismissed. I think that is a salutary provision. The party will have knowledge of what has been done in the case. It may be that he will be able to convince the magistrate that the police inquiry has been perfunctory and there are reasons why the magistrate should try the case. I do not think he should be given an opportunity of proving the complaint. That would mean trying the case, but he should be given an opportunity to show that the police investigation has been perfunctory and that there are grounds why the magistrate should not act upon the police report. That would, I think, be the effect of my amendment.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved to the original amendment:

"Omit the words 'to the complainant' at the end and insert the words 'an opportunity to the complainant to show cause why the order of dismissal should not be made.'"

The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that the original amendment be made. The motion was negatived.

Clause 55 was added to the Bill.

Clause 56 was added to the Bill.

Mr. President: Clause 57.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: I rise to a point of order, Sir. In connection with this amendment No. 184 and the four amendments following,* my Honourable friend proposes an entire revolution of the procedure for inquiries before

* 184. In the beginning of clause 57 before the words 'In sub-section (2)', insert the following:

"To sub-section (1) of section 210 the following shall be added at the end, namely:

'and shall, at the same time, make an order committing the accused for trial by the High Court, or the Court of Session (as the case may be) and (unless the Magistrate is a Presidency Magistrate) shall also record briefly the reasons for such commitment.'"

185. After clause 57 a new clause be inserted to omit sections 212 and 213 of the Code.

186. In clause 57-A after 'Code' insert the following:

"the figures '210' shall be substituted for the figures '213' and."

187. After clause 57-A a new clause be inserted to provide that in section 216 of the Code the words 'and has been committed for trial' and also the words 'as have not appeared before himself' be omitted.

188. (a) To clause 58, sub-clause (1), add the following:

"and the words 'and examine' shall be omitted."

(b) For sub-clause (2) of clause 58 substitute the following:

"(2) Sub-section (2) of section 219 shall be omitted."

[Mr. H. Tonkinson.]

commitment. In order to bring that procedure into force, Sir, he proposes the deletion of two sections which are not touched by the Bill. The Bill, Sir, only touches very minor points in this Chapter, and I would submit, Sir, that these amendments are outside the scope of the Bill.

Mr. President: I ask the Honourable Member whether what Mr. Tonkinson has said in substance is actually his intention.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Yes.

Mr. President: Then I must uphold the objection raised by Mr. Tonkinson.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I think, Sir, I am right in proposing this amendment, because the Bill itself deals in clause 57 with section 210, and I have got a right, I think, to propose an amendment to section 210—and the other four amendments are consequential on the amendment which I propose in section 210. Section 210 is amended by the Bill, I think, therefore, Sir, I have got a right to propose further amendments in section 210

Mr. President: The amendment which the Honourable Member proposes to section 210 seems to me to be entirely outside the scope of the section to which he refers. But in any case the Honourable Member has admitted that his purpose is as defined by Mr. Tonkinson, and I am afraid I must uphold the objection put to me by Mr. Tonkinson.

Clause 57 was added to the Bill.

Clause 57A was added to the Bill.

Clause 58 was added to the Bill.

Mr. President: Clause 59. Dr. Gour.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, my amendment is intended to direct that in a charge the particulars of the charge should be set out. Honourable Members will see that clause (1) of section 221 of the Code of Criminal Procedure as at present enacted requires that every charge under this Code shall state the offence with which the accused is charged. Now there are a very large number of sections of the Indian Penal Code in which the general offence of rioting, unlawful assembly or hurt, grievous hurt and the rest are specifically designated as such offences. But there are numerous sub-clauses under those sections under which, as in the case of unlawful assembly and rioting the nature and object of the unlawful assembly and the nature and object of the riots may be different. In several reported cases of the High Courts,—I will only instance one, 83 Calcutta page 295—it was pointed out that in all cases of rioting and unlawful assembly particulars must be given in the charge of the nature and object of the members of the unlawful assembly or of the riot; and without such charge how is the accused to defend himself. In that case what happened was that the charge was framed that five or more persons have committed the offence of rioting. Now, what was the object of that unlawful assembly which committed the rioting? If you refer to section 141 and the following sections of the Penal Code you will find that a member may be a member of an unlawful assembly for various reasons and those reasons are as divergent as different sections of the Penal Code. Consequently, it happens in several cases which have been reported—I have only given one but I could give many more—it is found that the accused is tried upon one set of facts; he is charged generally for rioting or for being a member of an unlawful assembly. Subsequently there is a fresh development and he is convicted upon a very different set of facts to which he never adverted and upon which he never defended himself. The case goes in appeal and one of his grounds is that the whole case of the prosecution was based upon a certain set of facts upon which he never defended himself. He says, I now find that the prosecution have sprung a surprise upon me; in the charge nothing was said as to what was the unlawful purpose for which this assembly met and what was the unlawful object of this gang who committed the offence of rioting. It happens that the appellate courts set aside the conviction on the ground that the offence tried was different to the offence for which the accused has been convicted. That is unfair to the prosecution. They assumed all along that everybody knew what the accused was being tried for. It is unfair to the accused because he was under an apprehension that the prosecution had led evidence to prove a certain set of facts and that those were the facts upon which he has to defend himself. I therefore submit that it is in the interests of justice, in the interests of the prosecution and in the interests of the accused that the particulars of the charge should be set out in the charge sheet. It might be said on behalf of the Government that there is a provision in the existing law to set out the particulars of the charge and reference would conceivably be made to sections 222 and 223. I therefore refer to these sections. Section 222 says:

"The charge shall contain such particulars as to the time and place of the alleged offence and the person (if any) against whom, or the thing, (if any), in respect of which it was committed, as are reasonably sufficient to give the accused notice of the matter with which he is charged."

Now, this certainly does not meet the case. I will now read section 223. It runs as follows:

"When the nature of the case is such that the particulars mentioned in sections 221 and 222 do not give the accused sufficient notice of the matter with which he is charged, the charge shall also contain such particulars of the manner in which the alleged offence was committed as will be sufficient for the purpose."

Half a dozen people enforce a right of way. Half a dozen people on the other side also claim a right of way. There is a collision between these two opposing gangs and there is a fight. The object of one is the assertion of a right of way—a public right; the object of the opposing gang is defence of private property on the ground that the way is private and it is their exclusive property. All that section 222 enjoins is that the charge shall contain particulars as to the time, place and the persons committing the offence, and section 223 says that the charge shall contain the manner in which the alleged offence was committed. If these two sets of people used lathis the charge shall say that the rioting was committed by means of lathis. If they exchanged blows, the charge shall state that the rioting was committed by the exchange of blows. If there were any section which demanded that the particulars of the charge, the specific statement of facts which constitutes the offence should be shown in the charge, there would be no cases. The reported cases are far too voluminous for me to read before this House at this late hour. But I assure the House that if such a thing did exist in the existing law, there would not be so many cases as there are on the subject, and I, therefore, Sir, move the following amendment:

"In clause 59 before the words and figures 'In sub-section (7)' insert the following:—

'In sub-section (1) of section 221 of the said Code for the word 'state' the words 'specify particulars of' shall be substituted and '."

I consider it to be an improvement on the existing law, and I hope it will be passed.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, all that Dr. Gour has explained to the House is, I think, that Magistrates make mistakes and not that the Code is wrong. The provisions of the Code in sections 221, 222 and 223 are ample. I think there is no question about that at all. But, Magistrates following section 221 only frame incomplete charges. They do not regard the other sections and section 223 in particular which requires them to state such further particulars as may give reasonable notice to the accused of the offence with which he is charged. If my Honourable friend's amendment is carried, we shall have in section 221 a provision to the effect that every charge under this Code shall specify particulars of the offence with which the accused is charged, somewhat inconsistent with the next provision which lays down:

"If the law which creates the offence gives it any specific name, the offence may be described in the charge by that name only."

to which you have to add particulars as to the time and place, and the person, etc.

All the things that Dr. Gour would have put into the charge are already provided for in the Act by either section 222 or 223. All that the High Courts have to say is that the Magistrates framed charges wrongly, not that the law did not enable them to frame charges aright. I would suggest that the amendment be negatived.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 59 was added to the Bill.

Clause 60 was added to the Bill.

Clause 61 was added to the Bill.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, I move the adjournment of the House. It is 6 o'clock and the remarks which I have to make on clause 62 will take some time.

Mr. President: It is not in the power of the Honourable Member to move the adjournment of the House. He may offer reasons why the House should adjourn. If the Honourable Member assures me that he is going to make a long speech, I will adjourn the House.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Yes, I intend to make a long speech.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Saturday, the 3rd February, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Saturday, 3rd February, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock.
Mr. President was in the Chair.

MEMBER SWORN:

Mr. Andrew Gourlay Clow, M.L.A. (Industries Department: Nominated Official).

RAILWAY CAPITAL EXPENDITURE.

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: I lay on the table the information promised in reply to a question by Mr. P. L. Misra on the 17th January, 1923, regarding Railway Capital Expenditure.

As the Finance and Revenue accounts of the Government of India so far as Railways are concerned have been recast from 1920-21, references are given to the volume for that year. The details of the total capital expenditure to end of 1920-21 from different sources are given below:

	Rs. (Lakhs.)
Direct Government outlay	308,22
Capital contributed by Company's and Indian States	75,74
Grants from Famine Relief and Insurance	7,87
Grants from Imperial and Provincial Revenues	6,42
Liabilities involved in the purchase of Railways undischarged at end of 1920-21	124,90
Total	523,19

The Honourable Member's attention is invited to Account No. 74 (pages 280 and 281) of the Finance and Revenue Accounts of the Government of India for 1920-21.

The difference between the above and the figure of Rs. 558,32 appearing in Appendix 4 of Volume II of the Administration Report is largely due to the fact that while the figures in the Finance and Revenue Accounts represent the standing liability of Government on railway account, the figures in the Administration Report represent the capital cost of the Railways. Capital liability to the extent of Rs. 24,51 as shown in Column 12 of Account No. 74, on page 281 of the Finance and Revenue Accounts, has been redeemed through the operation of annuity and sinking funds.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

GRANT TO THE IMPERIAL INSTITUTE.

306. Mr. W. S. J. Willson: 1. Is it a fact that the Government of India decided to discontinue the annual Indian grant to the Imperial Institute with effect from the end of the present financial year?

2. Is it a fact that at the time when the Government decided to discontinue this grant the British Government and the Governments of the Dominions and other overseas countries of the Empire had decided largely to enhance their grants to the Imperial Institute?

3. Did the question of severing the connection of the Government of India with the Imperial Institute arise on the report of the Indian Industrial Commission, and is it a fact that no representative of the Institute was invited to give evidence oral or written to this Commission?

4. Did the Government receive a statement prepared by the Committee for India of the Imperial Institute, controverting the conclusions in respect of the Institute arrived at in the Report of the Indian Industrial Commission?

5. Did the Government, after the receipt of this statement, call for a report from Sir William Meyer, the High Commissioner for India, as to the advisability of continuing to subscribe to the maintenance of the Imperial Institute?

6. Are the Government aware that Sir William Meyer framed his Report without communicating with the Committee for India of the Imperial Institute, or the Director of the Institute, and without giving the representatives of the Institute any opportunity of being heard?

7. Are the Government aware that neither Sir William Meyer's Report nor any statement of the grounds on which the Government decided to discontinue the grant has been communicated to the Imperial Institute?

8. Have the Government received from the Association of British Chambers of Commerce in England a Resolution passed unanimously by that body in July 1922 regretting the decision of the Government of India to discontinue the annual grant to the Imperial Institute, and expressing an earnest hope that in view of the valuable work which the Imperial Institute has done for India, with which the British Chambers of Commerce have in recent years been closely associated, the Government of India will reconsider its decision?

9. Has the Government of India's attention been called to a similar Resolution passed by a majority of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of India and Ceylon at their annual meeting held in Calcutta on the 8th and 9th January, 1923?

10. Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table all the papers connected with the discontinuance of the grant, including the despatch of the Government of India to the Secretary of State for India dated 20th November, 1918; the reply to this despatch made by the Committee for India of the Imperial Institute on 24th November, 1919, and also Sir William Meyer's Report?

11. Do the Government, having regard to the requests of the Chambers of Commerce of the United Kingdom and of India propose to reconsider the decision to discontinue the annual Indian grant to the Imperial Institute, in the light of the testimony that has been furnished as to the value of the work of the Institute to India?

Mr. J. Hullah: (1) Yes.

(2) Yes with the exception of Australia and South Africa which were unable to grant any subsidy.

(3) No representative of the Imperial Institute was invited to give evidence to the Industrial Commission, but it was not as a result of that Commission's report that the Government of India decided to sever the connection with the Institute. In fact they had come to that conclusion 3 or 4 years before the publication of the Industrial Commission's Report.

(4) Yes.

(5) Yes.

(6) Yes.

(7) It is a fact that Sir William Meyer's report has not been communicated to the Imperial Institute. It is not a fact that no statement of the grounds of the Government of India's decision has been communicated to the Institute. The grounds of this decision were fully set forth in this Government's despatch to the Secretary of State for India, No. 9, dated the 29th November 1918, a copy of which has been seen by the Committee for India of the Imperial Institute.

(8) The Government of India have received the Association's Resolution, not from the Association itself, but from the President of the Associated Chamber of Commerce of India and Ceylon, and also from the President of the Indian Merchants' Chamber and Bureau, Bombay.

(9) Yes.

(10) The Government of India are not at present prepared to lay on the table the papers mentioned. They will however consider further whether these papers should be made public.

(11) The Government of India see no good reason to reconsider their decision.

INDIAN ARMY EXPENDITURE ON STORES.

307. Munshi Iswar Saran: (a) Is it a fact that the total value of stores such as provisions, forage, medical, ordnance, clothing, mechanical transport, animals, petrol, lubricants and miscellaneous stores required and consumed by the Indian Army during 1921-22 was about 10 crores and a half? If this figure be wrong, will Government give the correct figure?

(b) Is it a fact that the cost of maintenance of the Departments for storing and distributing these stores during 1921-22 was about 5 crores and 30 laes i.e., about 50 per cent. of the value of the stores? If this figure be wrong, will Government give the correct figure?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) No. On the assumption that by the "Indian Army" the Honourable Member means the Army in India, the correct figure is Rs. 18 crores.

(b) No. The correct figure is Rs. 5 crores.

INDIAN ARMY STORES MANUFACTURING DEPÔTS.

308. Munshi Iswar Saran: (a) Is it a fact that the cost of the maintenance of manufacturing depôts, inspection and testing of stores during 1921-22, was over 3 crores of rupees? If this figure be wrong will Government give the correct figure?

(b) Is it a fact that the value of the output of the Military Manufacturing Departments during 1921-22, was under 3 crores of rupees? If this figure be wrong, will Government give the correct figure?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) No. Rs. 38 lakhs, approximately.

(b) Yes. Rupees two crores 281 lakhs. This figure represents the value of articles turned out for the Army only.

The above answers are based on the assumption that the Honourable Member is referring to Ordnance and Clothing Factories only.

CONDEMNED MILITARY STORES.

309. Munshi Iswar Saran: Will Government state the total value of stores and equipment which were condemned or lost and the cost of which was written off and borne by the State during 1921-22?

Mr. E. Burdon: The total value of medical stores written off during the period in question is Rs. 1,17,339.

With regard to Supply and Transport Stores and equipment, the total value of stores written off by the Government of India during the year 1921 was Rs. 18,97,996. This figure does not include losses written off by General Officer Commanding, etc., under their financial powers, information regarding which is not at present available.

The value of marine stores (including coal) written off during 1921-22 was Rs. 67,179.

Particulars of ordnance equipment written off are being collected and will be communicated to the Honourable Member as soon as possible.

BRITISH ELEMENT IN INDIAN ARMY.

310. Munshi Iswar Saran: Will Government state if the direct and indirect cost of the maintenance of the British element in the Army in India of about 70,000 British officers and other ranks is over 42 crores while the cost of the maintenance of the Indian element of about 2½ lacs is about 23 crores? If these figures are wrong, will Government give the correct figures?

Mr. E. Burdon: The direct cost of the British Army in India is shown separately in the Budget, to which I would refer the Honourable Member. In that part of the Budget which relates to the Indian Army will be found figures of the direct cost of British officers and British other ranks; the figures for British officers include the cost of Indian officers holding King's Commissions. In order to ascertain separately the total cost of the British element and the Indian element in the Indian Army, it would be necessary to undertake a laborious compilation which could not be justified, and actually it would be impracticable to apportion correctly under these two heads miscellaneous charges such as contingencies, travelling allowances, staff charges and so on.

INDIAN MEDICAL OFFICERS IN REGIMENTS.

311. Munshi Iswar Saran: Will Government state the number of Indian Medical Service officers required for a regiment of 1,000 strong before and after the War?

Mr. E. Burdon: Before the war one Indian Medical Service officer was attached to each Indian regiment. Since the war the station hospital system has been introduced for Indian troops and medical officers are no longer attached to regiments. The strength of an Indian regiment both before the war and now is less than 1,000 men.

INDIAN ARMY SICK BEDS.

312. Munshi Iswar Saran: Is it a fact that sick bed accommodation at 5 to 12 per cent. of the strength making an average of over 7 per cent. for the whole Indian Army is maintained as against 5 per cent. of the pre-war days?

Mr. E. Burdon: No. Sick bed accommodation at 5 per cent. of the strength is maintained everywhere, except at Lahore, where 7 per cent. of the strength is maintained.

BED ACCOMMODATION IN MILITARY HOSPITALS.

313. Munshi Iswar Saran: Is it a fact that an average of about 50 per cent. bed accommodation in the hospitals in the Indian Army remains unoccupied? If this percentage be wrong, will Government give the correct percentage?

Mr. E. Burdon: 50 per cent. is an approximate average for the whole year, but during certain periods of the year, when the rate of sickness is high, the whole of the bed accommodation is occasionally required.

DUTIES OF I. M. S. OFFICERS

314. Munshi Iswar Saran: 1. Will Government state the average number of sick in the Indian Army which an Indian Medical Service officer does actually look after?

2. (a) Is it a fact that in a number of military hospitals—British and Indian—there are not more than 4 patients of minor ailments in charge of a medical officer?

(b) Are such medical officers given some other work by the Military Department and if so, what is the nature of the work so given?

Mr. E. Burdon: 1. The number varies widely according to the circumstances of different stations and different times of the year. It is impracticable to calculate the average with any degree of accuracy.

2. (a) No.

2. (b) Medical officers have much work other than the actual care of the sick in hospital, which is only a part of their duties. The work of a medical officer comprises the general medical supervision of troops, pathological investigation, and hygienic measures necessary to the maintenance of the health and the physical development of troops.

RETIRED INDIAN MEDICAL SERVICE OFFICERS RE-EMPLOYED.

315. Munshi Iswar Saran: (a) Will Government state the number of (i) European and (ii) Indian retired Indian Medical Service officers who are still re-employed?

(b) Are such officers in receipt of their full pension as well as the pay of the rank or the post which they hold?

(c) Will Government state the special reasons for the retention of such officers?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) to (c) No retired officers of the Indian Medical Service, European or Indian, are employed by the Government of India. It is understood that a retired European officer of the Indian Medical Service is employed by the Government of Bihar and Orissa in an appointment which is outside the cadre of Indian Medical Service appointments. The terms of his engagement are not known to the Government of India.

CHINA MURDER CASE.

316. Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: What are the correct facts of the case known in Delhi as the China murder case and what was the result?

BANIA MURDER CASE.

317. Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: What are the correct facts of the case known in Delhi as Bania murder case or uncle-nephew murder case and what was the result?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: In reply to Lala Girdharilal Agarwala, I propose to answer questions 316 and 317 together. Both the cases referred to in the question were very fully reported in the Press at the time. The brief facts and the result of the trials are as follows:

CHINAMAN MURDER CASE.

In this case a Chinaman, silk seller, was decoyed to the Public Works Department store godown at Chandrawal, by certain tonga drivers and there robbed and murdered with a kirpan. The clerk in charge of the stores was granted a pardon and turned approver. One Inayatullah and another man were convicted and sentenced to death while a third was acquitted by the Sessions Judge, Delhi. The High Court of Judicature at Lahore accepted the appeals and acquitted both the appellants on the ground that there was not sufficient corroboration of the approver's statement.

BANIA MURDER CASE.

In June, 1922, a Bania youth, named Ram Krishan, who was a cloth broker, disappeared. In July his body was unearthed by the Police in circumstances which led to the trial of his uncle, his cousin, and four other men (of whom two became approvers) on a charge of murder. The Sessions Judge, Delhi, convicted one of the four, and acquitted the remaining accused. The appeal is still pending in the High Court.

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

CANTONMENT COMMITTEES.

134. Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: What is the proportionate representation of owners of property (or their agents) on the personnel of Cantonment Committees framed under the Cantonment Act?

Mr. E. Burdon: The constitution of Cantonment Committees is determined by sections 3 and 4 of the Cantonment Code, 1912. No special provision is made for the representation of owners of property or their agents on those Committees.

CHAKRATA CANTONMENT COMMITTEE.

135. Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: What is the total number of members of the Chakrata Cantonment Committee and how many of them are owners of property within the said Cantonment?

Mr. E. Burdon: The total number is six. None of them owns property within the cantonment.

RENT IN CHAKRATA.

136. Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: (a) Is it a fact that the cost of labour and materials of building has increased in Chakrata Cantonment?

(b) Has there been any corresponding increase of rents of houses?

(c) Have rents decreased in any case?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) Yes.

(b) No; not as a general rule.

(c) No.

INDIANISATION OF THE ARMY

137. Rai Sahib Lakshmi Narayan Lal: (a) Have the Government got any programme of Indianisation of the army?

(b) If so, will the Government be pleased to give a definite idea as to the period in which that programme is to be fulfilled?

(c) If not, do the Government propose to consider the desirability of settling a programme for the Indianisation of the army at their earliest convenience?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) to (c) The attention of the Honourable Member is invited to the speech made by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief on the 24th January, in this Assembly on the Resolution moved by Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan, regarding the grant of King's Commissions to Indians.

TRAINING OF INDIAN OFFICERS.

138. Rai Sahib Lakshmi Narayan Lal: (a) Have the Government got any scheme for a proper machinery for the training of the Indian Officers for the army in this country?

(b) If so, what is the estimate for the scheme and when is the scheme likely to be given effect to?

(c) If not, do the Government propose to consider the desirability of having such a scheme and estimate prepared at their earliest convenience?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) to (c) The Honourable Member's question is answered almost entirely by the speech which His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief made in this Assembly on the 24th January, on the Resolution moved by Mr. Mohammad Yamin Khan, in regard to the Indianisation of the Indian Army. The total cost of the measures which have been adopted and are in contemplation for the training of Indians for a military career has not yet been fully estimated.

BRITISH ELEMENT IN IMPERIAL SERVICES.

139. Rai Sahib Lakshmi Narayan Lal: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state what is the minimum and maximum of the British element which they require in the Imperial services of the country?

(b) Have the Government got the minimum fixed as yet?

(c) If not, do the Government propose to consider the desirability of fixing such a minimum at its earliest convenience?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The issues raised by the Honourable Member will doubtless be considered by the Royal Commission, the decision to appoint which I announced in the House on the 25th January.

CURTAILMENTS IN BUDGET GRANTS.

140. Rai Sahib Lakshmi Narayan Lal: (a) Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a full statement of the amounts curtailed under each head on account of the curtailment of the amount of 9 crores of rupees by the Assembly in the last Budget?

(b) Could the Government keep their expenditure within the limits fixed by the said curtailment?

(c) If not, will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a full statement of the amounts spent in excess of the said limits under each head?

(d) Will the Government be pleased to state as to how the Government have been able to manage for the amount spent in excess of the said limits?

(e) If the said excess, if any, has been managed by loans, will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a full statement regarding the loans giving the dates, the amounts, the rates of interest and the creditors of the said loans?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: (a) The aggregate reduction made by the Assembly in the demands for grants presented in March last amounted to Rs. 95,72,000 and not 9 crores.

(b), (c) and (d) As the Honourable Member is aware, the Assembly voted in September last, a supplementary grant of Rs. 13,09,000 to which extent it was then estimated that the aggregate grant voted in March, 1922, would prove insufficient. It was expected, however, that the bulk of this excess would be set off by savings under non-voted expenditure.

(e) The revenue deficit in the current year has been met out of the borrowings of Government, but no portion of the latter has been specifically earmarked for this purpose. More recent figures of probable expenditure and information on the other points referred to by the Honourable Member will be available to the House when the Budget is presented next month.

SECRET SERVICE GRANTS.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): I ask your leave to make a statement to the House in regard to an answer I gave a few days ago to a supplementary question in regard to certain Secret Service grants. At the moment I forgot that there are two sources of expenditure namely, the Director of the Central Bureau of Information, and the Director of the Intelligence Bureau.

I stated that the Secret Service funds under discussion were part of the votable expenditure that was audited. I was thinking at the time of the regular expenditure of the Director of the Central Bureau of Information; this is voted and is audited. The Secret Service funds, which are controlled by the Director of the Intelligence Bureau, are not audited and are not part of votable expenditure. I am sorry that in answering the question, I did not keep these two cases separate in my mind; and I have thought it proper to give the House the correct information on the subject at the earliest opportunity.

HIGH COMMISSIONER IN ENGLAND.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, before asking the question of which I have given private notice, may I with your permission, Sir, convey to the Government of India through the Honourable the Commerce Member our thanks for having appointed an Indian to the high office of High Commissioner in England, and for having made an excellent choice. Sir, the question of which I have given notice is this: What is to be the pay of the new High Commissioner in England?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member): With your permission, Sir, I will thank Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar for the remarks he has made. I need only say that we are quite satisfied that we could not have made a better selection for this high office.

As regards Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's question, the answer is that the salary of the post has been fixed at £3,000 per annum.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: What was the pay of the late High Commissioner, and had he a pension in addition to the pay?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: His pay, Sir, was £3,000 per annum and he did not draw his pension in addition.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, as my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, has made a reference to the appointment of an Indian as High Commissioner, may I, on behalf of the National Party, also express our gratitude to the Government for the appointment of an eminent Indian to the post of High Commissioner. And I may also add that in the opinion of the National Party there is hardly an Indian more fitted for the post in the whole of India than Mr. Dalal.

THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BILL.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member):
Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill to define the liability of employers in certain cases of suits for damages brought against them by workmen, and to provide for the payment by certain classes of employers to their workmen of compensation for injury by accident, be taken into consideration."

Perhaps, Sir, I may remind the House of certain points which I brought to their notice when I introduced this Bill in September last. The first point I desire to make—or rather, to re-affirm, is that this is no piece of hasty ill-considered legislation. The Government of India indeed have had this legislation under continuous consideration for the last 3 years. In 1921 we put to Local Governments and to the public certain provisional conclusions. We received a very large number of replies to that circular and those replies disclosed the fact that all over India there was complete acceptance of the principle of legislation of this kind and almost complete unanimity of opinion that the time had come to introduce this legislation. It is easy enough, Sir, to agree to the principle of legislation of this kind. It is only when we get to the details that the real difficulties begin, and that is why in July last we assembled a preliminary Committee. I think I may say that it was a strong Committee, a Committee upon which employers and workmen were adequately represented. We placed before the Legislature a Bill based upon the recommendations of that Committee and that Bill has again been circulated to all Local Governments and to the commercial public. I think I may claim again that the Bill has had on the whole a very favourable reception, but I do not wish to be misunderstood. I do not claim that the Bill is in any way a perfect measure. On the contrary, I realise that many clauses of the Bill are open to criticism. But what I do claim is that the Bill is an honest carefully thought-out attempt to adapt to Indian conditions a very difficult piece of legislation; and I think also that I can claim that the Bill is an earnest of the Government of India's desire to undertake progressive legislation of this kind when we are satisfied that it is right to do so. There are one or two points now that I will ask the House to remember.

In the first place, the Bill in many of its clauses represents a compromise between interests which, in a matter of this kind, must conflict. I refer to the interests of the employer, on the one hand, and the workpeople on the other hand. Our policy in that matter has been to endeavour to hold the balance between these two conflicting interests to the very best of our ability; and I think I may claim that as a result of that policy we have been able to carry employers with us in a very remarkable way. In fact, nothing has surprised me more, and nothing has pleased me more than the extraordinarily generous reception that this piece of legislation has met from employers all over India. And I will make the further point that in social legislation of this kind it is a matter of the greatest importance to carry your employers with you instead of trying to impose legislation upon unwilling employers.

The next point I desire to emphasise is the serious responsibility that the Government and the Legislature incur in this legislation. The experience of workmen's compensation legislation in all countries has been that it has led to a very great amount of litigation. We have always to keep that danger before us—we have had it before us throughout in drafting the Bill. We have so attempted to draw the Bill that an employer and a workman, merely on reading the Bill, may know where they stand.

The employer will know his obligations; the workman will know his rights. It is that consideration which accounts for many of the features of the Bill which have no doubt attracted notice. I refer to such facts as that we have relied upon the principle of relationship rather than dependence and the proof of dependence. It is also seen in the machinery we have provided for the settlement of disputes. The policy of the Bill is that all cases arising out of the Bill must first be settled if possible by agreement between the parties. It is only if the parties themselves cannot arrive at an agreement that we provide machinery for the settlement of those disputes. We have tried to make that machinery as simple and as inexpensive as possible. There is yet a third point which I wish to impress upon the House. I think we have got to be careful in legislation of this kind that we do not impose too heavy a burden upon industry. We have got to remember that the provisions of this Bill will apply not merely to large employers of labour but also to small industries; and I think that at the present time when industries have not advanced very far in India and when we hope that they will now begin to advance we ought to refrain from imposing upon these industries a burden which may have the effect of stunting and retarding their growth and development. I move, Sir, that the Bill be taken into consideration.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadden Rural): Sir, I feel my first duty is to congratulate the Government of India and my friend, the Honourable Mr. Innes upon producing a measure of such a beneficent character. The Honourable Mr. Innes told the House that this is not a hasty piece of legislation; that is perfectly correct. The Government of India have taken a great deal of pains over this measure for over two years. The close investigation which they have applied to this subject, which is no doubt of a very technical character, has been thorough and comprehensive; I also believe they have consulted public opinion both from Local Governments and from the industries concerned to a degree which is noteworthy in this piece of legislation. Then again, Sir, as the Honourable Mr. Innes told us, we are glad to hear that this measure is an earnest of similar beneficent legislation for the welfare of the labouring classes. Indeed with the advent of machinery into India the chances of accidents to workmen grew a good deal, and it is but natural that in the wake of machinery there should come legislation which safeguards the interests of workmen from such accidents. Sir, I think I must make it clear to the House that this Bill affects not only employers in private industries, but, I believe, it affects even the State as employers in certain concerns, for instance, in Telegraphs, and Railways, Port Trusts and similar concerns; also it affects municipalities. It is, therefore, a sign of good spirit and a sense of fairness on the part of Government that along with other employers they are also coming forward to share their liability and the responsibility in the application of this Bill. The Honourable Mr. Innes told the House that the employers consulted by Government have been able to go a great length in meeting the interests of workmen. I am very glad to hear it. It only proves that in matters which concern the real welfare of the working classes, the employers, whether private or State, take up a very fair attitude in these matters. Then again it will be seen that those industries have been roped in which are organised and in which the hazard to the workmen is particularly peculiar and of a dangerous character; further, I believe the Bill takes another precaution, namely, to see that points in dispute between the workmen and the employer will be as few as possible. Indeed every section, every sub-clause has been thoroughly threshed out and so far as the workman is concerned every facility is thrown in his way, so that the procedure will not be complicated for the workman to get his right and obtain the relief for which this Bill is intended.

Although, Sir, on the whole the general provisions of the Bill are good, there are some points which, I recognise, may be found wanting in this from the point of view of certain people. I do think one or two points which really speaking should have been included in the scope of this Bill have not been included. I may instance one or two of such points. One was the case of Indian seamen. Under the present Bill probably Indian lascars will not be able to get a relief easily if an accident happens to them on the high seas or if the lascars happen to be employed by shipping companies under the British Shipping Registration Acts. That is a difficulty which we all felt in the Joint Committee. The Indian seaman, if he is to get relief not under the Indian Workmen's Compensation Act, but under the English Act, will find it extremely difficult to lodge his claim in British Courts and to obtain the relief, say, in London. I believe that in this matter this present Bill does not go as far as it should go. It is extremely difficult for an Indian lascar, for instance, to seek relief and get compensation by putting in a claim in a court in London; the question of jurisdiction and the alternatives for relief which he has under the Indian Act and the English Act were points so technical, I believe, that those who framed this Bill had to give a wide berth to them and to leave the difficulty unsolved. If some of my lawyer friends can suggest a solution for this difficulty I think the House would be grateful.

There is one more point to which I wish to refer, and that is that along with the Workmen's Compensation Bill there will come to India I hope a new social order, a new era for the workmen; I daresay they will try to be more organised than they are now. It would be a very good thing indeed from the workmen's point of view if this new social era is opened up to him; along with this there will also come I am sure another feature, namely, Insurance Companies will have to frame schedules and a sort of system of insurance to cover the liability of employers. The point which I wish to bring to the notice of the Government in this connection is this: in all other countries where Workmen's Compensation Acts have been in force, I believe insurance in some form or another has been an invariable accompaniment. The question here will be when insurance companies frame their schedules whether Government will exercise some sort of supervision over their rates of premia. Speaking from the point of view of employers and those who will have to cover the risk, I do think the State will have to exercise some sort of supervision over the insurance companies' rates. After all the compensation which will be paid on behalf of the industry to the injured workman will fall on the industry and just as in other countries there is a sort of supervision over the insurance companies, I believe even here the State ought to exercise some sort of supervision. Indeed in other countries the methods of insurance are different from what they probably will be here. In America, for instance, there is a State fund for insurance. In Italy, Switzerland and other countries there is a compulsory sort of insurance; not so in England, I know. But there, there is definite supervision on the part of the State to see that the Insurance Companies do not charge extraordinary rates of premium for the industry. In fact, definite percentages have been laid down, so that out of the total premium received so much shall be for the management of the Insurance Companies and no more, and the rest shall go towards the benefit of the insured. That sort of thing, I believe, will have to be done by the State even here.

There is one point, Sir, to which I wish to refer, namely, the machinery that has been set up for the carrying out of the provisions of this Bill. In order that there should be cheap and expeditious justice and settlement of claims, this Bill sets up a Commissioner for dealing with the Workmen's Compensation Act provisions. Now it is indeed a great convenience, that all disputes should be referred and all points should be settled by this Commissioner. So far as the expedition in the settlement of disputes is concerned, it is a great convenience. On the other hand, it must be recognised that a great deal will depend on the personnel of these Commissioners and the spirit in which they work the provisions of this Bill. Well, if they work the provisions in a good spirit and hold the balance even between the employers and the employes, I believe the justice which they will deal out will be very good. But, on the other hand, I do feel that the provisions of this Bill give the Commissioner a very large amount of power, and it depends upon him to work those provisions in a proper, just and equitable manner. However, we are making this as an experiment, namely, centring of this power into the hands of the Commissioner alone. That will be an experiment which shall be tried in the first instance. Just as in England the workmen's compensation has gone through a process of evolution and it has been amended on various occasions, probably here also in the light of experience gained we shall have to amend our own provisions. But I bring it to the notice of Government that in appointing the Commissioners and leaving to them the sole duty of settling disputes between the employers and the employees they should see that, after all, the spirit in which the Commissioners work this Bill should be a spirit of absolute even-handed justice between the two conflicting interests. Otherwise, I must say that the powers which we have entrusted in the hands of these officers will have to be greatly curtailed in the light of the experience which we may gain. I do hope the House will give its warmest support to this Bill both in the interests of workmen as well as the industry. This is, I say again, a very beneficent measure and I accord my warmest support to it, and once more thank the Government for having brought out a Bill of such a character for the first time in India.

Mr. N. M. Joshi (Nominated: Labour Interests): Sir, may I also, with your permission, congratulate the Honourable Mover of this Bill on the beneficent measure which he has placed before this Assembly. I do not wish to speak on those provisions of the Bill which will be discussed here in detail. I shall refer only to a few sections which have been omitted by the Joint Select Committee and upon which I shall have no opportunity hereafter to speak. The sections to which I refer are sections 3, 4 and 5 of the original Bill defining the liability of the employers in the case of certain accidents. Sir, I feel that these sections in the Bill ought not to have been omitted by the Joint Select Committee. In the first place, the Committee which was originally appointed by the Government and which my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, said was a very strong Committee, had approved of those sections. Sir, I am also of opinion that the Committee which considered originally this Bill, excepting one of its members, was indeed a Committee of experts. I am therefore surprised very much that the Joint Committee should have omitted those sections altogether, and this omission, in my opinion, is a great defect.

[Mr. N. M. Joshi.]

Sir, I need not remind the Members of this House that the principle underlying the Workmen's Compensation Bill and the principle which underlies what is called the Employer's liability are quite different. In the case of workmen's compensation the principle is that when a man introduces certain industries which involve risks to others he should be held civilly liable for those risks. In the case of workmen's compensation, therefore, there is no question of the negligence or fault of either the employers or the employes. The workman receives compensation because it is in the interests of the industry that he should receive compensation and because the risks which cause the accidents are incidental to the industry. The principle of the employer's liability sections which were originally included was that where an employer was negligent under certain circumstances and had failed to make proper provision to safeguard safety of the workmen, he should be held civilly liable for damages. Sir, this principle of employer's liability has been accepted in England since the year 1880. It is now more than 40 years, therefore, that this legislation defining the employer's liability has been in existence in England. I am, therefore, surprised that the representatives of the Government of India on the Joint Committee should have yielded to the majority of the Joint Committee in this matter. This omission will be particularly felt by those employes who are somewhat educated and better paid. In the case of an ordinary workman, I do not think he would ever think of going to the Civil Court for damages, even though the negligence of the employer may be very clear, because action in a Civil Court is more costly and there are several other difficulties if he takes up that course. But in the case of better paid employes, who are also educated, if it is clearly shown that the employer has been negligent, those employes should have the right to go to the Civil Court. Sir, I therefore feel that the Bill in this respect is clearly defective, even the sections in the original Bill were not quite satisfactory. If I had my way, I should have extended the employer's liability to all workmen, but in the original Bill it was applicable only to those classes of workmen who are governed by the Workmen's Compensation Bill. But even though those sections were deficient, the Joint Committee thought it fit to omit them. With these remarks, Sir, I offer my congratulations to the Honourable Member on having introduced this measure.

Captain E. V. Sassoon (Bombay Millowners' Association: Indian Commerce): Sir, when the Bill which is now before this House was brought to the attention of those members of the Millowners' Association, including myself, to whom the matter had been referred, with one exception we declared that the Bill was a bad Bill. We considered that it had sacrificed principle for expediency and that the Legislature and its Committees had shown a complete lack of vision in their attempt to deal with this most important development in the industrial progress of this great country. We felt that, rather than that such an emasculated measure should take its place on the Statute Book, we would prefer the subject to be studied afresh to enable a Bill to be put forward which would more nearly approach the problem from a modern western standpoint. The exception to whom I have referred, Sir, was my predecessor in this House, Mr. Saklatvala. Mr. Saklatvala, suggested that, before the Committee gave a definite opinion, it might allow him to impart to me as his successor to this House the information on this subject which he had been able to gather through his work on the Select Committee. This he proceeded to do by sending round those weighty packets of files which Members of this House are so intimate with. Sir, by dint of burning much midnight oil, I succeeded in acquiring some faint glimmerings of the difficulties of the subject and the attempts that the Select Committee had made to deal with it; with the result that, when we met again, I found it necessary to inform my Committee that my views had altered and, so far from this Bill being a bad Bill, hastily thrown together with no regard to the problem and its needs, I considered that this Bill though there was hardly a clause which could not be amended or debated on and justifiably so was still an extraordinarily carefully thought-out piece of work in its main lines and designed to act as a solid foundation on which future developments could be built as experience dictated. My Committee was good enough to approve our views and I stand here to-day on behalf of the millowners of Bombay to welcome this Bill as a first step and an experiment, appreciating the fact that in passing this measure the labours of the Government and of this House will have only begun with their desire to deal with a subject which I confidently say all classes, whether ruling, employing or employed, wish to see handled sympathetically, adequately and practically.

Sir, the view that I take of the problem is that there are certain basic aims which should be always before us, even though they may not be immediately practicable: Firstly, that those who fall by the wayside in the industrial fight for existence, through no fault of their own, should be adequately cared for; secondly, those truly dependent on them should not be asked to bear the full brunt of the blow due to the incapacitation of the breadwinner, but at the same time should be encouraged to help themselves so as not to become pauperised; thirdly, that a generous scale of benefits should be provided at the lowest possible cost. And this, Sir, leads one to certain practical considerations that are of vital importance. Every workman who takes compensation by a fraudulent claim or by malingering, every workman who does not take advantage of offers to be cured speedily and delays or aggravates an injury, often turning a slight temporary disability into a serious permanent one, every workman who is allowed, or in any way encouraged, to exaggerate his disability, thus bringing into play those vast and little-known forces of auto-suggestion and so prolonging or intensifying his injury, everyone of these, Sir, by receiving compensation which should not be necessary is adding to the total cost of compensation, and thus either reducing the benefits to the genuine cases or adding unnecessarily and unjustifiably to the general cost of living; for I need hardly tell this House that the payment of compensation, as one of the costs of production, has eventually, in part at any rate, to be borne by the consumer. There is also another important consequence to be considered. If the workman be encouraged to dwell on any slight ailment in the hope that it may develop into something that may justify compensation, his character will be affected, his moral fibre undermined and his value as a man and citizen depreciated. I am afraid that a study of the effects of the Workmen's Compensation Act in England leads one to wonder whether a hysterical unbalanced trait has not been developed in the national character which was not so prominent in the past.

Now, Sir, as regards the Bill before us, I would suggest that it be strengthened in every way to reduce the possibility of fraud, malingering and lastly litigation, even at the risk of appearing unsympathetic. The passing of this Bill will make one thing certain and that is, it will greatly increase the demand for doctors. If this Bill results in encouraging the young

[Captain E. V. Sassoon.]

Indian to take up a medical career in preference to a legal, I for one should consider this as an additional point in its favour. Honourable Members will consider that I am unduly prejudiced against lawyers but I cannot forget the remark that was once made by Voltaire, who said that he only regretted going to law twice, once when he lost his suit and once when he won it. Sir, it is a great deal more valuable to the country that an injured workman should recover his health than that he should win a suit and get good compensation for his injuries, and I commend this point of view to the Honourable and learned Members of this House when they are about to decide on a suitable career for their sons.

In conclusion, Sir, any legislation which succeeds in satisfying the general aims I have so roughly sketched would prove, I think, immeasurably superior to similar legislation existing in other countries, no doubt partly owing to the fact that there was so little practical experience in existence when those measures were instituted and partly because they started by legislating on too ambitious a scale. Let us profit, therefore, by their mistakes and develop our programme by steady evolution. I venture to assert that by following that road the eventual results of our efforts will make them worthy of being copied by those western nations who admittedly lead to-day the cry of the injured workers.

With these words, Sir, I welcome the Bill before us.

Sir Deva Prasad Sanyal (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban). Sir, I welcome Captain Sassoon's suggestion that we should have more doctors and better doctors, if necessary, at the sacrifice and expense of the lawyers. I have a double-barrelled personal consideration: less lawyers will give us existing lawyers a better chance and more doctors will be welcome to me because I am trying to nurse a race of doctors. I wonder, Sir, why, having said all that Captain Sassoon has said, I do not see any amendment tabled by him on lines brought out by him that I should have welcomed, viz., that the Commissioner to be appointed by the Act should have a medical referee associated with him in some effective way. Much of the difficulties, even if you otherwise succeed in keeping down litigation, much of the difficulties that will be experienced in the working of this Act will disappear if there be independent and reliable medical opinion to balance that on behalf of the employer and of the workman, if the latter can afford it. Doctors are notorious for difference of opinion and, when diversity of interest is at stake, that difference is likely to be accentuated. Therefore, I should have welcomed some provision by which the Commissioner who is invested with large and salutary powers, had a capable Medical Referee to fall back upon so that the workman and the employers would be better protected. The Commissioner would also be better able to do his work by falling back on those who can give him independent medical advice. I appreciate, Sir, there are difficulties in the way of this being done everywhere. Industries are expanding in this country and it may not be possible everywhere in the outlying tracts of the country to have suitable medical referees. But a first beginning might have been made. This is a first step, a very important and very good first step, towards healthy labour legislation. I believe in treating labour well both from the humanitarian and State point of view as well as from the point of view of expediency. Labour better treated is always good from the investor's point of view and the Government are realising and the people who are supporting them are realising that labour should be better treated before labour organisers for the purpose of extorting protection as in other countries. I am unable, however, to share Mr. Joshi's regret that the employers' liability question has not been mixed up with the question of workmen's compensation for slow development is healthy in these matters. Well, we have had, to borrow Mr. Rangachariar's classical phrase, homilies preached in many quarters that when a Committee of this House goes into a question thoroughly, it is not up to this House to bring up questions in detail again and have them thrashed out as if the whole House was again going into Committee. Paragraph 3 of the Joint Committee report fully deals with the point which Mr. Joshi has raised. The position taken up there is I believe technically doubtful, it is doubtful whether a Select Committee can pick and choose like this. I should like however to wait and see how this Act works and what developments may be necessary. If, Sir, in 1886 or later on we had taken up the question of codification of the law of torts which has been waiting since then, some of our difficulties might have been at an end. It is no use regretting that now. But in the absence of that, these first piecemeal steps are becoming necessary and they will have to expand as we grow. With these words, Sir, I should like to give a very warm welcome to this measure and express the hope that the machinery for insurance will develop under Government care. Without it an Act like this cannot properly work if the employer and the employed are to be protected.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, there can be no two opinions about it that the Bill is of a very useful character and I share the view that the Government may be thanked for the introduction of this measure. My study of the Bill leads me to believe that some of the provisions, no doubt, in some cases, will offer temptations to labourers to abuse the provisions of this Bill. But at the same time I feel that there are some sections which will give a great amount of encouragement to labourers to flock to our factories, and consequently, eventually, there will be a great aid to the industrial development of the country. The most important characteristic of this Bill, as it seems to me, is that it is a measure which has got the sympathy both of the employers and the employees. I can hardly come across any measure, in regard to which either the one party or the other party has not got a serious complaint. But, as I have said before, this is a Bill which has got, more or less, the approbation of both sides, and therefore the Government and the Honourable Mover must be thanked for it. There have been some remarks in regard to the introduction of work for Doctors and it has been said that there will be some sort of reduction, so far as the work of the legal practitioners goes. In reply to that I may say that in the first place we do not grudge it. We have got ample work. But I may tell you, for your information, that there is a provision in this Bill—section 80—which allows a great loophole. There is a provision for appeals in this section and lawyers will have a sufficient share in that direction. I must say in the end that I appreciate all the remarks which have been made in favour of this Bill as a complete Bill, but I have got to differ from the Honourable Mr. Joshi, when he says that it is not comprehensive in its character. This is a tentative measure and when we see that our workmen have proved themselves fit and up to it, then we may extend the provisions of this Bill to some other class of labourers. But for the present, circumstanced as we are, this is a complete answer to the requirements of the country. With these remarks, Sir, I support the motion very heartily.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I do not rise to speak on the Bill, but I ask your ruling upon a very important matter which the Bill as put before this House raises. It is this. When the question was discussed before the Bill went to the Joint Committee, the Bill contained provisions relating to employers' liability as well as to the compensation to be paid by employers. This House then approved of the principle of both those objects, namely, employers' liability due to negligence and compensation due to accident. After the Bill has been considered by the Joint Committee, it comes to us in a denuded form. The portion relating to the liability of employers due to negligence has been cut out; and the result is that this House is not in a position to discuss a matter for the principle of which it had given its sanction before committing the Bill to the Joint Committee. My question to you is this. Is it open to a Joint Committee to which a Bill containing two principles has been submitted, to cut out one of the principles and thereby make it impossible for the House to give its opinion upon that principle? That is the point which I submit for your consideration.

Mr. President: Having no notice of the point of order which the Honourable Member wishes to raise I have not yet had time to give mature consideration to it. I have not the original Bill before me. The Honourable Member will see that the last clause in the report of the Joint Committee says:

"We think that the Bill has not been so altered as to require re-publication, and we recommend that it be passed as now amended."

But I must assume, until I am able to give it further consideration, that the Joint Committee would not have inserted the last clause unless they had been satisfied that the Bill was not altered in the manner the Honourable Member suggests. I notice that there were several prominent lawyers on the Committee, one of whom is sitting beside him; and I should imagine that if the Bill had been so altered, the eagle eye of his Honourable colleague from Madras (Mr. Rangachariar) would not have allowed the point to escape him.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: I had the consent of my Honourable friend from Madras to make this motion. I consulted him about this. The title of the Bill also has been altered. The point which I raise for your consideration, Sir, is this. Is it open to a Joint Committee to give up a principle without that principle being submitted for the consideration of the House? The original title of the Bill was "Employers' Liability and Compensation." That has been altered into "Workmen's compensation." They have cut out a particular portion of the title itself, and they have cut out the provisions of the Bill which related to employers' liability thereby making it impossible for this House to give its decision upon those provisions. It is a difficult point and I think it is a point which must be decided because on future occasions a similar question may arise; and it is desirable that the House should have your guidance in a matter of such importance, namely, where the House has approved of certain principles can the Joint Committee omit one of those principles making it impossible thereby for the House to express its opinion thereon. That is a very serious problem, and if it is submitted to it may lead to grave complications. Therefore, Sir, it is desirable that there should be a definite and decisive ruling upon the point. Paragraph 3 of the Joint Committee's report says:

"Perhaps the most important alteration which we have made in the Bill is the elimination of the provisions relating to employer's liability. The majority of us are not satisfied that it is either necessary or wise to retain these provisions in the Bill. It has not been demonstrated" and so on. So, by a majority the Joint Committee have come to the conclusion that this portion should be omitted from consideration. It may be that the minority there may find support in this House; but the result of this deletion is that this House is debarred from going into those provisions. That is a great and serious matter upon which I ask your ruling.

Mr. President: What is the practical point that the Honourable Member raises? Do I understand that the practical point which the Honourable Member raises is this:—Whether it is open to the Assembly to discuss clauses which the Joint Committee have excised? The Bill as sent up by this House to the Joint Committee contained these clauses and therefore it is perfectly open to the Assembly to restore them. If that is the essence of the point of order raised by the Honourable Member then I uphold his contention.

Sir Montagu Webb (Bombay: European): I think it is competent for the House to restore the provision which has been excised.

Mr. President: It is perfectly competent for the House to restore the provision which was in the Bill and which has been excised by the Joint Committee.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Having regard to your ruling, Sir, I hope this House would allow amendments to be sent in before the matter is again taken up for consideration, because on the Bill as it stood we were not in a position to send in any amendments on this question and we were not sure what the ruling of the Chair would be upon a matter of this importance. Having regard now to your ruling, I hope you will give permission to send in amendments so that the matter may be taken up for discussion before the Bill is finally disposed of.

Mr. President: In the meantime we may proceed with the Bill.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): We may proceed with the Bill and before it is finally disposed of, any Member who likes may move that these sections which have been omitted by the Joint Committee may be re-inserted in their appropriate places.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I have no objection to any Member who wishes to restore the provisions in the original Bill moving now an amendment to that effect or giving me notice now of the amendment to that effect. I take it, Sir, that we shall not probably come to that question till Monday. I suggest that any Member who wishes to put in an amendment to the effect that the clauses of the Bill omitted by the Joint Committee should be restored may give notice of that amendment to-day.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: May I ask, Sir, why amendments should be restricted to the original sections? We may like to improve the original sections.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member is perfectly aware that any sections before the House are open to improvement. That is why they are before them.

It is impossible for any one to say at the moment how long the consideration of this Bill will last; but, without actually committing myself, I am prepared to meet the Honourable Commerce Member and the House generally on the point of waiving the period of notice required. But I think it would not merely be a courtesy to the promoter of the Bill but would conduce to the efficient despatch of legislation if Honourable Members who wish to insert any amendments of that character would draw them up at the earliest possible moment and give the Government the longest possible notice. Otherwise, we may encounter undue difficulties due to hasty drafting.

On the raising of points of order of this kind, I should like to appeal to Honourable Members to give the Chair the maximum possible notice of their intention to do so. Least of all qualities which I wish to claim is omniscience, and therefore I should like to have full opportunity of consulting both the officers of the Department at my disposal and the documents at my disposal in order to arrive at considered conclusions. On a matter of this importance, on which it so happens that I was able to give a decision without previous consideration, I should like to appeal to Honourable Members to give the utmost possible notice, because, as Honourable Members are aware, rulings given from the Chair are apt to create precedents.

The motion, that the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill to define the liability of employers in certain cases of suits for damages brought against them by workmen, and to provide for the payment by certain classes of employers to their workmen of compensation for injury by accident, be taken into consideration, was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 1 do stand part of the Bill.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: If you are going to allow amendments to be sent in which would include employer's liability, this clause will have to be altered. May I suggest that the consideration of this clause be postponed?

Mr. President: As a matter of fact, it may have escaped the Honourable Member's notice that clause 1 in the original Bill reads exactly in the same terms as clause 1 in the amended Bill. If Honourable Members, however, think that it is desirable to amend the short title, I am prepared to accept a motion for discussion that the consideration of clause 1 be postponed.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: I move that the consideration of clause 1 of the Bill be postponed.

Mr. President: The question is that the consideration of clause 1 of the Bill be postponed.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Clause 2.

Mr. N. C. Sircar (Bengal: National Chamber of Commerce): I sent in notice of my amendment before I read the whole Bill. Clause 2 is at the very start, but before I read the whole Bill I was under a misapprehension that the compensation increased and decreased according to the number of dependants. But as it is not so, I do not move the first two amendments.*

Captain E. V. Sassoon: When I placed my amendment on the paper I quite realised that in treating of the question of dependants it was very difficult to know where to stop in placing on record those who were to be allowed to divide up the compensation as laid down in this Bill. But at the time it appeared to me that a widowed sister would have been more or less in the same position as an unmarried sister. I consider that the workman brother would have had to look after her as he would his unmarried sister. But Members who know more than I do, ignorant as I am of the customs in India, tell me that the widowed sister is generally looked after by her husband's relatives. If that is the case, my whole argument for putting forward the widowed sister falls to the ground and I therefore will not press my amendment.†

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Though the custom prevails that the widowed sister is supported by the family of her husband, it may often happen that she was supported by and was dependent on the earnings of her deceased brother. In such a case it will be very hard if we do not allow the widowed sister also some advantage under this Bill. Therefore I propose that the words "or widowed" should be inserted after the word "unmarried" and before the word "sister".

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 2 (1) in sub-clause (d), before the word 'sister' insert the words 'or widowed'."

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The reason why we do not include the widowed sister is the very reason which has been given to the House by Captain Sassoon. We understood that ordinarily a widowed sister lives in the family to which she is married. That is certainly the case over the greater part of Madras. There may be exceptional cases where a widowed sister does depend for maintenance on her deceased brother, but, Sir, I do not think that in a Bill of this kind we should try to provide for every exceptional case. It seems to me to be a much sounder principle to keep the list of relatives as small as possible, and in the whole Bill we have tried to make the list of dependents as small as ever we possibly could in order that the real dependents may get the benefits of the Bill.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Sir, I support the amendment and for this reason. The criterion should be whether the widowed sister lives in the husband's family or in a brother's family. We know that in Bengal and some other places a widowed sister may live in a brother's and not in a husband's family. It all depends upon the circumstances. In many cases the husband's family is not of sufficient means to maintain the widow; then the widow comes back to her parents' house and lives in her parents' family.

* "That in sub-clause (d), of clause 2 (1):

(a) the word 'husband' be omitted;

(b) after the word 'mother' the words 'if he or she is infirm or disabled or has no other son or daughter to provide for him or her' be inserted."

† "That in sub-clause (d), of clause 2 (1) after the word 'unmarried' the words 'or widowed' be inserted."

[Mr. J. Chaudhuri.]

In such cases I submit it will be hardship to her not to have the advantages provided in this Bill for her benefit as well.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, my friend has referred to the widowed sister. He is a lawyer, but he seems to have forgotten the elementary principle of Hindu law that a widowed sister has no claim, no legal claim upon her parents for her maintenance: and when under the general law she has no claim I fail to see why under the provisions of this Bill she would be given an exceptional treatment. I oppose the amendment.

Rai D. O. Barua Bahadur (Assam Valley: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, I beg to oppose this amendment also. It is too much to expect from the employer anything in the shape of compensation or maintenance for the sister. Sir, under the Hindu law a sister is not an heir to a brother, but in this case of payment of compensation the employer is going to be compelled to make good the deficit, and to pay compensation to the deceased's sister when her brother is dead. Sir, it will be extending the principles of humanity to a very great extent. The institutions of public utility will suffer to a great extent if we go on extending such benefits to such relations as a widowed sister. And there is another aspect of the matter, Sir. When a brother dies of accident or injuries, then the sister will be brought from her husband's family into the family of her deceased brother, and she will be put forth to claim compensation on account of the decease of her brother. So there will be many difficulties in giving compensation or ascertaining whether the compensation should be given to the sister or not. So, Sir, in these circumstances at least I beg to oppose the amendment.

(An Honourable Member: "I move that the question be put.")

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Sir, I beg to move the following amendment:

"In sub-clause (d) of clause 2 (1):

'After the word 'sister' insert the words 'grand-father, grand-mother, minor grand-son and unmarried grand-daughter'."

Sir, I generally accept the principle enunciated by the Honourable Mover of this Bill that we should not have a very large number of relatives in addition to the list already given. But even after having accepted that, I propose that these four relatives mentioned by me should be added. The cases which I have suggested are not exceptional cases. You will always find some cases where a grand-father or a grand-mother is dependent upon a grand-son or grand-daughter, and vice versa, and it is therefore necessary that we should include them in this list. I may add for the information of my Honourable friend, Mr. Barua, that by adding to the number of relatives here the amount of compensation is not increased at all. The simple effect of my amendment will be that in those cases where a man leaves only a grand-father or a grand-mother or a grand-son or a grand-daughter, these relatives, namely, the grand-father, grand-mother, grand-son or grand-daughter will not be without compensation if they are found to be dependent upon a deceased workman. Sir, my amendment will, I hope, be acceptable to the House.

The President: Further amendment moved:

"In sub-clause (d) of clause 2 (1), after the word 'sister' insert the words 'grand-father, grand-mother, minor grand-son and unmarried grand-daughter'."

Mr. B. N. Misra (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadan): May I rise to a point of order. My amendment runs 'or such others as being closely related absolutely depend on, or are entitled to maintenance by law and custom'. This will cover the persons that have been proposed by Mr. Joshi. So, practically, if his amendment is voted against, my amendment will be rather weakened. I think, my amendment being of a more general character, it ought to precede his amendment.

The President: As regards that, Honourable Members may in this case simply vote against Mr. Joshi and then move their own.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, Mr. Joshi, I am glad to see, has agreed to the general principle of this clause as at present drafted, namely, that we should keep the list of relatives confined to a comparatively small number. The only point, the only difficulty, is, exactly where we should draw the line, and I should like briefly to explain why we put it as in the Bill, why we have kept the list as small as ever we could. In the first place, as I explained when I made my speech this morning, we are out for simplicity and ease of working in the Bill. That is the reason why we have tried to keep the list of dependants confined as far as possible to people ordinarily living in the same house as the deceased workman. We also felt that if we included in the list, as proposed in the amendment, a long line of distant relatives who might not be at all dependent on the workman, we might add to the work of the Commissioner, since under clause 8 (4) the Commissioner would probably feel bound to issue notices to all those relatives. That might result in delay in distributing the compensation to the people, to the closer relatives who really ought to get the benefit of it. And another obvious disadvantage in a long list which rather weighed with me was that the Commissioner under clause 8 (4) might not be able to give these remote relatives any compensation at all. We feared that if we had an unduly long list, we might excite hopes which, in practice, in the result, would not be fulfilled, and we might create a good deal of heart-burning. These dependants might go to the Commissioner, claim compensation, and find that the Commissioner had decided to give the whole compensation to the widow, the sons, and so on, and would refuse them any compensation at all. On the whole therefore we decided that the wiser course was to keep this list of relatives just as small as ever we could, and that is the reason why we excluded the grand-father and the other people mentioned by Mr. Joshi.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I wish to say only a few words on this amendment of Mr. Joshi's. I agree with Mr. Joshi and also with my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, that the list of relatives or dependants should be as small as possible. But I think the suggestion that Mr. Joshi has made has a good deal of force in it. Our experience is that we do find a grand-father and grand-mother dependent upon the grand-son, and if the grand-son suddenly passes away it would be difficult for the old grand-father and the old grand-mother to maintain themselves in their old age. So, as far as that part of Mr. Joshi's amendment is concerned, in which he wishes to extend the benefit to the grand-father and grand-mother, I am entirely in agreement with him. Unless this benefit is extended to them, I feel, Sir, that it would be a great hardship to the grand-father and grand-mother to have to maintain themselves in their old age.

With regard to the minor grand-son and unmarried grand-daughter, I am not sure that the amendment is necessary. We find, Sir, from statistics that there is scarcely a workman above the age of 40; therefore you are not likely to find a workman leaving a minor grand-son or an unmarried grand-daughter. This part of the amendment, I think, is not necessary, but so far as the first part of the amendment is concerned, I give my strong support to it.

Rai Bahadur S. N. Singh (Bihar and Orissa: Nominated Official): Sir, I rise to oppose this amendment as I think it should not be accepted. Sir, I think the definition of the term "dependant" is already wide enough and I am sure any undue further extension would not be allowed by the House. The obvious result will be the whittling down of the amount payable to each such relation and an increase in litigation in some cases.

I am aware that some representative public bodies consulted in this connection have pointed out that the term "dependant" covers a much wider range under the corresponding English Act than is proposed to be assigned to it in the Bill under consideration. But I am also aware that some of them have made it clear that this term should cover only such close and near relations as are actually dependent upon the deceased or his earnings at the time of his death. The remarkable point in this connection is, however, that the Honourable Mover of the amendment is not true to his own original idea, as expressed in his Note of Dissent, where he stated that under "dependant" he would include 'grand-father, grand-mother, in case both the parents are dead, and minor fatherless grand-son and minor fatherless grand-daughter.' It goes without saying, Sir, that this amendment covers a much wider field than was originally intended by Mr. Joshi. I think, Sir, that the general feeling among those concerned is that the list of dependants should be kept reasonably small. I beg therefore to suggest, Sir, that the definition of the term "dependant" as already amended, may remain as it is and we may very well wait and see how it works.

Sir Henry Moncreiff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): Sir, I have only one word to say on the drafting of this amendment. Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas expressed a doubt as to whether we should find a minor grand-son or an unmarried grand-daughter. I also have a very grave doubt as to whether we shall find any unmarried grand-fathers or grand-mothers.

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, if I may be allowed to move my amendment (No. 6) I believe Mr. Joshi will withdraw his amendment.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee (Education Member): Sir, one practical difficulty which weighed both with the original Committee which sat in June and again with the Joint Select Committee, was that if the grand-father or the grand-mother had other children who were earning their livelihood it would be wrong to bring them in to participate in the benefit. As some Honourable Members have expressed considerable feeling in the matter, I may say on behalf of Government that we shall be willing to accept a compromise so as to include the paternal grand-parent provided that both parents are dead and the son's children, that is, the minor children, if their father is dead. If that is accepted by the House generally we shall introduce that addition, provided that my friend, Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith, is able to put in a draft which avoids unmarried grand-parents. .

Mr. President: Am I to understand that the Government Member has an amendment ready?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I have nothing ready, Sir. I would suggest that consideration of this point be postponed to give the drafting Department time to look into it.

Mr. President: The amendment moved is:

"In sub-clause (d) of clause 2 (1) after the word 'sister' insert the words 'grand-father, grand mother, minor grand-son and unmarried grand-daughter'."

The original question was that that amendment be made.

Since which an amendment has been moved that further consideration of sub-clause (d) of sub-section (1) of section 2 be postponed.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I do not know if Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith would accept it, but we have got the whole clause re-drafted. If so, I think the House might possibly be prepared to go on with the consideration of this clause. What we suggest is that clause 2 (1) (d) read as follows:

"Dependant" means the following relatives of a deceased workman, namely: wife, husband, parent, paternal grand-father if the parent be dead, minor child, minor brother, unmarried sister and son's children if their father be dead."

That seems to me to bring them all in, Sir.

Mr. President: I think we might proceed to add this sub-section of the clause to the Bill on the understanding that the Government will insert this particular amendment in another place. I imagine that the terms of this amendment are not likely to lead to a constitutional crisis between the two Chambers.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Sir, I ask for leave to withdraw my amendment.

The amendment (No. 4) was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. President: Does the Honourable Member for Commerce also ask for leave to withdraw his motion?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Yes, Sir.

The motion was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. President: That disposes of amendments Nos. 4, 5, 6 and 7.

Dr. Nand Lal: Not No. 6, Sir.

Mr. President: I am prepared to hear the Honourable Member from the Punjab why it is not disposed of.

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, the amendment which stands in my name runs as follows:

"That in sub-clause (d) of clause 2 (1) after the word 'sister' insert the words 'sonless grand-father, sonless grand-mother, parentless minor grand-child'."

[Dr. Nand Lal.]

The clause which is before the House when read with the proposed amendment will read as follows:

" 'Dependant' means the wife, husband, father, mother, minor son, minor daughter, minor brother or unmarried sister, sonless grand-father, sonless grand-mother, parentless minor grand-child of a deceased workman."

Mr. President: I must point out to the Honourable Member that though he is in order technically in moving this amendment, in substance, as the Honourable Member knows, he has the explicit pledge of the Government that they are going to introduce a new sub-clause in another place to meet precisely the point which he wants.

Dr. Nand Lal: If I rightly followed the Government to my understanding, it does not include grand-child, and if it does, certainly I shall be the first person to appreciate that idea.

May I ask that the amendment which the Government proposes to place before the House may be read out?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I will answer the Honourable Member, if I may. The amendment which the Government proposed was that the whole clause should be re-drafted as follows:

" 'Dependant' means the following relatives of the deceased workman, namely:

Wife, husband, parents, paternal grand-parent if both parents be dead, minor child, minor brother, unmarried sister, son's children if their father be dead."

Dr. Nand Lal: Yes, Sir, it includes my amendment, and I therefore withdraw my amendment (No. 6).

Mr. B. N. Misra: Sir, my amendment is rather different from the amendments put forward by other Members. I move my amendment, which runs as follows:

" In sub-clause (d) of clause 2 (1) after the word 'sister' the following be inserted:

'or such others as being closely related, absolutely depend on, or are entitled to maintenance by law and custom'."

Sir, some dependants of the workmen have been included in the clause, but as far as I understood the Honourable Member for Commerce, Mr. Innes and Mr. Joshi, they said that they do not want a large number of dependants as it will complicate matters, there will be difficulty and litigation, the amount they will get will be very small and so on. But I do not contemplate such a case. What I contemplate is where there is a person absolutely dependant on the workman, say, for instance, grand-mother—mother's mother. The mother's mother owing to natural affection brought up the grandson. In fact the mother's mother spent all her earnings and income for the grandson and brought him up. When the grandson grew he earned money and helped the grandmother. But when the grandson passes away, the grandmother is really at a disadvantage, having spent all her income and property over the grandson, on whom she was absolutely dependent. I do not contemplate a case in which if the grandson dies there are others living to help her. Take the case where there is a grandmother and grandson. The grandson grew up and was employed in some factory or somewhere else and died on account of some injury or accident. Then, the grandmother is, I think, in justice entitled to have a share from the compensation given to such a deceased workman. I consider it is only just to classify her as dependant or relation absolutely dependent upon the deceased workman. I think there will be no objection to giving some compensation or classifying her as a dependant. For instance, there is a widow sister-in-law. There are two brothers. The elder brother died and the elder brother's wife brought up her husband's younger brother. When this boy grew up, he got employed and supported his brother's wife, because she spent all her money over him and took so much trouble over her husband's brother. If this man dies, the woman should be entitled under those circumstances to get compensation, because she was absolutely dependent on the deceased workman. The present definition covers minor son. But sometimes there may be a grown up son, who is blind, or a grown up son either deaf or dumb. Such incapable persons who are unable to earn are naturally dependent upon the income or earning of their father. In such cases even the Hindu law states that such blind, deaf or dumb sons or a son who suffers from leprosy or other incurable diseases should be maintained by the father even if they are grown up. There is no such provision. The provision only enables the minor son to be a dependant on the workman. But, in such cases, as I have pointed out, according to the Hindu Law, the father is bound to maintain them. When such a workman dies, I think these blind, deaf or dumb sons should be classified as dependants and they should get compensation. I think Honourable Members of the House will not view my amendment as adding to the list. My amendment meets such other urgent and exceptional cases. I hope Honourable Members of the House will accept the amendment. And then the second part includes those who by law and custom are entitled to maintenance. I think all the lawyer Members of this House will agree with me that the grandfather or grandmother or grandson are real dependants. Such persons ought to be allowed to be classified as dependants of the deceased workman, because they are entitled to maintenance by law. With these words, Sir, I move my amendment.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: I oppose this amendment, Sir. My friend is under a misapprehension that we are discussing the law of inheritance here. We are neither considering the question of Hindu Law or Muhammadan Law or any other law. The simple principle is that when a workman is injured in the course of employment in a risky industry whether his immediate dependants would get compensation or not; and I submit that the amendment that Government proposes to introduce with regard to this clause is as far as we can reasonably go. The compensation will be available to Hindus, Muhammadans, Christians, Jews and other communities, all alike. So I hope my friends will not misunderstand the scope of this Bill and go off at a tangent and discuss Hindu law of inheritance or the Muhammadan law of inheritance or any other law or custom with regard to maintenance or similar intricate questions. With these general remarks I beg to oppose this motion.

(Several Honourable Members: "The question may now be put.")

(Mr. J. N. Mukherjee made a remark to a Member behind him, which was inaudible.)

Mr. President: If the Honourable Member wishes to speak, he should address the Chair.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): I beg to address the Chair, and I beg the Chair's pardon. I stood up to speak but was interrupted by my friend from behind. However, I observe that a tendency is growing up on the part of certain Members of the House to cry "vote, vote" without trying to enter at all into the merits of a question. It is all very well for people who cannot imagine that they may at any time be the possible recipients of any portion of the compensation money that may have to be paid to a deceased workman's relations, to consider these question unsympathetically, and to try and rush things in an undeserved manner. I stand up, however, to protest against any such tendency. I submit, Sir, that the question before the House is a very important one, and we can not lose sight of the question of the distribution of the compensation money. The question is not one of heirship. Many of my Honourable friends have misunderstood it. The idea underlying the question is that those who have been deprived of support by the death or injury of a workman should continue to receive support. I think, Sir, that if the clause which deals with the distribution of the compensation money by the Commissioner is defective in any respect, it should be amended in its appropriate place. But, at the present moment, what we are considering is, in what manner the ring of recipients should be determined in the first place. My Honourable friend, Mr. Chaudhuri, stood up and said that there was no question of inheritance involved in the case. Certainly, there is no question of inheritance in the amendment proposed by my Honourable friend, Mr. Misra. It refers only to those relations of a deceased workman, who are entitled to maintenance by law and custom. The point is, if a workman is killed while working, certain dependants of his are thereby deprived of their maintenance or support, which they used to get from the deceased workman in his life-time. That is the chief point we have to keep in view. That being so, the question of heirship does not arise. The Commissioner, or the person who has got to distribute this money is given by the Bill some discretion in the matter, and he may pick out of the persons specified in this circle or ring of men those who are best fitted to receive the compensation. So, the question ought not to be a very complicated one; at any rate, we ought not to complicate it by imagining things which do not exist in the body of the Bill. Therefore I submit that, although as a matter of fact there may be some other dependants, as for instance, old maid servants or such like persons, who are not contemplated by the proposed amendment or by the Bill, the amendment suggests only such persons as are closely related and absolutely dependent on the deceased workman. I suppose the words "absolutely depend on" undoubtedly mean those dependants who are within the circle of his relations. If not, the matter may be cleared up.

Mr. B. N. Misra: I meant relations.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: Clause 8 of the Bill bears on this question of compensation. The first sub-clause of it says:

"Compensation payable in respect of a workman whose injury has resulted in death shall be deposited with the Commissioner, and any sum so deposited shall be apportioned among the dependants of the deceased workman or any of them in such proportion as the Commissioner thinks fit, or may, in the discretion of the Commissioner, be allotted to any one such dependant, and the sum so allotted to any dependant shall be paid to him or, if he is a person under any legal disability, be invested, applied or otherwise dealt with for his benefit during such disability in such manner as the Commissioner thinks fit."

Then we pass on to where it is not a case of death

Mr. President: Order, order. I point out to the Honourable Member that we are dealing here with the definition of dependants and not with the procedure to be adopted by the Commissioner in dividing up the proceeds of any compensation.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: What I am pointing out is not a question of procedure at all, but a question of right to receive the compensation. If I can make myself intelligible, what I mean to say is this. If the ring of possible recipients of this compensation money be not unduly restricted, the Commissioner will have the opportunity of paying the money to the person or persons who, to his mind, may be the fittest person or persons, among the relatives of the deceased workman to receive the compensation money; and what is more, it is provided in the Bill that in case there is no such dependant within that ring mentioned in the definition, the money is to be escheated or returned to the person or employer who has got to pay the money to the Commissioner. Therefore in view of the danger of unduly restricting the number of possible recipients we are by the proposed amendment attempting to enlarge the circle and reduce the chance of an escheat or return back of the money to the person who paid it. If the object of the Bill is to provide for the distribution of the compensation money in a suitable manner, so that the dependants, that is to say, the persons who should have a share in the compensation money, the number of such relations should not be unduly restricted, in the manner proposed. The effect of such restriction will be what I have submitted to the House. Therefore it is not a question of procedure; it is a question of right which is intimately mixed up with this question of definition. I think, Sir, there is a great deal to be considered so far as the present amendment is concerned. We know that there are certain persons in the body of Hindu law who are not heirs, but who receive maintenance and whom a Hindu is bound to maintain. If a definition is laid down in the Bill without contemplating the existence of such people, my idea is that it will work great hardship and the whole object of the Bill will be frustrated by so unduly restricting the circle of dependants entitled to receive the compensation, and for the reason I have just submitted, namely, that if they are not mentioned or otherwise indicated in the definition, the compensation will revert to the person who paid it. I therefore submit for the consideration of the House that this amendment be taken into sympathetic consideration.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City : Non-Muhammadian Urban) : Sir, as one of those unfortunates who unintentionally offended Mr. Mukherjee, a word of explanation as to why we asked that the question should be put may be in order. Sir, the object and scope of this Bill has not been correctly understood by the framers of this amendment. It is creating a special right, a special remedy, a speedy remedy in order to benefit workmen and their dependants. We did not want to complicate the procedure by entering into questions of who are dependants and who are not dependants. We wanted a rule of thumb by which the Commissioner is not to embark upon an inquiry whether a certain person was dependant or not. The law presumes in certain cases they must have been dependant, and we take care to enumerate from our limited knowledge as to who are the likely persons who can be safely said to depend without any evidence about it. What is it this amendment wants? "Such others as being closely related." In the first place the Commissioner will have to determine whether the person claiming compensation is closely related or related in any other way, and what is the definition of close relation? Is my wife's sister a close relation of mine or not? I know, Sir, of many a case where an unfortunate widowed sister lives with her married sister and depends upon that sister and her husband. My friend, Mr. Mukherjee, knows that my wife's sister or my mother-in-law, who is often a welcome visitor in my house has no legal claim on me. Now, you have the case of those closely related or absolutely dependant upon. How is the poor Commissioner to determine between these two questions and again who are entitled to maintenance by law or custom? Is it a family custom? Is it kala achar or desa achar? What is this poor Commissioner to do? I have great respect for my friend, Mr. Mukherjee, and usually he has a clear vision in this matter. How is the custom to be proved? The poor Commissioner, in distributing this small amount of Rs. 200, Rs. 300 or Rs. 500, as the case may be, has to embark upon an inquiry as to whether there is a custom and how many witnesses there are to prove the custom; whether there have been prior judgments in support of the custom and whether it has been recognised in a court. All these things have to be determined. Is this the way this special remedy is to be given? If my Honourable friends will think about it they will see it is quite out of place. Therefore, you must have a rule of thumb, and the Legislature must provide that rule of thumb. I earnestly appeal to them not to complicate the machinery in this way.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Sir, Mr. Rangachariar's misfortunes are so few that, when he brings forward one, one is inclined to sympathise with him. He knows his part of the country; Mr. Mukherjee and I know ours, and Mr. Misra knows his. Therefore, even at the sacrifice of losing reputation for clarity of vision at Mr. Rangachariar's hands, I give my support to this amendment. Mr. Misra has mentioned a very pertinent case, the widow of the brother, divided or undivided, does not matter. Mr. Rangachariar's mother-in-law and sister-in-law may be able to take care of themselves, for they may have their brothers or other relations but this poor widow, of whom Bengal knows so well (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "Of whom we all know so well"), Orissa knows so well, needs protection which the amendment suggests.

Mr. Mukherjee was referring at some length to clause 8 of the Bill. That helps us in realising that there is really no difficulty of this kind that Mr. Rangachariar thinks of. The Commissioner, who knows the local circumstances, knows local customs and knows exactly how matters stand among the classes of people concerned, will be able to deal with the question of apportionment under the very large discretionary powers that are given to him under clause 8. What are you doing here is merely extending the scope of the definition but not the liability of the employer or very much adding to the work of the Commissioner.

Supposing this widow that I am referring to—and she looms very large in Bengal—was the only dependant, not in the sense of the definition here, but the only dependant in the family, as she often is, she being not in the list, she will be absolutely unprovided for although money may be available. I do not see, Sir, that very great difficulty will come in because what is close relation, what is absolute dependence, what the law and custom in a particular tract of country is, are not fully defined. No one will be any the worse for this expansion of scope. The Commissioner may have some more work to do, but under sub-section (1) of clause 8 discretion is allowed to him to do as he thinks fit.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: I move that the question be now put.

The Honourable Mr. A. O. Chatterjee: Sir, my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has stated the Government case so well that I had thought it would be unnecessary for us to participate in the debate on this amendment. But my Honourable friend opposite has quoted, or stressed his experience of the conditions of Bengal, and therefore I feel more or less bound to get up and intervene.

I think my Honourable friend, Sir Deva Prasad, as well as Mr. Mukherjee over here, are really confusing the issues very considerably. They are thinking of middle-class families. We want this Bill to apply to the working-classes, to people whose income is very limited indeed. Personally, Sir, I think I have as much experience of Bengali families as my Honourable friends have, and I do not think among the working classes it is at all common to find a brother's widow dependent on a younger brother.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Many.

The Honourable Mr. A. O. Chatterjee: Excuse me. I do not agree. They all earn their own livelihood. The earnings of a man are not really sufficient to maintain a very large family of widows. Therefore, Sir, I do not think the sentimental question arises at all. As Mr. Rangachariar has already pointed out, the whole scope of the Bill is based on the idea that dependency will not have to be proved and I think this amendment will cut athwart the whole principle of the Bill. I hope the House will not accept the amendment.

The motion was negatived.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: Sir, have I your permission—the Legislative Department have now put into shape the amendment of which, with the permission of the House, I gave notice a little while ago—have I your permission, Sir, to move it?

[Permission given.]

I beg to move:

"That for clause 2 (1) (d) the following be substituted:

'(d) 'Dependant' means any of the following relations of a deceased workman,

A wife, husband, parent, minor son, minor daughter, minor brother or unmarried sister; and includes the minor children of a deceased son of the workman, and, where no parent of the workman is alive, a paternal grand-parent'."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. N. O. Sircar: My amendment is:

"That in sub-clause (f) of clause 2 (1), after the word 'person' the words 'or body of persons whether incorporated or not' be inserted."

In clause 2 (1) (e) in the definition of 'employer' we have the words "whether incorporated or not" after the word 'persons,' and I want in the case of managing agents likewise to insert the words "or body of persons whether incorporated or not" after the word 'person,' because the managing agent may be the managing agent of a limited liability company and the company may be incorporated; therefore I want to insert those words after the word 'person'.

Mr. President: Where does the Honourable Member mean to insert those words, after the word 'person' in line 1, or after the word 'person' in line 3?

Mr. N. C. Sircar: I want the insertion in line 3.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That in sub-clause (f) of clause 2 (1), after the word 'person' in line 3 the words 'or body of persons whether incorporated or not' be inserted."

The motion was adopted.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, my amendment* relates to the definition of the words "qualified medical practitioner." As it now stands in the proposed Bill, Honourable Members will see that "qualified medical practitioner" means any person registered under the Medical Act, 1858, or any Act amending the same, or under any Act of any Legislature in British India providing for the maintenance of a register of medical practitioners or in any area where no such last-mentioned Act is in force any person declared by the Local Government by notification in the local official Gazette, to be a qualified medical practitioner for the purposes of this Act. The object of my amendment is to omit the words "where no such last-mentioned Act is in force." The result of that will be that the Local Government may declare a person to be a qualified medical practitioner for the purposes of this Act even in places where a Medical Act or any other Act referred to previously is in force. My object is this: I want to give wide power to Local Governments to qualify medical practitioners for the purposes of this Act. Now, medical practitioners have to certify as to the injuries sustained by these workmen and as we know, Sir, our country is not full of western medical practitioners. It is very difficult to find such medical practitioners even in taluk centres practising western medical science or fully qualified to be registered under this Act; and I know also there is a prejudice among this learned body of doctors to include in their fold persons who, although they may be qualified in the western science, take in the assistance of Vaidyans or Hakims; they consider that to be a disqualification. In fact, I know there was a case in Madras

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: In Bombay also.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I do not know of Bombay, but I know of two cases in Madras where two very eminent men of the medical profession practising the western medicine had committed the sin of consulting a Vaidyan in very serious cases. The Vaidyan gave them good and sound advice and saved the life of the patient. They had not succeeded by the western system and so they had called in the assistance of the Vaidyan and succeeded in effecting a cure. This was considered a grave dereliction of duty and breach of discipline: (A Voice: "Grave misconduct.") So that there was a considerable agitation amongst the gentlemen practising the western science that they should be excluded from the register of medical practitioners. Sir, I know one doctor, who is also my doctor, who is well known in Madras, and who does not scruple about these things. When he finds that with the western system he cannot succeed in a case he invokes the aid of the Indian medicine. In fact, he was put on special duty by the Madras Government to investigate the possibilities of including these drugs also in the pharmacopœa—I hope I am using the right word—of these medical people. Sir, therefore I want to provide that persons who are not on the register should also be declared to be qualified. I do not say that they should be declared qualified by any irresponsible person. I will leave the power to the Local Government. I fully trust the Local Government, I fully trust to the judgment of the Local Government, and I say that if the Local Government chooses to say that a certain person may be declared to be a qualified medical practitioner for the purposes of this Act, why should we quarrel with it? Why should we deprive the Local Government of the power to declare certain people qualified because this Medical Act is in force? In other places where the Medical Act is not in force you trust to the judgment of the Local Government, but if the Medical Act is in force then the Local Government is not to be trusted. I think it is not right. Therefore, I want to give the power to the Local Government to declare a person to be a qualified medical practitioner for the purposes of this Act even in places where the Medical Act is not in force. That is the object of this amendment. I therefore, Sir, move the deletion of these words.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: Sir, I think my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has moved this amendment under a misapprehension. It struck me when he was speaking that he thought that unless the definition of a qualified medical practitioner was amended in the way suggested by him, it would not be possible for a man to be attended by a Vaid or Hakim, and it would not be possible for him to tender the evidence of a Vaid or Hakim or of a man who was not qualified in the manner as at present suggested, before a Commissioner. I think, Sir, that is not the intention of the Bill. So far as I can discover, the reference to 'a qualified medical practitioner' comes in only in clauses 6, 11 and 32. The Honourable gentleman will find that it is only where a workman applies for a review under clause 6 that he has to produce the certificate of a medical practitioner. Also it is only where an employer compels a workman to accept either examination or treatment given by his own doctor that the definition of 'a qualified medical practitioner' comes in. Sir, in the interests of the workman himself, I think it would be most dangerous to authorise the employer to employ any kind of medical practitioner who may be available in the locality. There is nothing whatever to prevent a man from putting forward the opinion of his own Vaid or his own Hakim or any kind of medical practitioner before the Commissioner regarding the injuries sustained by him.

Dr. Nand Lal: He will be recognised by the Local Government.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: I am coming to that. Then, Sir, my Honourable friend is trying to draw a red herring across the whole discussion by quoting the case of a man who was disqualified in Madras, according to his account, because he consulted Vaid and Hakims. Well, Sir, the Honourable gentleman himself has mentioned the case of his own medical attendant who has been entrusted by the Local Government with most important inquiries in spite of the fact that he does consort with Vaid and Hakims. I think, Sir, my Honourable friend has demolished his own case.

My Honourable friend has suggested that we should not distrust the Local Governments. I, Sir, have no desire whatever to suggest that we should not trust Local Governments. But these Acts, which are referred to in the definition, have been passed by local Legislatures. All these Acts have been passed by the representatives of the people in the local Legislatures and it is for the local Legislative Councils to amend the Acts if they consider it desirable to do so. We would really be interfering with the discretion of the representatives of the people, of men who are serving on the local Legislative Councils. If the amendment of the Honourable Member is accepted, there will be a very serious danger indeed of a certain amount of conflict between the Local Governments and the local Legislative Councils. My Honourable friend shakes his head in his usual oracular manner, but I again repeat my assertion that we will only be creating friction between the Local Governments and the local Legislative Councils. Sir, I have here all the local Acts. I do not know if my Honourable friend has studied them. He will find that under these Acts practically everybody is entitled to registration. I will just quote from the Madras Act. According to the Schedule of that Act, all the following persons are entitled to be registered:

"Persons possessing the degree of Doctor, Bachelor and Licentiate of Medicine, and Master, Bachelor and Licentiate of Surgery, of the Universities of Madras, Bombay, Calcutta, Allahabad and Lahore. Persons possessing a diploma or certificate granted by the British Indian Government or the Government of Ceylon to any person trained in medical college or school (I emphasise the word 'school') declaring him to be qualified to practise medicine and surgery."

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: There are rules also.

Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: Yes, of course there are rules. That is what I am suggesting. We are really leaving it to the local Legislative Councils to consider which persons should be considered as qualified medical practitioners.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Should also be registered. Why so?

Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: Yes, exactly. We are leaving it to the representatives of the people. My Honourable friend in this case does not trust the representatives of the people. He wants to give the discretion to Local Governments. I think, Sir, his amendment is extraordinarily unsound and I hope the House will reject it.

Mr. Darcy Lindsay (Bengal: European): I agree, Sir, with my Honourable friend, Mr. Chatterjee, that this is a most undesirable amendment to make. It would be a grave error for this House to indicate to Local Governments that there should be any lower standard of qualification for medical practitioners than their several Acts allow. We have the Indian Factories Act, and the Act of 1858 referred to in this clause. There is also, Sir, the point of view of insurance. We have heard from my Honourable friend, Mr. Kamat, that insurance forms a very important feature of this Act and that the employer is to be safeguarded by effecting insurance and, as Mr. Kamat said, at most favourable rates. That being so, Sir, we must take into consideration the point of view of the insurance companies, and any weakening of the medical qualification will, in my opinion, strike at the very root of the Act. The uncertainty of the position if it is left to Local Governments to modify the qualifications may make it almost impossible for insurance companies to give that protection that Mr. Kamat desires. The Advisory Committee which sat in Simla had the advantage of the expert opinion of Mr. McBride, a gentleman who has a world-wide knowledge of the Workmen's Compensation Act and he was very emphatic on this particular point that the reins must be tightened where medical qualifications were concerned. One point where the advice of the medical officer is of great importance is this. A workman may go to his country and his return to work is indefinite. The employer or the insurance company who is protecting the employer wishes to know whether the workman is able to return to work. A qualified medical practitioner has to be engaged to examine the man and report. As my Honourable friend, Mr. Chatterjee, pointed out, if the company or the employer is permitted to engage the services of a man of lower qualification, he may come to a decision greatly against the interests of the workman himself and I do not agree with Mr. Rangachariar that this amendment would be for the benefit of the workman. My Honourable friend in his note of dissent says "There may be persons who for reasons of their own may not wish to register themselves or who are not fully qualified to come on the register and yet qualified enough to say 'a man has lost a thumb'." I ask you, Sir, is that any qualification—to say a man has lost a thumb? Anybody can say "a man has lost a thumb" but what we want is qualification for the proper treatment of the injured thumb, and also to say whether the wound is sufficiently healed to enable the workman to return to his work. With these words, Sir, I strongly oppose the amendment.

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, I am in support of this amendment. Three grounds have been advanced in opposition to it. The first is that the employer will appoint a man according to his own choice, and that man, possibly to see that the object of the employer is attended to, may not act properly and may, thus, eventually prove prejudicial to the workman. The other ground which has been advanced is that it is quite probable that inefficient surgeons or inefficient physicians may be recognised and this recognition may not be beneficial either to the employer or to the employee. The third ground which has been advanced, in opposition, as I said before, is this, that if there are such people they may make efforts to be qualified, and after their having been so qualified, their names will have an entry on the register and therefore they will come within the scope of this Bill, and if they are not sufficiently able to stand the test, then they are utterly unfit to handle this work, and so the amendment is of no avail. These grounds have been set forth, as I have already submitted, in opposition.

When I examine all these grounds I find that there is no force in any of them. First of all, if the employer is without scruples, he is quite prepared to stoop low, then there will be nothing to prevent him from stooping low in the case of recognised medical practitioners too. The Government Benches will bear this in mind that no quack or inefficient man will be allowed to give certificate or stand as a witness, but a man who has authoritatively been recognised. That recognition is the greatest test. Only that man will have that distinction who is really sufficiently able to certify or examine. Therefore, there is no fear, so far as that ground is concerned. The other ground that he will be incapable, so far as that question goes, there have been a number of cases where our Indian physicians and surgeons, though they have not passed the test in some first class recognized medical colleges, are equally able, and as regards these, this appeal is made. Suppose, in some area, there is no man who has got a diploma or a degree from some officially recognized medical college, but there is a man who has had training, officially enabling him to practise and, so far as practice goes, he has a fairly good experience and is fully capable of giving a certificate and fully capable of examining patient or injured workman and the expression of his opinion will be sufficient to determine the question of disablement. Why should the workman be deprived of the services of the man who is living close by? On the other hand, why should that able man be depreciated so far as merits go? The third ground is that he should make efforts to qualify him in that behalf. Does my learned friend seriously mean to say, that in order to give the benefit of his services and ability to a workman or to the employer he may undergo a special test? It is not necessary at all. If he is capable and able to handle these questions, then he will be recognised and will be considered sufficiently well-qualified for the purposes of this Act. (Mr. J. Chaudhuri: "Leave it to Local Government.") Yes, it will be done. That is why I am recommending this. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "That is my amendment.") Therefore, I have submitted there is not much strength in the opposition, and consequently, being in favour of the spirit of the recommendation which has been embodied in this amendment, I very strongly support it.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I would appeal to the House not to accept this amendment of Mr. Rangachariar, for if that amendment is accepted, it may have a very mischievous result. I should like just to give a history of this case. When I submitted the Bill to the House, we had a very much more stringent definition of qualified medical practitioners, and we made the definition very stringent indeed because we knew what an effect upon the Insurance Companies it would have if they thought that we were in any way inadequate in our standards of medical practice. In the Select Committee, in deference to views expressed to the Select Committee, we watered down our original definition and we adopted the existing definition of qualified medical practitioner, which has been taken from the Factories Act. Now, Sir, that definition came before the House only two days ago in regard to the Mines Bill. Exception was not taken to it by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, nor by anybody else in this House. In this particular case the thing is of far greater importance, and yet Mr. Rangachariar wishes to alter the definition here. As I have said, it may have a very great effect upon the working of this Bill. It may send up the insurance rates for every employer in India, and I suggest, Sir, that if Mr. Rangachariar wishes to get recognition or registration of his Vaidis or Hakims or anybody else, let him do so by a separate Resolution but let him not prejudice the chances of this particular Bill working successfully. I oppose the amendment, Sir, most heartily.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: From the point of view of the working classes, I think, Sir, there is some disadvantage as well as some advantage in the amendment of my Honourable friend Mr. Rangachariar. In my opinion the disadvantage is that it may encourage them to go to Vaidis or Hakims, which I do not want them to do. But unfortunately, Sir, knowing the conditions of the working classes in this country and knowing very well section 11, sub-section (4), I think there is a great advantage in the amendment also. Unfortunately Government has thought it fit to include in the Bill, sub-section (4) of section 11, which is not found at least in English legislation. According to this clause a workman, if he is not treated by a qualified medical practitioner, stands to lose something. Sir, I know very well that a large number of the working class people do go to Vaidis and Hakims, and therefore if this section stands, that is, sub-section

(4) of section 11, then evidently there is a great advantage in having the expression 'qualified medical practitioner' defined, as my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has done; otherwise a large number of the working class people when injured will lose the benefit of the Workmen's Compensation Bill, because a large number of them go to Vaidas and Hakims, and it would be quite easy for the employers to show that the injury was aggravated on account of the Vaid, that the workman got treatment from an ordinary qualified medical practitioner and not from a registered medical practitioner. I think therefore that on the whole I would support the amendment instead of opposing it.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Sir, the grievance, as far as I understand, that Mr. Rangachariar makes is this. He does not want men with lower qualifications to be included in the section of this Act. I think what Mr. Rangachariar complains against, is the exclusion of certain men, otherwise qualified men who have taken degrees in the recognized Universities, the exclusion of these men from the definition under the Act.

(Dr. Nand Lal was rising from his seat.)

I can explain better if I am not interrupted. Mr. Rangachariar, I think, complained that there have been cases in which qualified medical men, who were known to have degrees and were recognized by the Universities, were excluded by the Medical Council because they showed tendency in many cases to prefer the Ayurvedic or Unani system to the English system, or because they also took the assistance of these two systems of medical examination in certain cases. Some years ago in Bombay we had a case like that, I mean the case of Dr. Popat Prabhuram, L.M.S., of the Bombay University, a well-known and highly respected physician of many years' standing. He has been qualified medical practitioner for many years past, but he was disqualified by the Medical Council on the ground—and this Medical Council I am constrained to say consisted mostly of Indian doctors—he was disqualified on the ground that he was guilty of grave misconduct in as much as he used to take the assistance of the Ayurvedic or Unani systems of medicine. That is a grave injustice; there is not the slightest doubt about that. I may also point out that in Bombay at any rate the English doctors, who are not in the Council, unfortunately, fought in favour of the inclusion of Dr. Popat and said that they themselves had found that in many cases the assistance of men who knew the Ayurvedic system was very helpful to them. Now the difficulty when you come to deal with Ayurvedic and Unani practitioners is that you have not got an organization from which you can, say, pick out the best qualified men. I quite recognize that difficulty, though there should be nothing in the Act to prevent such men as advocate the use of the Ayurvedic system from being registered; and if they refuse to be registered because their advocacy of the Ayurvedic system is challenged, then I should think they are doing an act which commends itself to us and is worthy of our respect rather than of our condemnation. But in laying this grievance we should not forget that it is a case which can be fought out on its own merits. I am in entire agreement with the grievance that Mr. Rangachariar makes. I think it is a great grievance and it has got to be redressed and fought out. But I think it ought to be made the subject of a full-dress debate if this Assembly has the power to have a discussion on it! Or, at any rate, we ought to agitate in our provinces to get the local Legislatures to amend the Act so as to make the inclusion of such practitioners possible under the definition given in the Act. I therefore think that we should be justified in carrying the section as it stands and in throwing out Mr. Rangachariar's amendment. If I may suggest to Mr. Rangachariar—I am very happy to do so—I think this grievance may form the subject of a separate debate.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, I am afraid my friend on the left has taken advantage of the provisions of this Workmen's Compensation Act to deliver a flank attack upon a wholly different Act, the Medical Act of 1858. I deprecate, Sir, any reference to that Act, because the main question with which we are at close grips in connection with this Act is, what will be the value and effect of a workman injured in the course of his employment if he is treated by a quack instead of a qualified medical practitioner. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "Will the Local Government qualify a quack?") My learned friend says, will the Local Government qualify a quack? If my friend has no apprehension of that character, he must know that the medical practitioners who are registered under the Act are also registered under the Acts of the various local Councils which are lawfully constituted bodies and exclude only those who indulge in nostrums and drugs which, time and test have proved to be not only innocuous but in many cases mischievous. But, I say, Sir, I shall not be led into a digression from the main point. The main point with which this House is confronted is this. A workman is injured. Mr. Darcy Lindsay, who is an insurance expert, has told you that if you are to enlarge the provisions of this definition of a qualified medical practitioner, you will raise the insurance premia. Is the House prepared to do it? And that is the only question with which we are at present concerned. If my friend Mr. Rangachariar has any grievance against the operation of the Medical Act, I have no doubt he will be able to find time and opportunity for ventilating it. But, so far as the working of the Workmen's Compensation Act is concerned, we must take it as a fact—I hope my Honourable friend will take it as a fact—that we shall weaken the salutary provisions of this Act by such a definition of a medical practitioner; and that being the sole question—and the sole question before this House—I would invite the attention of this House to this—and this question only—and I hope that they will unanimously throw out Mr. Rangachariar's amendment.

(An Honourable Member: "I move that the question be now put.")

Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din (East Central Punjab: Muhammadan): Sir, there appears to be some understanding on both sides. The proposed definition in the Bill gives Local Governments the power to notify as "qualified medical practitioners" persons who are registered either under the Act of 1858 or under the subsequent local Acts, which have been passed in almost all provinces of India during the past ten years; and it further provides that where no such Act is in force, the Local Government is free to notify any person as a qualified medical practitioner for the purposes of this measure. Now, let us see who are possibly excluded from the category of practitioners if full operation is given to the definition as it stands. The Vaidis is the first class and Hakim is the second class of persons who are excluded but this is not all. There are practitioners of the western system of medicine who have not thought fit to get their names registered under the local Acts which have been passed in the various provinces, because they do not perhaps like to bind themselves and bring them under certain restrictions to which every person who is registered and is a member of the local medical council is subject. So, if the amendment proposed by Mr. Rangachariar is not adopted, the one result will be that such eminent men who have not thought fit to get themselves registered shall be excluded. That is to say, the Local Government shall not be in a position to notify them as "qualified medical practitioners" for the purpose of this Act.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: Can you name any such eminent men?

Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din: I can certainly point out some.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: Are there any such men? Can you name any now?

Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din: There are some non-co-operators who do not want to come under these Acts.

Then the second class of practitioners of western medical system who will be excluded is of those who were once registered as members of the Medical Councils, but who, for some technical reason, have been excluded from Councils, say for technical misconduct. Such gentlemen may not perhaps be fit to be registered as members of medical councils but yet if they are eminent practitioners and people have faith and confidence in them, there is no reason, if a Local Government deem it proper to notify them as qualified medical practitioners, why the Local Government should not be given an opportunity to do so. And as regards Vaid and Hakims, I quite agree that it is not fair on the part of Mr. Rangachariar that he should take advantage of this amendment incidentally to have a very complicated point solved one way or the other. The status of Vaid and Hakims is a big question and it should be fought in the local Councils. But as regards the first class of men, that is, men who practise the western medical system, they should not be excluded, especially when this is left to the discretion of the Local Government. It is not left to the discretion of any Legislative Council or a private individual. If the Local Government deems it fit to notify a certain person as a "qualified medical practitioner," even though he is not registered as such, I think the discretion of the Local Governments should not be fettered, and it should be left to them to notify such persons as "qualified medical practitioners" if they care to do so. Mr. Rangachariar is enlarging in a sense the definition, and is not narrowing it, and I have no apprehension, absolutely no fear, that a Local Government will ever, in any case, notify a Hakim or a Vaid as a "qualified medical practitioner" for the purposes of this Act.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Then the amendment is superfluous.

Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din: No, it is not. I have pointed out that there are two important classes of men who stand a chance of not being notified as "qualified medical practitioners" under this Act if the amendment proposed by Mr. Rangachariar is carried. I would join issue with those who hold that there are no medical practitioners who have kept themselves aloof from the so-called medical councils. There are such men; I need not name them; I know some of them. Similarly, there are men who have been excluded. And if there are such men, a Local Government must be given an opportunity to notify them as qualified medical practitioners if it deems fit to do so, for the purposes of this Act. For this reason I support the amendment, though there is a danger indeed of its being extended by some Local Governments beyond the proper limits.

(Several Honourable Members: "The question may now be put.")

Mr. President: The amendment moved is:

"In clause (i) of clause 2 (1) the words 'in any area where no such last-named Act is in force' be omitted."

The motion was negatived.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I have been asked by Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed to move the amendment* which stands in his name. He has given me authority to move it. The question which his amendment raises is a very difficult question. It has been adverted to by the Members of the Select Committee. If Members of the House will look at the last paragraph on the front page, they will see that the Joint Committee advert to this question in the following words:

"A much larger question which arises with regard to seamen is the possibility of applying the Act in the case of the crews of vessels registered, whether in or outside of British India, under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. We realise that there are important legal difficulties in providing an alternative remedy in the cases of such seamen, but we recommend that the whole question be taken up with the British Government."

The question to which this amendment invites your attention is the question relating to the compensation to Indian lascars not serving in foreign registered vessels but in vessels having, as it were, an Indian domicile. Steamers that ply between the ports of Bombay, Madras, Calcutta and foreign ports have all, as Honourable Members of this House know, their offices at those ports. Their agents are resident there and they live and carry on business within British India. Does the mere fact that the lascar suffers an accident outside the territorial waters of British India, take away the jurisdiction of the Indian Legislature to provide for the payment of compensation to their own seamen? That is the short question with which the Select Committee were confronted. I have read to you an extract from their report from which Honourable Members will see that they did not categorically decide that question one way or the other; they merely allude to it. One of the Honourable Members of that Select Committee, my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has referred to that question more in detail in his note at page 2, where he says:

"I am not satisfied that it is ultra vires for the Indian Legislature to legislate for Indian seamen employed in foreign registered ships."

Honourable Members will see that, though it may be an innovation in this country, Workmen's Compensation Acts have been for a large number of years in force in all civilised countries of the world and under the Acts of the Legislatures of those countries seamen are entitled to compensation. It is conceivable that a French, Italian or British seaman, serving in a French, Italian or British ship, may suffer an accident in American waters. He is entitled to compensation from the employers of his own country and, by parity of reasoning, he, who employs an Indian seaman in British India, should be held liable to pay him compensation here, irrespective and regardless of the place where the Indian seaman received his injury.

* "That in sub-clause (k) of clause 2 (1), the word 'registered' be omitted and after the word 'ship' the following be inserted:

'of not less than one hundred tons; and includes any Indian seaman who has entered into a contract of service with any shipping company or its agent or master of a ship in India'."

That is the view on first principles. But when we refer to the Government of India Act we find a very clear provision existing in the Act to provide for legislation of this character. Honourable Members are no doubt aware of the existence of section 65, clauses (a) and (c). I shall refresh their memory by reading them:

"The Indian Legislature has power to make laws for all persons, for all posts and for all places and things within British India and for all native Indian subjects of His Majesty without and beyond as well as within British India."

The Indian Penal Code in one of the earlier sections—section 3 or 4—provides for the punishment of Indians for offences committed outside British India. The jurisdiction attaches to persons, whether resident within British India or going outside of it. Consequently, the ex-territorial jurisdiction of the Indian Legislature is recognised and finds a place on the Indian Statute Book. Is there any exception in the case of a Workmen's Compensation Bill? If there were, I have no doubt, Sir, the pundits of the Legislative Department would have supplied us with chapter and verse and told us how and to what extent the Indian Legislature has not the power to legislate for Indian seamen receiving injuries outside the territorial waters of British India. I have no doubt that the Select Committee would have bowed to the sapience and wisdom of the Legislative Department. But we find no reference to it here. We merely find that it is written here that there are important legal difficulties. But, I submit, Sir, it was the duty of the Select Committee to face those difficulties. Have they done so? I submit, not. And if they have done so, surely no reference is made to any opinion of legal experts outside the Legislative Department whom they have asked and consulted on this important question of constitutional law. I submit, Sir, the mere fact that there is a legal difficulty should not have deterred the Select Committee from facing it when it was their duty to provide for compensation also in the case of Indian seamen. I have thus far referred to two aspects of the question. I have shown to the Members of this Honourable House that so far as we can see, the powers of the Indian Legislature are sufficiently ample to give the House the jurisdiction which it wants of legislating for compensation to Indian seamen. I have also shown that apart from a very vague allusion to legal difficulties it is not clear that any legal opinion was taken on the subject of the powers of the Indian Legislature. If any opinion is taken in future, let me beg of Honourable Members on the other side to avoid as danger signals those law officers of the Crown. Let them take the opinions of men who are conversant with Indian law and the Indian constitution. Now, Sir, I pass on to a third question, and that question is: assuming that this House has jurisdiction to legislate, should we legislate? I think on this point I and my friends on the Treasury Benches would be at one. I have no doubt that this beneficent piece of legislation will not be shorn of its utility and usefulness in excluding from its scope this very large class of deserving and hardworked workmen, namely, the Indian lascars. I shall not therefore dilate upon this last question. I shall rest content by formally moving my amendment and ask the Honourable House to support it.

Mr. K. O. Neogy (Dacca Division: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, I am one of those Members of the Joint Select Committee who feel very strongly that the benefits of the present Bill should be extended to the Indian seaman; but when we considered the matter in the Joint Select Committee we were confronted with the question as to how far it was competent for this Legislature to legislate for Indian seamen who were engaged on ships registered under the British Merchant Shipping Act. I must confess that so far as this question of legal difficulty was concerned, we had not the advantage of any outside legal opinion. We had to depend upon the advice which was tendered to us by the Legislative Department. I am very sorry I had not the opportunity of consulting Dr. Gour himself, for the very good reason, that he was not here at that time.

Now, Sir, the first answer that we got when we raised this question was that the benefits of the English Workmen's Compensation Act are available to the Indian seamen engaged on ships registered under the British Act. But I pointed out with reference to some particular cases of which I had papers with me showing the amount of difficulty which the Indian lascars has to experience while trying to get the benefits of the English Compensation Act. For instance, I had with me papers relating to cases of injured seamen residing in Calcutta who were asked to go to England in order to prove the nature of their injuries. In another case, where an Indian lascars had died as a result of an accident sustained at a French port, no compensation was received by his widow or other dependants. In yet another case I found that the mother of an unfortunate lascars who lost his life as a result of a similar accident wrote to the Government of India, to the Shipping Master, to the Marine Department of the Government of Bengal and other authorities asking for compensation.

That shows that these people are absolutely at a loss to find out as to which party to look to for help in these matters. So that, so far as these difficulties are concerned, I don't think that there is any question that the Indian lascars are deserving of every sympathy of this House.

Now, Sir, we have it on the authority of the Indian Seamen's Union of Calcutta that the class of lascars whom we are going to exclude from the benefits of this Act forms by far a large majority of the Indian lascars. In other words, for all practical purposes we are excluding all the Indian lascars from the benefits of the present Bill. Well, this is what the Indian Seamen's Union says with regard to this matter: "It practically deprives by far the major portion of the Indian seamen of their rights and privileges under the present legislation." Dr. Gour has referred to the Government of India Act, and he maintains that we have authority to legislate in this matter. I am not in a position to make any assertion in regard to that. But I would point out that the English Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 in section 125 recognises the right of the Indian Legislature to legislate in certain matters in regard to the engagement of lascars. This is what it says under the head 'Agreement with Lascars':

"The agreement shall be made in such form and contain such provisions and be executed in such manner and contain such conditions for securing the return of the lascars to his own country, and for other purposes, as the Governor General of India in Council or the Governor in Council of any Indian residency in which an agreement is made, may direct."

As I have already stated, I do not wish to dogmatise on this point, but I think this is a question which ought to be explored further than it has been up to now.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I entirely agree with Mr. Neogy's last sentence. I entirely agree that this very difficult question of Indian seamen does require further exploration, and as the House will see from the Joint Select Committee's Report, we have every intention of making that further investigation and exploration. All I want the House to do is not to be in too much of a hurry. We are up against here an extremely difficult question, a question which raises difficult points of constitutional law on which I for one am not in a position to give any opinion whatsoever. Now I should like to make it perfectly clear that I recognise and the Government recognise that we have to give in a Bill of this kind every consideration to the claims and needs of Indian lascar seamen. We have recognised that, and we always have recognised it. Let no one in this House think that we have not recognised that from the beginning and that we have not devoted a great deal of time and attention to the subject. We have. We discussed it in the Committee in July; we discussed it again in the Joint Select Committee. Now, the first objection I have to Mr. Ahmed's amendment is that obviously it goes a great deal too far. In the first place, the amendment as it stands makes absolute nonsense of the preceding clause in the Bill, so we can hardly accept it as it stands. And in the second place, the amendment as it stands goes a great deal further than even the English Workmen's Compensation Act has ever tried to go. The amendment states that it shall include any Indian seaman who has entered into a contract of service with any shipping company or its agent or master of a ship in India. That is to say, supposing a German or a French or a British ship or a ship of any other nationality comes to India, picks up a lascar seaman here and the lascar seaman enters into a contract with the master of the ship, that seaman is eligible for the benefits of the Bill. Now, the English Workmen's Compensation Act does not go as far as that. What it says is: "Members of the crew of any ship registered in the United Kingdom or of any other British ship or vessel, the owner or managing agent or manager resides or has his principal place of business in the United Kingdom." Mr. Ahmed's amendment goes further than that. He does not make it a sine qua non that the owner or managing agent or manager should have his place of residence in British India. Further, looking at it in another way, the amendment does not go far enough. Because, if we are going to introduce this provision into the Bill, Mr. Ahmed does not make any suggestion that we should make provision for the detention of a foreign ship. Supposing a man enters into a contract of service with the master of a foreign ship. While the ship is still in port, he suffers injury by accident. He gives notice of the accident and he lays his claim before the Commissioner. What is there to prevent the owner of that ship from clearing out of the port or going off to, it may be, France or Germany? The English Merchant Shipping Act makes provision in cases of that kind for detention. Mr. Ahmed's amendment does not go as far as that. Now, our difficulty is that the lawyers on the main point disagree. Dr. Gour seems to have no doubt that the Indian Legislature can make this Workmen's Compensation Bill cover accidents occurring outside the limits of British India. Our advice received from the Legislative Department was that it was very doubtful whether they could do so. We arrived at the conclusion that, if we introduced provision of this kind, it would merely cover the case of accidents occurring either when the ship was in the Indian port or when it was within Indian territorial waters. And we did not think it was going to do much good to introduce partial legislation to cover accidents of that limited class. What is the real grievance of the Indian lascar seaman serving on a British ship in this matter? You have got to remember that the lascar serving on a ship registered in the United Kingdom is covered by the English Workmen's Compensation Act already. He can, and he does, recover compensation under that Act. He has done so frequently. But we recognise that it must be inconvenient for a lascar to sue in the British courts and in the Industries Department, what we thought ought to be done was to see whether we could not provide him with an alternative remedy, the option of suing under the English Act in the English courts or of suing under the Indian Act in the Indian courts. And, if we can do that, then we shall have done far more for the lascar seaman than will be effected by Mr. Ahmed's amendment. Now, I have promised, we undertake to take up that question with the Board of Trade at Home. All I ask the House to do is this—I ask them to remember that this is an experimental Bill, that we are merely making a start with this Bill in a difficult piece of legislation. And I am quite prepared, when we have cleared up that question, to make further provision for the Indian lascar seaman and I hope the House will accept that as a reasonable solution for the present of a very difficult question.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, in view of the assurance given by the Honourable Mr. Innes, I beg to withdraw my amendment.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. N. C. Sircar: Sir, my amendment is:

"That in clause (2) (1) (m), the following be added at the end:
'or any bonus earned by the employee'."

This section deals with wages. It says:

"Wages includes any privilege or benefit which is capable of being estimated in money."

Bonus is a privilege which cannot be estimated. Bonus is generally paid occasionally for any good work done by any employee and it cannot be part of wages and cannot be estimated. For these reasons, Sir, I ask that the words "or any bonus earned by the employee" be added at the end of the clause.

Mr. A. G. Olow (Industries Department: Nominated Official): Sir, I rise to oppose this amendment. I am quite unable to see any difference between a bonus and wages. Mr. Sircar himself admits in his own amendment, by the use of the last four words that a bonus is earned by an employee. Let us suppose that this amendment is carried. How is the Commissioner to say what is a bonus and what is wages? Some mills—I can give instances to Mr. Sircar,—pay a weekly bonus, some mills pay a monthly bonus and some pay an annual bonus. There is no difficulty whatever in estimating the amount of the bonus. The amount of the bonus is announced in the company's reports and is published in the newspapers. It is known to the employer and to the worker. The only effect, if we agree to exclude a bonus, will be that the employers will gradually cease paying wages at all. Month by month they will hand over Rs. 20, Rs. 25 or Rs. 30 to the employee and say: "This is a bonus which I give you because you have done excellent work for me." This is not a fanciful suggestion. At one time in an Income-Tax Act, they specified that salary would be included and bonus would not be included, and the result was that they gradually found that salaries were disappearing and that bonuses were increasing correspondingly. I ask the House to do justice to workmen. What we are trying to do is to give compensation that will bear some relation to the earnings of the workman before he was injured. Mr. Sircar himself admits that this is part of the workman's earnings, and I ask the House to include it in his wages.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. N. C. Sircar: Sir, my next amendment is :

" That in sub-clause (n) (ii) of clause 2 (1), for the word ' three ' the word ' one ' be substituted."

My ground for moving this amendment is this. A workman generally does not get more than Rs. 100 as a monthly wage. It is only Supervisors who get a higher pay than Rs. 100, and the workmen generally never get more than Rs. 100. I therefore ask that the word " three " be substituted by the word " one ".

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: Sir, the Honourable gentleman has not given any arguments at all in support of his amendment. I do not really think it is necessary to waste the time of the House at this late hour of the day. I only want to say, Sir, that ordinarily, there ought not to have been any limitation with regard to wages, especially as we had put in other limitations in other parts of the Bill. But we purposely wanted to limit the application of this Bill to the poorer classes, to the lower middle classes, that is to say, to the artisans, the skilled artisans, and the foremen in the factories. A great many of them do earn more than Rs. 100 a month now-a-days and I think it would be extremely unjust to a very deserving class of artisans, skilled mechanics and people of that type if my Honourable friend Mr. Sircar's amendment is carried.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 2, as amended, do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: In view of the fact that there is an important Select Committee sitting this afternoon, I propose to adjourn now.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Monday, the 5th February, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Monday, 5th February, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock.
Mr. President was in the Chair.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

INTEREST-FREE ADVANCES FOR PASSAGES TO EUROPE.

318. Lieutenant-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: (a) Will Government be pleased to state why Government servants of Asiatic domicile have been excluded from the recent concession of interest-free advances for passages to Europe?

(b) Does not the concession in effect apply, almost exclusively, to officers in the Imperial Services?

(c) If it is thought that facilities are required to enable Government servants of non-Asiatic domicile to visit their homes, do Government contemplate granting similar advances to Government servants employed in Delhi who wish to visit their homes, for example, in Madras?

(d) Will an advance be granted to a Government servant of Asiatic domicile who has made or proposes to make his home in England or to visit that island on medical advice for reasons of health, or to such a Government servant who wishes to educate his children there?

(e) Is it a fact that Government servants of non-Asiatic domicile already draw additions to their salaries in the way of overseas allowance and, in some instances, higher salaries than those fixed for the same posts when not held by officials recruited outside India?

(f) If so, will Government be pleased to state why at this late date it is necessary to super-add a concession which is denied to other officials?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) Because the officer of non-Asiatic domicile is not working in his own country whereas officers of Asiatic domicile are.

(b) No. It is being extended to officers of non-Asiatic domicile in the provincial services.

(c) No. The concession has been granted entirely on account of the high cost of passages to Europe.

(d) This is not permissible under the rules for the reason stated in answer to part (a).

(e) Officers of non-Asiatic domicile in certain departments who are drawing pay under a time-scale receive overseas pay. At present certain officers of Asiatic domicile also draw this pay, but new entrants, except Indians entering the Indian Civil Service by means of the open Competitive examination in London, until 1925, draw pay according to domicile, only those of non-Asiatic domicile being eligible for overseas pay. There is no overseas pay for posts above the time-scale, and there is no differentiation in pay according as the incumbent is of Asiatic or non-Asiatic domicile.

(f) The Honourable Member is referred to the answer to parts (a) and (c) of this question.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: The Honourable Member in reply to part (c) of my question stated that the concession was due to the high cost of passages in force now. I should imagine that this reason should apply equally to the excessive railway rates that obtain to-day in India.

Mr. President: That is not a supplementary question. That is an assertion.

CONCESSIONS TO TEA-GARDEN COOLIES ON A. B. RAILWAY.

319. Rai Bahadur G. O. Nag: 1. With reference to the information supplied privately to me in reply to my question No. 165 asked on the 17th January, 1923, that concessions in fares have been granted by the Assam Bengal Railway to coolies of tea-gardens in Assam firstly because the Railway has directly benefited by the development of the tea industry in Assam, and secondly because the coolies on the expiry of their employment on tea-gardens settle down and help in adding to the sources of revenue to the Government of Assam by clearing jungle and taking up land for cultivation, will the Government kindly ascertain from the said Railway since when these concessions have been granted, and since when the Railway discovered that these concessions could be justified on the two grounds mentioned?

2. Will the Government ascertain from the said Railway if it grants such concessions to the people who annually migrate in large numbers to Assam merely to take up land and settle down as cultivators?

3. Are the Government of India aware of the large influx of immigrants in recent years from the Eastern Bengal districts to Assam who have helped in reclaiming waste-lands in Assam? Are such people granted concessions in fares by the Assam-Bengal Railway? If not, why not?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The information is being obtained from the Agent, Assam Bengal Railway, and will be communicated to the Honourable Member in due course.

TONNAGE OF MERCHANT MARINE.

320. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: What is the gross tonnage of the Merchant Marine respectively of (1) Great Britain, (2) France, (3) Spain, (4) Portugal, (5) Japan, (6) America and (7) India?

Mr. A. H. Ley: The gross tonnage of vessels of 100 tons and over as recorded in Lloyd's Register Book, 1922-23 edition, belonging to the countries specified is as follows:

Great Britain	19,295,637
France	3,845,791
Spain	1,282,757
Portugal	285,878
Japan	3,586,918
The United States of America	17,062,460
India and Ceylon	235,100

These figures include steamers and motor vessels and in several cases also sailing ships. The figures given for the United States of America include those of vessels plying on the Great Lakes.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Cannot we have any figures for India alone without Ceylon?

Mr. A. H. Ley: I must ask for notice of that question.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: The question did not ask for figures for Ceylon at all.

INDIAN COASTAL TRADE.

321. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: What is the total amount of Indian coastal trade? How much of it is served by Indian Merchant Marine and how much by Merchant Marines of other countries?

Mr. A. H. Ley: The Honourable Member is referred to the "Annual statement of the Coastal Trade and Navigation of British India" which contains all the statistical information available about coastal trade.

INDIAN SHIPPING COMPANIES.

322. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: How many Indian Shipping Companies were started during the past 50 years? How many of them succumbed and why? How many of them still survive?

Mr. A. H. Ley: The Honourable Member is referred to the answer given to a somewhat similar question (No. 186) asked by the Honourable Mr. Lalubhai Samaldas in the Council of State on the 24th March, 1922. I may add that a later issue of the Statistical Department publication "Joint Stock Companies in British India and Mysore," i.e., for 1919-20, has also been placed in the Library.

DEFERRED REBATE SYSTEM.

323. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) What is "deferred rebate system"? How much is this rebate granted by Shipping Companies to shippers in and from India? Which companies grant this rebate and why?

(b) Is it a fact that this "deferred rebate" is granted only by Shipping Companies belonging to foreign countries for the purpose of keeping shippers in hand?

Mr. A. H. Ley: I am afraid that I cannot undertake to give within the limits of an answer to a question a description of the system known as the 'deferred rebate' system. The whole subject has recently been under inquiry by the Imperial Shipping Committee at home, and I hope to be able shortly to place in the Library a copy of the Imperial Shipping Committee's report which will give the Honourable Member full information.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Is it a fact that a part of the deferred rebate system is that the rebate is paid at the end of a specified period and is forfeited if the party entitled to it happens to give his custom elsewhere.

Mr. A. H. Ley: I believe that is so.

RATE WAR AMONG SHIPPING COMPANIES.

324. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Is it a fact that a sort of rate war exists among foreign shipping companies as against Indian Companies?

(b) If the system of "deferred rebate" and of rate war exist in India do Government propose to make these systems impossible by Statute?

Mr. A. H. Ley: The Government of India have no information regarding the alleged rate war. They propose to take no action in regard to the deferred rebate system until they have been able to study the report referred to in the answer to the previous question.

AIDS TO SHIPPING FIRMS.

325. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Have the Government of India, in the past, given any direct or indirect aid to any Indian National Shipping firm, such as bounties, mail contracts or subscriptions, cheap loans, preferential railway rates, reservation of coastal trade and the like, with a view to encourage Indian ship-building and navigation as is done by other countries? If not, why?

(b) If the answer to the above question be in the negative, do Government propose to offer any such aid to Indian Shipping firms in the near future?

Mr. A. H. Ley: (a) Mail contracts are purely business transactions and differ intrinsically from the aids specified in the Honourable Member's question. The Government of India have given no assistance of the nature indicated to any shipping company whether registered in India or not.

(b) The Government of India have no present intention of doing so.

I would add that information regarding Mail services by steamers is given in Appendix XI to the Annual Report on the Posts and Telegraphs of India for the year 1921-22. The contract of the British India Steam Navigation Company expired on the 31st January last and has been extended for one year. It is proposed shortly to call for tenders. Mail Contract with the P. and O. S. N. Co. is arranged by His Majesty's Postmaster General and the payments are allocated between different administrations according to the Morley Award.

B. I. S. N. COY.'S TRADE.

326. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Is it a fact that the British India Steam Navigation Company has almost the total monopoly of carrying all coastal trade and mails in India? What was the amount received by this Company, from Government of India in 1921-22 for (i) carrying mails, (ii) carrying Government stores?

(b) What amount was paid in the same year to the P. & O. Company for similar purposes?

(c) When do contracts with these Companies expire?

(d) Do Government propose offering these contracts to Indian Shipping firms on the expiry of the above contracts with a view to encourage Indian National Shipping?

Mr. A. H. Ley: The Government of India have no information of the proportion of the coastal trade of India carried by the ships of the British India Steam Navigation Company.

Particulars asked for about the mail contracts and the payments made under them are being collected and will be furnished by the Department which deals with this subject. The Government of India have no knowledge what stores departments or Local Governments may at times have sent by sea from one port to another in India and do not propose to endeavour to collect it.

(d) The action that will be taken in this matter will be decided when the event arises.

RAILWAY PREFERENTIAL GOODS RATES.

327. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Is it a fact that Indian Railways or any of them, allow preferential rates to any foreign shipping companies for the carriage of such goods as are intended to be exported abroad; or imported from other countries?

(b) And is it a fact that railway freight rates for goods transported from one place to another within India and intended for local consumption are higher? If so, why?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) The reply is in the negative and (b) therefore does not arise.

INCOME FROM INCREASED POSTAL RATES.

328. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: 1. With reference to answers given by Sir Sydney Crookshank to supplementary questions to No. 249 on 23rd January, 1923, will Government please state (a) the income from increased postal rates sanctioned last year up to 31st January, 1923, or 31st December, 1922, (whichever be available) as compared with the income for the same period the year before? The income from Telegraphs to be excluded?

2. Has the anticipated income been reached?

3. What has been the cost during the above period of reprinting, overprinting, re-labelling, re-packing freight and all other incidental charges incurred in consequence of the increased postal rates?

4. Deducting this expenditure what has been the nett income from the increase in postal rates?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: The necessary information is being collected and will be supplied to the Honourable Member as soon as it is available.

VACCINE FOR BOVINE TUBERCULOSIS.

329. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Are the Government aware of the alleged discovery by the Pasteur Institute of Lille, of a vaccine for conferring immunity from tuberculosis on bovine animals and will they consider the advisability of instituting suitable inquiries of the French Government with a view of enabling the treatment to be introduced into this country as soon as possible?

Mr. J. Hullah: The researches referred to in the question are well known. In 1921, Mr. Edwards, now Director of our Bacteriological Institute, at Muktesar, was in personal communication with the Sub-Director of the Institute at Lille on the subject, but so far as he is aware the work has not yet gone beyond the experimental stage.

The question of bovine tuberculosis is receiving attention in the Muktesar Laboratory. Such statistics as are available indicate that the disease is rare in this country, and it has not yet been settled whether Indian cattle are more resistant than European cattle or whether the bacillus in India is less virulent than in Europe. Work on these problems has already been published in India and the Director of the Institute at Muktesar is now about to conduct further investigations. Bovine tuberculosis is one of the subjects for discussion at a veterinary conference to be held at Calcutta this month.

N.-W. F. COMMITTEE REPORT.

330. Dr. Nand Lal: (1) Is the Government of India aware that the public is anxious to know as to when the N. W. F. Committee Report will be out?

(2) Will the Government of India be pleased to state as to why its publication has been delayed?

(3) Will the Government of India be pleased to enlighten this Assembly as to when it (the aforesaid report) will be placed on the table?

Mr. Denys Bray: (1) Yes.

(2) The Report has only recently reached Government in its complete form and is still under consideration.

(3) I regret that I am unable to give the Honourable Member the information for which he asks.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON PUBLIC SERVICES.

331. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Will Government kindly state what expenditure was incurred by it on the Royal Commission on Public Services in India respectively in 1886-87 and 1916?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Commission of 1886-87 was not a Royal Commission. It was appointed by the Governor General in Council. The expenditure incurred on it in that year was Rs. 8,29,784. Some expenditure was also incurred in the following year but actual figures are not available.

The total cost of the Royal Commission in 1912-15 was Rs. 12,28,159. It has recently been ascertained that the figure given by Sir William Vincent in reply to a question asked in the Assembly by Mr. M. K. Reddi Garu in September, 1921, did not include expenditure incurred in England which has been included in the above estimate.

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

LICENSE FOR RAILWAY VENDORS.

141. Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: 1. Is it a fact that vendors of articles of food, etc., are not allowed to sell those articles to passengers on railways without making some payment to the Railways for that sort of license?

2. Is this sort of tax permissible under any rule or law, if so, what?

3. Are not the Railways bound to look to the convenience of passengers while travelling without any direct or indirect taxation?

4. Will the Government be pleased to state what is the total amount thus realized by the Railways within the last 3 years and do Government propose to stop the practice in future?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (1) Yes.

(2) and (3) This is not a tax.

The ordinary practice is that a small charge is made to vendors and contractors licensed to sell sweetmeats, etc., on station platforms, and it is to the convenience of passengers as well as of railways that only authorised vendors subject to railway control and inspection should be allowed on the platforms.

(4) Government is not in possession of the information and as at present advised do not propose to take up the question of interfering.

REDUCTION OF B. N. RAILWAY STAFF AT KHARAGPUR.

142. Mr. N. M. Joshi: (a) Is it a fact that a large reduction has been made in the low-paid Indian staff in the Bengal-Nagpur Railway workshop at Kharagpur?

(b) Is it also a fact that the number of working days and the daily hours of work have been reduced so as to considerably reduce the earnings of the employees who are working?

(c) Will Government be pleased to explain why this step has been taken?

(d) Will Government be pleased to state what they propose to do to remedy the sufferings caused by the unemployment or insufficient employment? and

(e) Is it a fact that at this very time or only a short time ago some highly paid officers have been appointed on the above-mentioned Railway?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) The services of a certain number of daily paid staff in the Bengal Nagpur Railway workshop have been terminated. The men affected were unsatisfactory workers.

(b) Short time in the Kharagpur Workshop has been introduced.

(c) This step has been taken for financial reasons.

(d) Government propose to take no action as the services of only those men have been terminated whose work did not justify retention.

(e) I presume that the Honourable Member means to enquire whether additional highly paid posts have recently been created and if so this is not the case.

THE AMBALA CANTONMENT COMMITTEE.

143. Mr. Pyari Lal: 1. Is it a fact that the Ambala Cantonment Committee has refused to entertain applications for the construction of upper storeys in that cantonment since June 1922?

Is it a fact that on a reference by the All-India Cantonments Association to the Lahore District on the subject, the District Commander has denied the existence of any such prohibitory order under its letter No. 20537-9-Q-2, dated the 20th December, 1922 to the Honorary Secretary of the Association?

5. Do the Government propose to direct the Cantonment Committee, Ambala, to entertain and consider such applications, on their merits?

6. Is the Government aware, that in several cases, the applicants gave written assurances that no pipe water shall be used in the construction?

7. Do the Government propose to take immediate action on the matter?

Mr. E. Burdon: 1—7. Government have no information on the subject, but are inquiring. I will inform the Honourable Member of the results as soon as possible.

THE BENARSI DASS HIGH SCHOOL, AMBALA.

144. Mr. Pyari Lal: 1. Is the Government aware that an application for the construction of upper storey in the Benarsi Dass High School, Ambala, was delayed in the Cantonment office for more than six weeks and then rejected?

2. Is it a fact that the applicant informed the Secretary, Cantonment Committee, of his treating the application as sanctioned under Section 92 (1) of the Cantonment Code, and asked him to return the plans?

3. Is it a fact, that instead of returning the plans, the Secretary stopped the applicant on a public road and insulted him by saying that he blindly signed the letter for the return of the plans under the influence of his "Jackals"?

4. Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the "Cantonment Advocate" of 25th November, 1922 giving details of the above incident?

5. Will the Government be pleased to state the facts of the incident?

6. If the facts be as stated in the "Advocate," will the Government take necessary action in the matter?

7. If so, will the Government be pleased to state what action it proposes to take?

Mr. E. Burdon: 1—7. The Government of India have no information on the subject but are inquiring. I will let the Honourable Member know the results as soon as possible.

CANTONMENT ADMINISTRATION.

145. Mr. Pyari Lal: 1. Is it a fact that the control of civic Cantonment Administration has now been transferred from the Q. M. G., Army Headquarters to the Commands?

2. If so, is the Government aware that there is no civic expert on the staff of the Commands?

3. Will the Government consider the desirability of appointing such an expert to the staff of the Commands?

4. Has the Government seen the article headed "Decentralisation in the Army Department", published in the "Cantonment Advocate" of 25th December, 1922?

5. Is the Government aware that as stated in the aforesaid article, the All-India Cantonments Conference has already passed a Resolution to request the Government to transfer this control to its civic Department?

6. Has the Government considered this suggestion? If so, with what result? If not, will the Government be pleased to give it their early consideration?

Mr. E. Burdon: 1. The process of decentralising control is now generally under consideration by Government. A partial delegation to Commands has already taken place.

2. Yes.

3. The question of appointing officers to assist the General Officers Commanding-in-Chief in exercising control is being examined.

4 and 5. Yes.

6. As I have already indicated in my reply to the first part of the question, the whole matter of the future administration of cantonments is, at the present moment, under consideration.

NON-OFFICIALS ON CANTONMENT COMMITTEES.

146. Mr. Pyari Lal: 1. Is the Government aware that there is great dissatisfaction in Cantonments at the nomination of the non-official members of the Cantonment Committees, under Section 4 of the existing Cantonment Code?

2. Has the attention of the Government been drawn to an article headed "Why is election delayed", published in the "Cantonment Advocate" of 25th December 1922?

3. Is the Government aware that the Government of India Cantonment Reform Committee has urged on page 86 of its printed Report that "action" on such of their proposals as can be given effect to, should not be delayed?

5. Will the Government be pleased to state the reasons why action has not been taken to give effect to the Reform Committee's recommendation regarding the introduction of elective principle in Cantonment Committees so far, by a modification of Section 4?

6. Will the Government be pleased to do so now?

7. Is the Government aware that there is great misunderstanding in cantonments with regard to the genuineness of Cantonment Reform, owing to the great delay in its introduction?

Mr. E. Burdon: 1. Government are aware that a change of the existing system is desired in certain quarters.

2, 3 and 4. Yes.

5 and 6. Government have decided to introduce legislation which will provide, amongst other things, that a certain number of the members of cantonment committees should be elected members; but they consider that it is unnecessary and would not be convenient to introduce this particular change in advance of their wider proposals.

7. No.

LALA GULZARI LALL OF CANTONMENT COMMITTEE, NEEMUCH.

147. Mr. Pyari Lal: 1. Is the Government aware that no action has been taken so far in restoring Lala Gulzari Lall to his seat on the Cantonment Committee of Neemuch as was contemplated by the Government reply No. 13668/3 (A. Mr. E. Burdon: 1—3. Enquiries are being made in the matter and I will inform the Honourable Member of the result as soon as possible.

AMRITSAR GRIEVANCES.

148. Mr. Pyari Lal: 1. Is it a fact that the action contemplated in the Government reply dated 23rd October, 1922 to my question regarding (Amritsar Grievances) has not yet been taken?

3. Will the Government be pleased to state reasons why action has not been taken so far in the matter as indicated by the Government reply quoted above?

4. Is the Government aware that both the question and reply were published in the Cantonment Advocate of 25th October and 10th November, 1922 respectively?

5. Does the Government know that the non-cancellation of the order even after the Government's admission of its illegality, has given rise to grave discontent in Amritsar and other cantonments?

6. Will the Government be pleased to take immediate action in the matter?

Mr. E. Burdon: 1—6. Enquiries are being made, and I will let the Honourable Member know the result as soon as possible.

THE CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley (Home Member): I have to introduce:

"The Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, the European Vagrancy Act, 1874, the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, and the Central Provinces Courts Act, 1917, in order to provide for the removal of certain existing discriminations between European British subjects and Indians in criminal trials and proceedings."

The Bill has already been introduced by publication, and therefore under the rules I have not to ask for the leave of the House to introduce it. But the circumstances are so unusual and I myself feel the occasion in some sense to be so momentous that I cannot content myself simply with laying the Bill on the table of the House. There is possibly no question on which European and Indian feeling in this country has been more divided than in regard to the maintenance of racial distinctions, as we use the term, in criminal trials. There is no question on which antagonism has been more pronounced. To me therefore this is not merely a question of revising a chapter of our Criminal Procedure Code; it is not merely a question whether we should attempt a formal improvement of procedure in a sphere of justice, where, it is alleged that justice has often broken down. These may be important objects in themselves; but the character of this Bill transcends them; there are aspects of the question which bring it almost to a different plane. I would ask the House to consider with me all the circumstances of the case. I shall not attempt to go into the long history of the conflict between the communities on this question; nor need I revive memories of the embittered controversy of 40 years ago. That is past, and those memories had best stay in the past which holds them. But I emphasize this fact only, that for 40 years we have made no movement designed to bring us together on a question the solution of which is vital if we are to secure understanding and good will between the two communities. Other barriers which seemed irremovable have yielded; and claims which at first seemed impossible have been conceded. But here we have stood fast. To the Indian the retention of the trial privileges of Europeans has appeared to be the wanton ~~assertion~~ ^{assertion} of a claim of superiority on the part of one race over the other. If that seemed inexcusable in itself, it was aggravated by the general belief, supported in some cases by statements of judicial authority, that the retention of these privileges had on occasion led to a complete denial of justice. If that has been the Indian view, we ought at the same time to remember what the European view has been. To Englishmen there is no more deeply-rooted tradition than that of the inviolable right of trial by a jury of their own countrymen. Further than this, a large portion of our English population out here does not come to India of its own choice, for those who are in the British Army in India are drafted here in the course of their military service. Then again you must also remember that there have been occasions, some of them unfortunately in the not distant past, when racial feeling has run so high that Europeans here might well be justified in believing that there was a danger that false prosecution, tainted evidence and social pressure on the Indian Magistracy, might involve a real denial of justice to them.

But I do not wish to enlarge on the picture as it appeared to one side or the other. I can speak to-day of the case as it stands to-day, and not as it stood in the long yesterday. For to-day, for the first time in 40 years, we have the earnest of a solution of this question. The House knows well the stages by which we have proceeded to this Bill. It is not a Government proposal; it is based on the recommendations of a Committee as representative, as impartial in temperament and as skilled in law as we could ever hope to attain. There were only three officials on it; one, I regret to say, no longer an official of the Crown, though I think the Crown has no more loyal friend. Much as India owes to Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, not the least of its debts will be to him as Chairman of this Committee; and much as the Committee itself was indebted to his legal acumen and great knowledge of the law, his greatest contribution was the sense of moderation and of equity with which he guided its deliberations. There were on that Committee in all six Europeans, nine Indians and one representative of the Anglo-Indian community. Their final conclusion was admittedly a compromise. While it proposed to withdraw many of the exclusive privileges enjoyed by the European British subject, yet on the other hand it sought to improve the position of Indians generally in regard to criminal trial procedure. Whatever the fate of this Bill, yet the report of the Committee is in itself a great achievement; history will recognize that it exhibited a spirit of tolerance and a sense of moderation rare in the affairs of life and perhaps unique in the annals of India. All honour is due to the representatives of two communities which could arrive at a common understanding on a question with such a past, so pregnant with difficulties, and so rife with points of difference.

We have translated that understanding into our Bill. There are of course some exceptions; the House knows them, and I do not wish to dilate on them save in two points of importance. If His Majesty's Government have been unable to agree that Dominion subjects should be deprived of the status which they now enjoy in common with the European British subject, and if in addition they have had to make a reservation regarding the transfer of certain classes of cases to the High Courts, nevertheless I do not think their attitude should be misinterpreted. They have not stood out against the proposals of the Committee in regard to the withdrawal in great bulk of European privileges generally. So far they have followed the common understanding on which the Committee arrived. But as regards Dominion subjects, they had a peculiar and a difficult position. We know well the feelings of India on the subject of franchise and other disabilities which Indians suffer in the Dominions; I think there are few Englishmen in India who do not sympathise with them. But, at the same time I do not think that India can cavil if His Majesty's Government, with an outlook on the essential solidarity of the Empire as a whole—and especially at this time—were unable to accede to a measure which in their belief would alienate the Empire from India, and destroy all chance of bringing into full effect that Resolution of reciprocity to which the greater part of the Empire representatives agreed. Then, again, as regards the reservation in respect of transfer in certain cases of charges against men coming under the Army Act, here also His Majesty's Government stood in a special position. As I have said, the majority of these men come out to India not of their own choice, but because they are drafted here in the course of their Military service. As a result of this Bill they will already be in a position less favourable than that which they enjoy in England under the English Law. It is not unreasonable that His Majesty's Government should seek by this measure of reservation to prevent any discontent which might arise in the British Army owing to the reduction under this Bill of privileges which they now enjoy in offences which do not fall within the special category.

Here then the case now stands. Perhaps the greatest achievement of the Committee is that whereas the present discrimination in trial procedure turns in part on the race of the trying Magistrate, that distinction has now gone. Such privileges as the European will retain will be privileges of procedure only; there will be no provision in our Code which lays down that a European should not be tried by an Indian. That in itself is an advance exceeding even the most optimistic expectations of those who considered the question 10 or even 5 years ago. There are no doubt those who are disappointed that the privileges now enjoyed by European British subjects will not be entirely withdrawn; and there may be others, who while they do not go to this length, are dissatisfied with the details of the Bill. But, is India, for that reason, prepared to reject a measure which shows that the two communities are prepared to arrive at a common understanding on a question which has for many years kept them apart? The solution is not a final one. It offers no obstacle to further advance on the road which has already been marked out. Indians have evidence that Europeans resident in India are prepared to place a growing confidence in the sense of justice of Indian Magistrates and of Indian Courts. More than that, they have patent proof, for all the world to see, that the European community in order to foster that goodwill with Indians, which is so vital to both communities, are prepared to make sacrifices of principle and to surrender safeguards to which they had hitherto held with great tenacity. Believe, me, the sacrifices that they are prepared to make are to them no light ones. I am quite sensible that Indians who have joined in this compromise have also, on their side, felt that they were making sacrifices in that they withdraw their claim for a full cancellation of all privileges enjoyed by European British subjects. But it is just those mutual surrenders that give the understanding its unique value. It is only by mutual surrender that you can ever arrive at a solution of differences which strike so deeply into the life of two communities. Whatever confidence you may have in the ability of India to shape its own course, and ultimately to gain a position in the Empire which will satisfy its own aspirations, no one can doubt that if in that struggle it carries with it the goodwill and secures the co-operation of Europeans in India, the advance will be more rapid and the foundations of its position will be more secure. (Hear, hear.) It is because I feel that this Bill establishes a new landmark in the mutual understanding of Europeans and Indians; it is because I feel that it gives to India so conspicuous an opportunity of showing to the outside world a tangible proof that Europeans and Indians are prepared to work together with a mutual knowledge of each others difficulties and with a mutual desire to work together in a common understanding, that I commend it to this House. Of all things the spirit of compromise and goodwill is the most elusive. Capture it while you may, and enshrine it in an imperishable form in your Statute Book.

THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BILL.

Mr. President: The House will now resume consideration of the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill to define the liability of employers in certain cases of suits for damages brought against them by workmen, and to provide for the payment by certain classes of employers to their workmen of compensation for injury by accident.

Mr. K. O. Neogy (Dacca Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I have given notice of an amendment for the re-insertion of the provisions relating to employers' liability which were omitted from the Bill by the Select Committee. I move:

" That after Chapter I the following be inserted as Chapter I-A :

" CHAPTER I-A

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

Defence of common employment 3. Where personal injury is caused to a workman : barred in certain cases.

- (a) by reason of the omission of the employer to maintain in good and safe condition any way, works, machinery or plant connected with or used in his trade or business, or by reason of any like omission on the part of any person in the service of the employer who has been entrusted by the employer with the duty of seeing that such way, works, machinery or plant are in good and safe condition; or
- (b) by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has any superintendence entrusted to him, whilst in the exercise of such superintendence; or
- (c) by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer to whose orders or directions the workman at the time of the injury was bound to conform and did conform, where the injury resulted from his having so conformed; or
- (d) by reason of any act or omission of any person in the service of the employer done or made in obedience to any rule or bye-law of the employer (not being a rule or bye-law which is required by or under any law for the time being in force to be approved by any authority and which has been so approved) or in obedience to particular instructions given by any person to whom the employer has delegated authority in that behalf;

a suit for damages in respect of the injury instituted by the workman or by any person entitled in case of his death shall not fail by reason only of the fact that the workman was at the time of the injury a workman of, or in the service of, or engaged in the work of, the employer.

4. In any such suit for damages, the workman shall not be deemed to have undertaken any risk attaching to the employment unless Risk not to be deemed to have been assumed without full knowledge. the employer proves that the risk arising from any negligence, act or omission, referred to in section 3, was fully understood by the workman and that the workman voluntarily undertook the same.

5. The provisions of this Chapter shall not apply in the case of any suit for damages Limitation. in respect of an injury which is instituted after the expiration of six months from the date of the injury."

It will be noticed that I have taken these amendments verbatim from the clauses as they stood in the original Bill with a slight alteration in clause 4. Now, Sir, the distinction between workmen's compensation and employers' liability may be briefly stated to be this. This Bill, in the provisions relating to workmen's compensation, provides for an automatic remedy in the case of accidents arising out of the employment of any workman irrespective of any negligence on the part of the employer or any superintendent or any co-worker. But the employers' liability provisions relate to the workman's right to damages in cases where any injury has been sustained by him on account of any act, omission or negligence either on the part of the employer or any co-workman or a superintendent. Under the workmen's compensation provisions, there is a monetary limit to the amount of compensation, but under the ordinary law the employers' liability to pay damages to an injured workman, when the injury results from any negligence on the part of the employer, is not limited by any such monetary maximum. It is interesting to note that the necessity for legislation on employers' liability arose in England as early as 1880, while the first Workmen's Compensation Act was passed in 1897. This necessity arose in England because of the peculiar application of the doctrine of common employment of the Common Law of England to certain cases of accident which defeated the claims of the workmen on the ground that the injury was a result of any act or default of their fellow-workmen of different grades. Now the question has been raised as to whether the same necessity exists in India. It is admitted on all hands that, so far as this defence under the Common Law of England is concerned, it is an unjust defence, and the question is whether that defence is open to any employer in India. A learned Judge of the Madras High Court has asserted that the Judges of the Indian Courts could be depended upon not to apply that pernicious doctrine in India. But Mr. Justice Coutts-Trotter is only one among several Judges of one out of several High Courts in India, and while his opinion is entitled to great respect, I do not think it can be accepted on his authority that the High Courts will rule out any such defence. Besides, there is no knowing that there will be any uniformity of decision in this matter in the various High Courts. It may be said that the Common Law principle of common employment will not be applied to India because the Common Law rules do not apply to India; and that the principles of justice, equity and good conscience will guide the High Courts in India. But I think it has been pointed out by as high an authority as Sir Frederick Pollock that the Common Law principles are apt to be introduced into India, not as Common Law principles, but as principles of justice, equity and good conscience. After all, what do you lose by providing for any such contingency as may arise on the application of the doctrine of common employment in India? Turning now to objections taken not on legal grounds but on the merits of employer's liability, I find that the Bengal Chamber of Commerce is prominent among the objectors. But these provisions are unanimously approved by the Local Governments, and while the Bengal Chamber of Commerce takes exception to them I may point out that the Bombay Chamber of Commerce has given its positive approval to this proposal, and similarly other commercial bodies also have approved, or at least not signified their disapproval, of these provisions. Now the report of the Select Committee says that it has not been demonstrated to their satisfaction that the necessity for legislation on these lines has arisen in India, and that if the doctrine of common employment is aimed to be applied to such cases in India the defence of common employment and that of assumed risk should be removed not only from the very limited class of workmen to whom this Bill will apply, but from all workmen. I should have given effect to this recommendation of the Joint Committee in my amendment had it been open to us to do so, because we have already adopted the definition of 'workman' in clause 2; and therefore it is no longer open to us to change that definition for this particular chapter. I may suggest to the Government, if they are prepared to accept these provisions, to amend the definition of workman in another place so as not to place any restriction on the definition of workman so far at least as the employer's liability provisions are concerned,

On a point of order, Sir, shall I move each clause separately, or all the three clauses together? I have made certain changes in clause 4 of this chapter which may have to be explained later on. Really the discussion will turn upon clause 3, as to whether or not we are going to accept this provision.

Mr. President: As a matter of form, the Honourable Member had better move each clause separately.

Mr. K. O. Neogy: Therefore I beg to move clause 3 as read out by me.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadar Rural): Sir, before we proceed to the discussion of this clause I want a ruling from the Chair on one or two points. The first is whether the Mover is entitled to make changes or even a slight change as he called it in the wording of the three or four sections as they stood originally. I can quite understand that he could ask for the reinsertion of the old sections as they stood, but what he is now trying to do is to insert certain changes of his own from the original sections. Whether he can do that without any notice to us is the first point. Secondly, I want to know whether in the event of these sections being carried by the House I can move an amendment which would be a consequential amendment; because, there are certain sections in the English Act from which the Mover has got his amendment, on which I may base my amendments. Whether I would be allowed without notice to insert my consequential amendments, if his amendment is now carried, is the second point on which I seek your ruling.

Mr. President: I see no objection to the Honourable Member proposing to amend the Bill as it came back from the Joint Committee by inserting a clause in a somewhat different form, but we will deal with that point as it arises; it does not happen to arise on clause 3. On the other point raised by the Honourable Member as to whether he will be able to move amendments to this amendment without notice, I think on the understanding which we came to on Saturday I undertook that I would waive in principle at all events any objection which the Chair might uphold to want of notice; and unless very good reason is offered to me by objectors I shall continue to proceed on the course which I laid down for myself on Saturday.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member): Sir, I should just like to explain the position of Government in regard to this matter. I shall briefly begin by re-stating in my own words what I understand the English law in regard to employer's liability to be. Under the English common law the liability of an employer to compensate a workman for accident arising out of his employment used to be limited very seriously. Even if the workman could prove that the injury was due to the negligence of an agent of the employer, the employer had two important lines of defence open to him. One was what is known as the defence of common employment, and the other was the defence of assumed risk. Consequently as far back as 1880 before the English Government or any one had ever thought of workmen's compensation, the English Government passed the Employer's Liability Act. The effect of that Act was that it removed the defence of common employment; that is to say, if a workman was injured by reason of the negligence of any superintendent or manager or foreman, the employer was made liable. The Act did not affect the doctrine of assumed risk, though that defence has been removed in certain American Acts. It is important to notice in this connection that there is an essential difference between an Employer's Liability Act and a Workmen's Compensation Act. Under the former Act the workman has to prove negligence; under a Workmen's Compensation Act the workman has not to prove negligence. Therefore, a Workmen's Compensation Act is far more in favour of the workman than any Employer's Liability Act. Now, the original position of Government was this. We assumed that the Indian Courts would adopt as a matter of course the English common law in respect of this doctrine of common employment and we also assumed that they would adopt the doctrine of assumed risk; that is, we thought that in the event of a suit by a workman against an employer, the Indian courts would allow an employer to set up these two defences. Originally, our idea was, therefore that we should remove these two defences in India in respect of all workmen. We thought that prima facie defences of this kind were inequitable defences; and we thought it right and proper that we should not allow employers to set them up in India. That was our preliminary tentative position when we assembled our Committee in July last year. In the course of the discussions in that Committee we put forward that proposal, and we were warned by Mr. Macbridge, a very great expert on all questions of this kind, that if we made our employers liability clauses in this Bill applicable to all workmen in India, the inevitable result must be that we should open the door for a vast amount of litigation. Now, as I have frequently explained to this House, one of our main objects throughout this legislation has been to limit litigation as far as possible. Consequently as a result of our deliberations, that Committee recommended that the employer's liability clauses of the Bill should merely apply to the workmen covered by the workmen's compensation clauses. We in the Government, as our Notes show, recognised that that conclusion was not a particularly satisfactory one, but our policy in drafting the Bill was to follow as far as possible the advice of the July Committee. That was our policy, because we recognised from the first that the proposals included in this Bill must be in the nature of tentative proposals and that those proposals would be circulated and criticised all over India. But on further examination we found that we had landed ourselves in great difficulty, in a position which we really could not defend. If it is inequitable that the employer should be allowed to set up defence of this kind, it seems perfectly obvious that it is equally obvious that those defences should be removed, not in respect of particular classes of workmen, but in respect of all classes of workmen. On the other hand, as I have said just now, we were warned that if we did remove those clauses in respect of all classes of workmen, we would open the door to a large amount of litigation, and that was the position in which the Bill stood when we got to the Joint Committee.

Then again, on further examination we found reason to believe that the whole assumption on which we had proceeded was probably not well founded. As I have explained, we had always assumed that the Indian Courts would apply the English common law in this matter as a matter of course. Mr. Neogy has quoted the remarks of Mr. Justice Couts-Trotter in this matter. Mr. Justice Couts-Trotter, I may say, I happen to know, had a good deal of experience of workmen's compensation and employer's liability cases in England before he ever came to India, and what Mr. Justice Couts-Trotter says is this:

"The doctrine of common employment is now recognised as judge-made law and every writer of authority regards it as an illogical anomaly. I would rather leave it to the Indian Courts to reject its application in toto as an accident of the English law dictated neither by equity or good conscience which, I hope, they could be trusted to do rather than truckle with it, as has been done in section 4 of the Act."

Mr. Neogy says that there is no guarantee that Mr. Justice Couts-Trotter is right, that there is no guarantee that the Indian Courts will not apply this doctrine. But what I should have liked to hear from Mr.

[Mr. C. A. Innes.]

Neogy and from the other lawyers in this House is whether they can point to any case-law in India, whether they can point to any large body of case-law in India, which shows that the Indian Courts up to date have applied these two doctrines. I understand that there is one case on record, I believe there is a case reported in the Allahabad High Court which tended to show that the Courts would have adopted this doctrine of common employment. But I understand further that the remark was more in the nature of an obiter dictum than a considered judgment. Therefore that is my point. If we leave these clauses in the Bill, they will apply only to a limited class of workmen; and will do very little good to the limited body of workmen who are covered by this Bill. Those workmen will utilise the workmen's compensation clauses of the Bill; they will have nothing to do with the employer's liability clauses of the Bill. One has got to remember that in most countries of the world the Employer's Liability Act and the Workmen's Compensation Act are not really supplementary pieces of legislation; they are intended to provide alternative remedies. And you have also got to remember that the English Employer's Liability Act was passed as far back as 1880. It was passed in 1880, that is long before any Government in the world had conceived the idea of workmen's compensation. The English Employer's Liability Act was of the nature of a feeler in the direction of workmen's compensation legislation, and now that we have the workmen's legislation in England, what has been the result? The result has been that the Employer's Liability Act has become more and more of a dead letter. In the year 1918, I think I am correct in saying, that the total number of suits filed in England under the Employer's Liability Act was only 63, and the departmental committees of 1920 which sat on this matter in England, pointed out that the comparative success of the first Workmen's Compensation Act and the comparatively very limited operation of the Employer's Liability Act made it clear that it was along the lines of workmen's compensation rather than employer's liability that the future legislation of this class must develop. Now we are beginning, we have got all experience behind us, we can choose on what lines we are going to proceed, and we have chosen to proceed at once without the preliminary step of an Employer's Liability Act, upon the lines of the workmen's compensation, and I think that that being so, the Employer's Liability Act is for the moment unnecessary. As I have pointed out, these sections, if Mr. Neogy's amendment is passed, will apply only to a very limited class of workmen. The majority of the workmen will not use the Act at all. It may be of some limited use to the higher paid workmen who might be able to get higher damages under the Employer's Liability Act than under the Workmen's Compensation Act. But as I have shown, there is no certainty, there is no guarantee that the Indian Courts will apply these two doctrines at all. That being so, I suggest that it is wiser to leave the Courts to deal with the matter as they think fit and to reserve our legislation until the necessity for it has been proved, and if the necessity is proved, we should legislate, not for a very limited class of workmen, but for all workmen. In this view, Sir, I hope that the House will reject this amendment.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: Sir, I speak with a certain amount of diffidence on this amendment of Mr. Neogy on the ground that I am not a lawyer and not fully conversant with the section of the Employer's Liability Act of England of 1880. But, it seems to me, Sir, that Mr. Neogy who was a Member of the Joint Committee which considered this Bill has now as an after-thought proposed to insert all these sections which the Joint Committee after a great deal of deliberation thought fit to omit. The question involved is this, whether in addition to the remedy which we give to the ordinary workman we should provide an alternative remedy, namely, by incorporating the additional provisions of the Employer's Liability Act of 1880, or whether we should give him the rough and ready remedy which the Workmen's Compensation Bill provides; and secondly, if we give him an additional remedy by the employer's liability sections, whether we should take away the right of defence or two defences which an employer might be able to raise in the Courts in defence of himself.

Mr. Neogy thinks that if it is not sufficient that the remedy provided by the Compensation Bill alone should be allowed. He wants an additional and an alternative remedy. Now, I do not think it would serve the interests of the workman himself to have an additional remedy. As my friend, the Honourable Mr. Innes, has pointed out, there is an amount of litigation involved in that proposal. Those who have read the provisions of the Employer's Liability Act of 1880 and have also read the literature that has sprung around it owing to the interpretations of each and every section of the Act will be almost bewildered, and I am sure if they go through the whole literature they will find that it is far better to leave the Employers' Liability Act alone. Now, if you adopt Mr. Neogy's amendment, as Mr. Innes pointed out there might be litigation over each and every word and phrase in these clauses. The defences that are likely to be raised are: what do you mean by "Superintendent"? Is he the properly authorised superintendent? Then, the question will be raised whether the workman did not enter the service voluntarily or the principle or the maxim of law which the lawyers call volenti non fit injuria even if you shut out the doctrine of common employment. Now, how is the ordinary workman in India to fight in the Court against these subtle and ingenious arguments which might be raised. It only means he will have to go into the hands of the lawyers and we want to save him in the Workmen's Compensation Bill from going into the hands of the lawyers in order to fight out such subtle interpretation of law, as to whether it was an assumed risk or whether the man entered the service knowing full well the service which he was entering into and whether also, secondly, he was not more highly paid than similar classes of workers outside because there was a greater hazard. Now, all these subtle interpretations of law he will have to face through his lawyer and I think it is far better not to entangle him in these different provisions of law. Then, again, my friend, Mr. Neogy, while stating his case, pointed out that one great advantage of giving the alternative remedy to the workman is that, if he wants to sue the employer under the provisions of the employer's liability section, there would be no limit to the damages that might be claimed for. I do not know whether he is quite correct in the statement of facts. The Employer's Liability Act, 1880, does not show any such thing. (Mr. K. C. Neogy: "What about the present Bill?") Indeed, if you want to be equitable at all, and I am sure my friend, Mr. Neogy, wants to be equitable, if he wants to copy the provisions of the Employers' Liability Act in this Compensation Bill, then in a sense of fairness it is also necessary that he should adopt section 3 of the Employer's Liability Act, which provides a limit to the damages. It is not correct to say that a workman can go to the Court and claim damages even to the extent of ten or fifteen thousand rupees. The Employers' Liability Act, if he has read it correctly, does provide a limit in section 3. That section lays down that the amount of compensation recoverable under this Act (i.e., the Employers' Liability Act) shall not exceed such sum as will be found to be more than his estimated earnings during the three years preceding the injury. Now, it is not correct to say that the workman can go and claim any amount of damages under the Employers' Liability Act. The utmost he can claim is a sum not more than 3 years' earnings preceding the injury. Now, I want to ask Mr. Neogy whether he is prepared to accept as a consequential amendment, if his amendment is carried, my amendment that section 3 of the Employers' Liability Act shall also be inserted in this Chapter. (Mr. K. C. Neogy: "No, no.") Now, if he is not prepared to accept that, then I say he is inequitable and unfair. Because you are giving two remedies or two weapons to the workman, and it is not fair that he should have these two remedies and that, at the same time, you should take away the two defences from the employer, namely, the defence of common employment and the defence of assumed risk. The two things go together and I think, if this House is not prepared to have section 3, namely, the section which puts a limit to the amount of damages claimable, that the other sections should be inserted according to the amendment of Mr. Neogy. I have no serious objection to Mr. Neogy's amendment on the merits, but I contend that if he wants to insert those provisions of the Employers' Liability Act of 1880, then, I say, equity requires that section 3 also of that Act ought to be incorporated and ought to be copied here. I do hope the House will see that it is fair and just and equitable that section 3 of the Employers' Liability Act is also embodied in the Act, if the sections which Mr. Neogy wants to insert are carried in this House.

Mr. N. M. Joshi (Nominated: Labour Interests): Sir, I think there is some misapprehension in the mind of my Honourable friend, Mr. Kamat, about these sections giving an alternative remedy to the workman. I think he was led to believe that, on account of some remarks which fell from my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes. Mr. Innes said that in some countries the Employers' Liability Act is enacted as an alternative remedy. But neither was the Employers' Liability Act so enacted in England as an alternative remedy nor are the sections which Mr. Neogy wants to put in here also an alternative remedy. The alternative remedy, both in England and in India, exists already. Even if the sections may not be in the Bill, the alternative remedy will remain to the workman. My Honourable friend ought to refer, in order to be convinced of that, to section 5 of this Bill. Sub-section 5, clause 3, of the Bill deals with the alternative remedies. Therefore, it is absolutely clear that the sections which my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, wants to put in do not give a new alternative remedy. What these sections do, is to remove certain defences which employers can plead in England. That is the only thing which these sections do. But they do not give an alternative remedy at all. Sir, everybody seems to be agreed on the point that these sections are not quite adequate. If the employers' liability is to be defined, it must be defined for all workmen. But unfortunately the Government does not promise to bring forward another Bill immediately or within a short time, in order to 'define employers' liability. If the Government would promise to bring forward another Bill, I should certainly advise my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, to withdraw these sections from this Bill altogether because there is an advantage in having the employer's liability defined for all classes, and there is no difference of opinion on this point at all. In the absence of any such promise from the Government, however, I think it is better to have the employer's liability defined at least in the case of those workmen who are included in the Workmen's Compensation Act. My Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, has already explained that these sections will be particularly useful to those workmen who get wages varying from Rs. 80 to Rs. 300. I think there is a large number of workmen belonging to this class and these sections will be particularly useful to them. I therefore on the whole support the amendment of my friend, Mr. Neogy.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, if I were to give my vote as a member of the Bar I would have supported the amendment which has been proposed by Mr. Neogy. But I am afraid I have to give my vote as a legislator. And I have got to see not only the profit of the legal profession but I have got to see the other side also, that is the workman and the employer. Giving my deep consideration to this question, I feel constrained to oppose this amendment for a number of reasons. The first reason which has actuated me to stand in opposition to it is this, that it is sure to give rise to litigation and litigation of a very highly technical character, which may involve both the workman and the employer very seriously and perhaps both of them may become regular combatants in the law courts, which will mean, so far as my way of thinking goes, a great expense of money. Not only that. It will, no doubt, hamper the progress of the Workmen's Compensation Act also. These are the three grounds which compel me to go against my own profit and to be in favour of the development of industry in this country. I agree with Mr. Joshi when he says that we have got some other law in India which can come to the help and assistance of the workmen beyond the scope of the Workmen's Compensation Act. In spite of this knowledge of his, he yet supports the amendment, and it is extremely difficult for me to say that he is consistent. If there is any law according to his way of thinking, then he will have to accede to my contention that the present amendment is unnecessary. Is he really serious to over-burden our Statute Book? If a law is already in existence, as he himself admits, then this new law need not be devised. On that ground also the amendment according to the very argument of Mr. Joshi has got no force. The third ground is that which centres round the question of practicability. We cannot ignore that question, and I fully agree with the Honourable Mr. Innes when he very ably expressed this view, which view is based on history. When we look into the case law, we find that the Workmen's Compensation Act has been much more resorted to and the Employers' Liability Act was not used so frequently. The latter was not called in to help the workman, whereas the Workmen's Compensation Act was generally resorted to. Why? Because, the Workmen's Compensation Act gives you cut and dry material. Certain formulæ have been incorporated. A certain maximum amount of compensation, in some cases is allotted. The nature and description of injuries of a permanent character are fully described. The workman can understand very well what compensation he will be entitled to. He makes a reference to the employer. If the employer enters into an agreement or technically compromises, then he feels contented with that agreement. Otherwise he goes to the law court and seeks redress. From this we can easily deduce that this method is naturally more convenient to the workmen as well as to the employer and decidedly less expensive. Therefore, having this precedent in our favour, we feel justified in saying that the amendment is not such an amendment as should have the support of this House. Therefore, in brief, I oppose this amendment.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban):

Sir, if I felt that there was any practical need of incorporating this clause in this Bill I should have given it my hearty support. As it is, however, reading clause 3 of the Bill as it stands and the concluding portion of clause 3 of Mr. Neogy's amendment, in this Bill at all events this provision is unnecessary, and to be able to say that in regard to any amendment is, I think, to plead for its rejection. What is the present clause 3? "If personal injury is caused to a workman by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, his employers shall be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the provisions of this Chapter." And then the clause has certain provisos excluding the possibility of damages being awarded in certain events. I need not read those out but shall draw the attention of the House to the corresponding words in Mr. Neogy's amendment. They are: "a suit for damages in respect of the injury instituted by the workman or by any person entitled in case of his death shall not fail by reason only of the fact that the workman was at the time of the injury a workman of, or in the service of, or engaged in the work of, the employer." Comparing those words again with the words in the present clause 3, we have this, that if the injury is caused to a workman by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, the employer except in certain eventualities is liable. Therefore, to a certain extent at least there is over-lapping of ground. I need not go in detail into the question that Mr. Kamat has raised, because if you have the poison, there must also be the antidote. If you have what Mr. Neogy proposes, then Mr. Kamat's proviso must come in. That would only add to the complexity of the Bill and would take away from it the simple straightforward and comprehensive nature which I believe is one of the features of the Bill and which ought to commend itself to the House. Sir, I have spent much of my life in drafting pleas, tenable and untenable, and many other pleas than of common employment and assumed risk would occur to the draftsman which the amendment of Mr. Neogy cannot provide against. I think India may well congratulate herself that its simple Civil Procedure Code has helped us in doing without that fearfully complex plea system till lately obtaining in England, and that the practitioners here, in spite of what Dr. Nand Lal has said, have never troubled themselves about nicety of pleas that is yet the privilege of English draftsmen. What has been apprehended by Mr. Neogy is therefore more or less imaginary, particularly in view of the plain straight and unambiguous provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Bill that we are now considering. Sir, Mr. Neogy himself has alluded to it and the Honourable Mr. Innes has brought it out more clearly that the Workmen's Compensation Act was the result of a sort of evolution. Much earlier than that Act, the Employers' Liability Act came and when the Workmen's Compensation Act came, the Employer's Liability Act became more or less obsolete, and that for very good reasons. Supposing we were here to say or be told, Sir, that before we have reforms in this country in still more generous measure we should have to go over the whole ground covered in England commencing from the Magna Charta, I do not think we shall be in a very enviable state of things. We have the result of the toils and struggles in England resulting in the Workmen's Compensation Act and we ought to begin to build upon that. And if it is really felt that some enactment of the nature of the Employer's Liability Act is necessary it ought to be much more comprehensive whether the Government gives the guarantee which Mr. Joshi wants to have or not. I do not, in leaving out these sections, read a desire on the part of the Joint Committee that the go-by shall be given to the principles of the Employer's Liability Act, but I think that they must have felt that what the present Bill provides is sufficient as a good first step as I called it in welcoming this measure. I myself had my doubts, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar voiced them, whether the Joint Committee should have done what it did in picking and choosing. We have an opportunity here in this House now of considering on its merits what the Joint Committee has rejected and I hope that having regard to all the points of view that have been urged the House will be of opinion that for practical purposes the Bill that is before us is a good first step and we need not complicate the issues.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney (Nominated: Anglo-Indians): Sir, as one of the Members of the Committee when it first sat, I wish to voice my opinion regarding Mr. Neogy's amendment. I support that amendment mainly because it affords provision to a class of workmen whose pay ranges from Rs. 83 to Rs. 300 and who, as provided by the Joint Committee, will only receive compensation graded on the salary of Rs. 83. I consider that those people who are in receipt of a higher salary up to the limit of Rs. 300 are entitled to a proportionate rise in compensation according to their salary, because as drafted or re-drafted by the Joint Committee, those workmen will not receive that compensation. I therefore consider that the Employer's Liability Act will provide an adequate compensation for these workmen, and if the Workmen's Compensation Act, as presented to this House for acceptance to-day, denies these workmen that compensation, I consider they should be given an opportunity of another source of compensation. I have listened very attentively to what the Honourable Mr. Innes said, and much as I agree with all that he has said in the matter of excessive litigation which would almost stifle this Bill, far as its practical application is concerned, surrounded as we are in India with so many difficulties, with so many castes and creeds demanding special investigations, yet at the same time, even at the risk of increasing the number of lawyers in India, I support Mr. Neogy's amendment, because, as I have said before, it does provide adequate compensation for a certain class of workmen which the present Workmen's Compensation Act denies them.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I cannot help saying that those of this House who have opposed this amendment have not considered the serious situation which would arise by omitting provisions relating to the liability of employers. I do not know whether the Honourable Mr. Innes means to suggest that by not making a provision we are in any way facilitating the work of the Courts or bettering the condition of the workmen. The law as regards employer's liability and the law as regards the liability to pay compensation to workmen are both existent in India as well as in England. Supposing you had no law relating to workmen's compensation, there would still be the remedy to the Indian workman by a suit for damages. You are only simplifying the work by enacting a few provisions by which the Commissioner will be enabled to fix the compensation in an easy manner. As regards the liability of employers, although you may not make a provision in this Act, still the liability would be there. If I am convinced that by not introducing the provision we are likely to help either the capitalist, or the employee, or the Court, I would have voted against the amendment, but the absence of law does not suggest that there will be no remedy for the wrong. The remedy will be invoked, and in invoking the remedy what will be the position? Instead of turning to certain specific provisions in an Act, the party would be compelled to have recourse to the English law. There are doubts in this country as to how far the common law of England or the Acts of the English Legislature would be applicable in this country. I have got before me two articles, both practically within a month. One of these articles points out that in Madras it has been held that the common law of England is not applicable except in the Presidency Towns. But in another article it is pointed out that, although by Statute the common law is not made applicable to mofussil towns, the principles of equity, justice and good conscience would be invoked and the principles of English law would be brought in for the purpose of determining these cases. Therefore, by omitting provisions in the Workmen's Compensation Act, you will not shut out the remedy. The remedy will be sought in the complicated decisions of the English Courts, and I am sure no greater danger to the Courts or to the workmen can be apprehended than the bringing in of a large body of undigested decisions of Courts in England. It is for this reason desirable that you should introduce provisions in the Act itself which would simplify the procedure and would make the remedy easy for the workmen. It is for that reason that I take it Mr. Neogy has asked for the introduction of these provisions. There is no use in running away from danger when you have got it before you. If you do not introduce the provision relating to employer's liability the workman will know that he can fall back upon the English law. He will certainly have recourse to it, and what will be the result? Instead of having a cut and dried formula, instead of well-defined provisions in the Act, you will drive him to have recourse to a large number of undigested decisions of the English Courts with the result that the work of the Court, the work for the workman would be made more difficult than before. Therefore, the idea which the speech of the Honourable the Commerce Member has brought in, namely, that by not introducing the provisions relating to workmen you are minimising the chances of litigation and bettering the position of the labourer, must be wiped out of your mind altogether. As soon as he finds that there is provision for workmen's compensation, if he find that there is negligence on the part of the employer, the workman would undoubtedly have recourse to the Courts and if he has recourse to the Courts, are you bettering his position by not making a provision in the Act? Are you making it better for him, or for the capitalist, or for the Courts by driving him to have his relief in English law? That is the position you have to consider. I will not say that the provisions as introduced by Mr. Neogy are perfect. They are capable of improvement. It may be, as pointed out by Mr. Kamat, some restriction will have to be placed upon the liability of the employer. That is not a matter upon which I am speaking. I am arguing the general principle whether this House will be justified, will consider it proper not to have these provisions relating to the liability of employers in an Act which provides for compensation to workmen. If the Honourable the Commerce Member will be good enough to say that very soon he would introduce an Act relating to the liability of employers, then it may be that we shall stay our hands and will not press the amendment. But if he is going to say 'I shall have only an Act relating to workmen's compensation and I shall have nothing to do with an Act relating to employers' liability, then he is courting danger' which he is anxious to avoid. For these reasons I ask that these sections be adopted as part of the Bill.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): I wish to remind the House of a remark which fell from my Honourable and learned friend, Dr. Nand Lal, a remark which I should like to endorse most heartily, that this Legislature should not cumber the Statute Book with any provision unless it is perfectly satisfied that there is a necessity for that provision. With regard to this amendment of Mr. Neogy, Sir, what is the question we have to ask ourselves? It is whether the necessity has been proved for introducing this particular chapter on the employers' liability. From the Joint Committee's report it appears that they considered this question very carefully. They discussed both sides of it and by a majority they formed the opinion that the necessity was not proved. The question of the necessity, Sir, depends upon the answer to another question, which is whether our courts in India will follow the old English doctrine, the judge-made doctrine, the common law doctrine of the employers' liability and assumed risk. Now, as regards the supporters of this amendment, Sir, I listened to the debate carefully, and until Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar rose, I did not hear any suggestion that there was any probability much less any certainty whatever that our Indian courts would adopt the English law in this respect. I do not think, Sir, that Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar himself has shown that there is really any risk at all. He has referred to certain discussions, general discussions, but no discussions relating to this particular matter. What is the actual position with regard to that, Sir? Is any Member of this House satisfied that there is at the present moment any risk of our Indian courts adopting these doctrines and applying them to suits between employers and employees? We have one very definite opinion and that is an opinion of a High Court Judge in this country, a Judge of the same High Court of which my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, himself was at one time such a distinguished member. He has expressed an opinion that the courts in this country will not and cannot follow these judge-made doctrines, an opinion which apparently in his own mind amounts to a practical certainty. Sir, if the courts do apply these doctrines, then I think will come the time for legislation but we should not legislate to meet a hypothetical danger. Mr. Innes has explained to the House several times already that this Bill is an experiment. He has explained also that it is particularly desirable that we should start this Bill on as simple and clear lines as possible. Let us proceed with the Bill on that understanding and should necessity arise in the future it will not be a difficult matter to add provisions to the Bill on the lines of the Employers' Liability Act of 1880.

Mr. Darcy Lindsay (Bengal: European): In rising to oppose the amendment, I do not wish it to be understood that I necessarily oppose the principle of the employers' liability but I hold very strongly that this Workmen's Compensation Bill should stand on its own footing and not have tacked on to it what should be, if necessity arises, provided for by a separate Act entirely. In the Statement of Objects and Reasons given by the Government for the inclusion of Chapter II. in the draft Bill, it is stated "modifications are made in the ordinary civil law affecting the liability of employers for damages in respect of injuries sustained by their workmen;" and the very meagre reference to employers' liability in the Bill as originally drafted, shows that the one idea was to amend the common law or to improve the common law. I maintain that there are other means of bringing about that end, if it be at all necessary or desirable. Again, the Select Committee in their report admit that this reference to employers' liability in the original draft was only a partial remedy. Well, then, Sir, why apply only a partial remedy? It is likely to lead to great confusion. We have heard from several Members that the great object of this Bill is to avoid litigation in every possible way. We are told, on the other hand, that the employers' liability section is likely to create litigation. I would also point out to you, Sir, that practically none of the provisions of the Bill which apply to the workman's compensation section apply to the employer's liability. We do not, or we did not in the Bill as originally drafted, allow our Commissioner to deal with the settlement of employer's liability. No, the workman would have to go to court to obtain his relief. The Honourable Mr. Innes has told us, that when the Workman's Compensation Act came into operation in England, application for damages under the Employer's Liability Act became far and few between. That shows that the workman in every way prefers to claim under the Workman's Compensation Act and not run the risk of a suit under the Employer's Liability Act.

Another point was raised by the Honourable Mr. Kamat that if my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy's amendment were carried and the employer's liability section reinstated in the Bill, there is no provision made for limit of award of damages. Now, that is a most important issue. We have been informed that in England the Act allows three years' wages as a maximum. Talking as a late insurance official, because I am now numbered among the "unemployed," I feel that to support my late profession I ought to support this amendment, because it undoubtedly means considerably more premium. Where there is no limit to the risk involved, the premium must of necessity be higher. That to my mind has got a very important bearing on Mr. Neogy's amendment and that is a very strong reason why it should be rejected. As I have said before, the experience in England goes to show that the Employers' Liability Act is more or less a dead letter; and, therefore, why cumber the Indian legislation with what is no longer found of any use at Home? I think my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, is really in agreement with me that there should be a separate Act. If there is any necessity for such an Act in future—and the Honourable Member has, I think, explained both in the Report of the Joint Committee and also in what he stated to the House to-day—that if later on it is found necessary to adopt an Employers' Liability Act the Government will take measures to bring in such a Bill. I strongly advise the House, Sir, to reject this amendment and not confuse what, to my mind, is a very first class Bill—the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadian Rural): I move that the question be now put.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"That after Chapter I the following be inserted as Chapter I-A:

"CHAPTER I-A."

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY.

3. Where personal injury is caused to a workman:

- (a) by reason of the omission of the employer to maintain in good and safe condition any way, works, machinery or plant connected with or used in his trade or business, or by reason of any like omission on the part of any person in the service of the employer who has been entrusted by the employer with the duty of seeing that such way, works, machinery or plant are in good and safe condition; or

- (b) by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has any superintendence entrusted to him, whilst in the exercise of such superintendence; or
- (c) by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer to whose orders or directions the workman at the time of the injury was bound to conform and did conform, where the injury resulted from his having so conformed; or
- (d) by reason of any act or omission of any person in the service of the employer done or made in obedience to any rule or bye-law of the employer (not being a rule or bye-law which is required by or under any law for the time being in force to be approved by any authority and which has been so approved) or in obedience to particular instructions given by any person to whom the employer has delegated authority in that behalf;

a suit for damages in respect of the injury instituted by the workman or by any person entitled in case of his death shall not fail by reason only of the fact that the workman was at the time of the injury a workman of, or in the service of, or engaged in the work of, the employer."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: That disposes of clauses 4 and 5.

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, I beg to move:

"That in clause 3 (1) after the word 'personal' add the words 'and bodily'."

When we see the provision of clause 3 (1) we find that the expression 'personal injury' occurs there. The House will agree with me that the word 'injury' is not defined in the Bill. If some definition of 'injury' had been given, I would not have attempted to move this amendment. But the fact is that the word 'injury' seems to be such a word that it ought to be defined. When I see the General Clauses Act, I cannot find any definition of this word. I do not think the English Act gives the definition of this word either—I am subject to correction—but my recollection of the study of the English Act is that the definition of this word 'injury' is not given there. We have got the Indian Penal Code, no doubt, where the word 'injury' is defined. But that definition serves the purposes of the criminal law. Sir, you will be pleased to see section 44 of the Indian Penal Code. There the definition runs as follows:

"The words 'injury' denotes any harm whatever illegally caused to any person, in body, mind, reputation, or property."

Now the definition which is available to us is of a very abiguous character, and perhaps it will not be of any help to us for the purposes of the Bill which is under debate now. Because if a workman feels irritated or feels aggrieved he will have no cause of action. If, again, his implement is broken, then according to the scope of this Bill he shall have no cause of action. If in consequence of some obnoxious smell in the vicinity of the factory he suffers, he shall have no cause of action. He shall have cause of action only in the case where he has got some bodily injury. And my contention seems to be supported by the mere perusal of Schedule No. I. When we go into that Schedule we find the descriptions of various injuries given there. From that the natural inference can be drawn that the Select Committee, or the framers of these clauses, contemplated that injury, to all intents and purposes, so far as the purview of this Bill goes, means bodily injury. But, Sir, this inference in the absence of a statutory definition, will not be of great avail. Whenever there will be a question, 'whether a certain injury comes within the scope of the word 'injury', which is incorporated in clause 3, the question will require determination. Both parties will set forth their own construction, according to their own convenience and profit, and in some cases, Sir, it may give rise to unnecessary litigation. And therefore the champion of labour will have to give serious consideration to this point. The help that is sought to be extended to the workman will not be such as they desire to extend to him. It is quite probable, Sir, that Honourable Members who may oppose this amendment may premise or argue, 'that supposing on account of work which is entrusted to the workman he has become lunatic or there is some sort of mental shock given. Say, he is working in the mine or is working in the factory, and there is a fall or the engine bursts or something like that happens and it may give rise to a shock and that shock may affect his brain. It could be argued in this way, that the definition which I am going to propose will not meet such a case. In reply to that I would submit that you have not made such provision as may cover that case. Now, Sir, you will agree with me that the word "personal" is very ambiguous. And when we are going to frame a law we should try and see that the meanings which are attached to a word in common parlance should not be given prominence, because this is a Statute, it is to be interpreted in a certain way, with reference to a particular significance or sense. Therefore either the word 'personal' should have been defined or the word 'injury.' I quite concede that the word 'personal' was indispensably necessary; if the word 'bodily' had been used in place of the word 'personal' then clause 3 would have been considered very defective. However, the defect, to my mind, now is that the word 'bodily' is not incorporated in the clause and I suggest that this Honourable House will consider the character of this amendment and will accept it. Otherwise I am afraid there will be loopholes for litigation and the poor workman who has been given some help will eventually say "Well, the help which was given to me has been practically wasted in the form of litigation." Therefore, Sir, with these few remarks I commend this amendment to the House and I hope the Government Benches will also support it, because it is more or less a verbal sort of amendment.

Mr. Darcy Lindsay: I move, Sir, that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that the following amendment be made:

"That in clause 3 (1) after the word 'personal' add the words 'and bodily'."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I move that in clause 3 (1) in proviso (a) substitute the word 'seven' for the word 'ten.'

By this clause, Sir, we exempt the owner from his liability for certain classes of injuries; and in proviso (a) we provide that if the injury is of such a nature that it does not result in the disablement of the workman for a period exceeding ten days, the employer shall be exempted. Sir, when we look at the English Act—the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906—we find that the period there has been fixed at seven days only and not ten days. I do not know why that period has been changed into ten days in this Bill. The period when the workman is injured and is away from his work is the period when he needs the help most and therefore it is very necessary that this period should be reduced. It may be argued that where the injury were of a nature that the workman received some cuts or some light bruises or some scratches, the employer should not be made liable to pay him compensation for that. But there is no fear on that point as we have already provided in the Bill the definitions of injuries under which the employer will be made only liable. Therefore it is necessary that the period should be reduced as much as possible in the interests of the workman and his family. I move, Sir, that the period fixing it at ten days should be reduced to seven days only.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I sincerely hope that the House will not accept this amendment. This particular clause which the Honourable Member proposes to amend is a very important clause indeed. Practically every Compensation Act in the world makes provision for a waiting period, that is the period for which disability must last before compensation is due. The reason why this waiting period is provided is, in the first place, to minimise the risk of malingering. In the second place, the waiting period prevents a very large number of claims which will be so trivial that the administrative expenses would consume most of the amount awarded. It is true that the English Act provides a waiting period of one week. In America, on the other hand, the waiting period is 14 days and in other countries it is very much longer still. In Sweden, I believe, it is as much as 60 days, and in Denmark I believe it is as long as 13 weeks. My fear is, that the period of 10 days provided in the Bill is not long enough. Originally, the Government proposed 20 days, but after very careful discussion we arrived in the July Committee at this period of 10 days, and that has been accepted also by the Joint Committee, and I hope that the House will accept that period as a fair period, a period which is generous to the workmen. I should like this House to remember this. If we adopted this amendment which Mr. Agnihotri proposes, we should probably increase the number of cases under this Bill by as much as 20 per cent. That is the estimate which we have framed after studying figures based on English and American experience. It is not going to give very much benefit to the workmen; it is only a matter of three days. On the other hand, we are going to increase the work caused by this Bill enormously. As I have said, the waiting period has been carefully arrived at in consultation with two Committees, and I hope that the House will stick to the period drafted in the Bill and will not accept the amendment by Mr. Agnihotri.

The motion was negatived.

Raj Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha (Gaya cum Monghyr: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I beg to move:

"That to proviso (b) (i) of clause 3 (1) at the end the following be added:

'Provided the employer is not aware of the fact before the workman joined his work under such intoxication on the date of accident.'

Sir, I move this amendment which is in the form of a proviso to clause 3, sub-clause (1) (b) (i). In moving this amendment, I do not think that much explanation is necessary because it is self-explanatory. Sub-clause (b) (i) as it stands provides that the employer will not be liable for payment of compensation to a workman if the latter joined his work, before the accident or injury took place, under the influence of drink or drugs. Sir, in this connection may I ask whether the employer or his agent is or is not to see that his workmen who are, or may be, liable to injuries or accidents from the nature of their work do not join their work under such intoxication. I think the House will admit that in such cases the responsibility lies on the employer and not on the employee. Moreover, Sir, it may be urged how is the employer or his agent to find out as to who amongst his labourers are intoxicated. In this connection, I would simply say that I want to throw the responsibility on the employer in such cases, and I hope the Government will kindly try to suggest some means which will have the desired effect of the proposed amendment. We are not all draftsmen here, and we can only recommend some principles on which certain clauses or sub-clauses of Bills may be based and drafted, and so far as the drafting is concerned it rests with the Government drafters to carry out the suggestions if accepted by this House.

Lastly, I would like to draw the attention of this House to the Minute of Dissent attached to the Joint Committee's Report by the Honourable Mr. Raza Ali who says "According to the English law, the employer is liable to pay full compensation in the case of death or permanent total disablement even if the accident is due to the misconduct of the workman." With these remarks I move my amendment.

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan (Tirhut Division: Muhammadan): Sir, I rise to support the amendment on the ground that, unless some such provision is made in the Bill, which will in these cases throw the responsibility on the employer, illiterate workmen will find it a very difficult job to obtain any compensation from their shrewd employers. In the majority of cases where compensation is claimed by working men who have sustained injuries, the employer will try to shelter himself under this clause on the plea that when the workman did come to his work he was under the influence of intoxicants and as such is not eligible for compensation. The case of such a nature will be more explicit and clear if I quote the example of firemen or drivers on running train engines. Their duties, as I think, Honourable Members are aware, are such that, in spite of their utmost vigilance and watchfulness, accidents and injury happen to them, and in some cases so serious as to result in death. Now, in such cases, it is very easy to refuse compensation on the plea that they were at the time drunk. What the amendment attempts is to ensure that the employer should engage a supervisor to see that no workman under the influence of intoxicants goes to his work. Unless this amendment be made, Sir, any employer, who is generally much more intelligent than the employed, can give the plea that the workman was under the influence of intoxicants, so it should be made the duty of an employer to see that the employee is not under that influence. With this in view, I support the amendment.

Mr. A. G. Clow (Industries Department: Nominated Official): Sir, I suggest, in the first place, that the common-sense of the House will not allow this amendment to be carried. The spectacle suggested to us by the speeches of the two Honourable Members on my left is that of the employer in the morning drawing a chalk line in front of the factory and asking all his workmen to step solemnly along it. I do not think you will get the workman to agree to an examination every morning as to whether he was sober or not.

But, apart from this, is there any employer who is going to allow a man whom he knows to be drunk to enter his factory, to work with his machines possibly to involve him in a very serious accident costing many lives? For he will certainly have to pay for the other workmen injured, even if he is excused liability on behalf of the drunk workman.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move:

"In clause 3 (1) in proviso (b) (ii) after the word 'workmen' add the words 'and not countermanded by a person in authority superior to the workman'."

Sir, we have provided in this clause that, if a workman were to wilfully disobey an order expressly given or a rule expressly framed for the purpose of securing the safety of the workman, such a workman should not be entitled to any compensation under this Bill. So far as this rule goes, it is very wholesome and desirable, but there may be cases in which an employer or superior officer may order such a workman to do a particular work which may amount to disobedience or the breach of such rules and in such cases the employer will get the benefit of the obedience to his orders by the workman which the workman had no alternative but to obey being the immediate order of his employer or superior officer and with the knowledge that his act would amount to breach of the rules or the regulations or orders expressly laid down for the safety of such workman. Under these circumstances, I think it desirable that no loopholes should be given to the employers which would give undue advantage to him over the workmen and therefore I move this amendment. Sir, it may happen that the amendment which I have proposed may not be in strict accordance with the drafting rules or the draft may not be approved by the Members on the Government Benches. But my whole object is to put before the Government my view and difficulty on this point and to request them to make the necessary changes in the Bill.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: Sir, as far as the Government Benches are concerned we think that we have provided for the point raised by Mr. Agnihotri by putting in the word "wilful". It must be "wilful disobedience". I put it to the House that the inclusion of the word "wilful" covers the point raised by Mr. Agnihotri and that his amendment is not necessary.

Mr. President: The question is that the following amendment be made:

"In clause 3 (1) in proviso (b) (ii) after the word 'workmen' add the words 'and not countermanded by a person in authority superior to the workman'."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: As "wilful" has been explained to cover my second amendment* which I also wanted to put before the House, I beg permission to withdraw it.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Sir, I beg to move the following amendment which stands in my name:

"To proviso (b) in clause 3 (1) at the end add the following:

'Unless the injury results in death to the workman or in his permanent total disablement in either of which cases the employer shall be liable to pay compensation to which the workman would otherwise have been entitled'."

* "In proviso (b) (iii), after the word 'workmen' add the words 'unless done under orders of a person superior in authority to him'."

[Mr. N. M. Joshi.]

Sir, in order that the House may understand the exact scope of my amendment I would like to explain first what the original section 3 (b) is. That section is intended to prevent compensation being given to workmen in cases of accidents which take place on account of the serious and wilful misconduct of the workman. Serious wilful misconduct is defined in this section in three ways, namely, first, when the workman goes to work under the influence of drink, secondly, when the accident is due to the fact that the workman has wilfully disobeyed a rule and thirdly, when the accident which takes place is due to the fact that the workman had removed a safety guard. Now, Sir, to a layman, this clause seems to be quite reasonable, and my Honourable friend Mr. Agnihotri just mentioned that he approved of it. But, Sir, to those people who have studied the principles on which the Workmen's Compensation Bill has been framed and the principles on which the Workmen's Compensation Acts of other countries are based, this clause itself is altogether against those principles. The principle of the Workmen's Compensation Bill, as has been explained several times, is that the industry which creates risks for workmen should bear the civil liability for the accidents that take place. While defining that principle, there is nowhere mention of negligence either of the employer or of the employee. This is the general principle of the Workmen's Compensation Bill. If the principle of negligence is to be brought in here, then certainly we must bring in negligence of the employer also. If on account of the wilful misconduct of the employee he is to be deprived of the compensation, then certainly the employee deserves more compensation in those cases where the negligence of the employer is proved. You cannot modify the principle only in the case of the employee and not modify it in the case of the employer. The Bill, as it is before us, provides no additional compensation for those cases where the wilful negligence of the employer will be proved. I therefore think that this clause, as it has been drafted, is against the principle of workman's compensation.

Then, naturally, you will ask me, how did this come here at all? My surmise is that this clause has been introduced here on the model of the English Workmen's Compensation Act. But the misfortune of the workman in India is this, that although the clause is based largely upon the English clause, this Bill drafted in such a way that, while portion of the clause which was in favour of the employer has been taken in here, the portion of the clause which favoured workmen has been taken out. That is the misfortune of the Indian workman. I do not know what explanation the Government can give for putting only one part of the English clause in the Bill and omitting the other part which favoured the workman. Sir, I would like the House to remember, in the first place, that the amendment which I am proposing is just to restore the English section in our Bill—in principle, I do not say the words—but I want to restore the spirit of the English section, namely, even where wilful misconduct of the workman is proved and the accident has caused the death of the man or has totally disabled him, compensation should be paid. Sir, the principle on which the English clause is based is this, that in the case of death and total disablement, when you refuse to give compensation to a workman you do not punish the workman at all. You punish those people who depend upon the workman or those people who have to maintain the workman. This is the principle on which the English practice of giving compensation even where wilful misconduct is proved is based.

Sir, this principle was mentioned by Mr. Gladstone now Lord Gladstone when he introduced an amendment in the English Workmen's Compensation Bill exactly similar to the amendment which I have moved. Therefore, the House is assured that it is not an argument of my invention. There was another argument which was given by Lord Gladstone when he introduced this principle in the English Act, and that was this. Where a workman is killed on account of the accident, if you charge him with causing the accident on account of serious wilful misconduct, you are charging a dead man whose lips are sealed, who cannot give evidence and show to the world that the charge brought against him is false. That was the second argument given by Lord Gladstone when he moved an amendment similar to mine in the House of the Commons. I hope these arguments will find favour with the House.

But, Sir, there are also other arguments why my amendment should be accepted. In the first place, several times when amendments are being discussed, arguments are brought forward that we must not put too great a burden upon the industry. I assure the House that even if they accept my amendment, the burden on the industry is not likely to be too great. After all, are the cases of wilful misconduct causing the death of workmen going to be too many? What is the meaning of a workman by wilful misconduct causing the accident and killing himself? It means that the man is practically willing to commit suicide. Take the third sub-clause of this clause (b)—"the wilful removal or disregard by the workman of any safety guard."

When a workman wilfully removes the safety guard he is prepared to commit suicide. Is there any one here who believes that such cases of practical suicide will be too many? Personally I do not take that cynical view of human nature at all. I do not also believe that there will be in many cases a wilful disobedience of orders. Sir, as this is also the English law, we must therefore go by the experience of England in this respect. Are the cases under this clause going to be too many? In order to assure the House that the cases are not going to be too many, I propose to quote to the House an authority from England. When this amendment was being discussed in the English House of Commons, Mr. F. E. Smith, a very distinguished and famous lawyer and who is now Lord Birkenhead, occupying one of the highest positions in England, gave this as his experience of this clause. He said:

"The point of view which appealed to me so strongly was this. An workman would not commit a breach of rules for any improper motive if the result of that breach was likely to inflict upon him permanent disablement or death. The Legislature however was not only entitled but bound to provide against cases where a man might well say 'Whatever happens is a trivial matter and I shall get compensation'. But to say that it was necessary in the case of where a man's life or limbs were concerned was flying in the face of all human experience."

Mr. F. E. Smith, now Lord Birkenhead, says that to say that a man will wilfully do something that will cause his death or disablement is to fly in the face of human experience. Sir, I therefore feel that the burden on the industry, if my amendment is accepted, will not be very much indeed. Then, Sir, there is likely to be used another argument. It may be said that the conditions in England are quite different from the conditions in India. I therefore want to show to the House that whatever may be the difference in the conditions between England and India, there is no difference between the conditions in England and India, as regards this point at least. Let us see what are the conditions which are material in this respect. The first is the workman having been at the time thereof under the influence of drink or drugs. Is there any one, who is likely to say the working classes in India drink more than the working classes in England? I do not think there will be anybody here who will make that statement. Then the second section is about the wilful disobedience of the rules. Is there any one here who will say that an Indian workman or for the matter of that an Indian is less law-abiding than an Englishman? My experience is that an Indian is a quiet, docile creature and he obeys the laws more readily than even the Englishman. What about the third? The third is the wilful removal or disregard of any safety guard. This I consider to be suicide. Is it proved by anybody that an Indian is more prone to commit suicide than an Englishman? I do not think any one can show that. I therefore think that the argument that the conditions in England and India differ does not hold good at least in this case.

Sir, I have thus shown that the clause as it stands is against the principles of the workman's compensation, and even though my amendment be accepted it will only be a compromise, because the ideal amendment would have been to drop this clause altogether. But I do not take the ideal course; I am prepared to accept a compromise which was accepted in England. Thirdly, I have shown that my proposal has the support of experience—experience, not of a theoretical man like myself, but the experience of English statesmen, English lawyers, who had very great experience of the working of the Compensation Act in England. Sir, if necessary, I would like to add one authority more in my support. When reading this debate in the House of Commons I came across the Division List. I looked through the list of people who had voted in favour of this amendment and I found there the name of Mr. Rufus Daniel Isaacs. Sir, this gentleman I think is well known to my Honourable friend Mr. Innes and to the other Members of this House. He is no other than His Excellency Lord Reading. I have therefore shown, Sir, that my amendment has not only the support of experience as well as of principle, but of great personages. I need not therefore say anything more, and I strongly hope that the House will accept my amendment.

Captain E. V. Sassoon (Bombay Millowners' Association: Indian Commerce): Sir, I notice that the first point which Mr. Joshi insists upon is that his amendment is required to balance the fact that the employee cannot get anything from the employer even should he suffer through the wilful negligence of the employer. But surely, Sir, as the Honourable Mr. Innes has pointed out to us and as has been emphasised from the Treasury Benches, should it be found that under ordinary common law the workman has not got his rights safeguarded, a Bill for employer's liability will be brought in. That I think covers this point.

The second point Mr. Joshi makes is that the industry should compensate the injured workman for all accidents. I notice that he does not suggest that the workman who is drunk or suffering from drugs or wilfully disobedient, etc., should get compensation unless the injury should cause death or permanent injury. Now, if the industry is to compensate for all accidents, why are these left out? Surely, surely, because we want to put every discouragement in the way of the workman coming to his work drunk and removing the safeguards wilfully. We should not forget, Sir, that a wilful act such as the removal of safety devices does not only endanger the limb and the life of the workman himself but may also endanger those of his innocent fellow workmen. Now, Sir, Mr. Joshi has pointed out that the present Lord Birkenhead said that he could not conceive a workman disregarding a safety device if he thought that this might lead to his permanent injury or death, and that he may only do this if he thought that the injury would be a trivial one. Sir, is the House to encourage a workman to risk a trivial injury which may become a serious injury, and say to him, "because you thought it would only be a trivial injury, we will not therefore penalise you, by saying you are not to receive compensation?" That seems to me to be the point. Merely because a very high Member of the House of Lords at Home, who is also a very high legal exponent, should have said this in his more youthful days, I see no reason why we should follow. Surely, we should take advantage of the experience gained since the debate which Mr. Joshi referred to.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: They have not repented it yet.

Captain E. V. Sassoon: There is no reason to think that because they have not repented it, it was not wrong. We have seen the results. We hope, therefore, to benefit by the results. It may be that if our method is shown to be better than that of the Home Government, they may bring in an Act amending their present Act. Now, Sir, it appears to me that the only point that Mr. Joshi can bring forward—and which he has not brought forward—is that this allowance should be given to the family as a compassionate allowance. That seems to me to be the only argument that could be brought forward. "The workman is not alive to be told not to do it again and his poor dependents are the ones who are going to suffer. Therefore let us give them something that they do not deserve." But, Sir, should this be brought under this Bill? Surely, if you are going to tell the widow and the children that they are going to have an allowance though they are not entitled to have it because the husband was killed or permanently injured, why should they not have an allowance if the husband was killed or permanently injured while walking down the street, or in any case which does not come under this Act? Surely, if we are going to bring in a measure of this kind, this is a matter which should come under a National Accident Insurance Act, and not under this particular Bill. In other words, why should the widow receive compensation as a compassionate allowance just because her husband happens to be a workman? Under this Bill therefore, I do not think that this point should be brought in, in this place. If it is intended that everybody who gets killed by an accident or is permanently injured is to have compensation, then this should be done in a much wider measure. Therefore, Sir, I oppose Mr. Joshi's amendment for these reasons, firstly we do not want to encourage anybody to go to work drunk or under the influence of drugs or to remove safety devices, and, secondly, from the point of view of a compassionate allowance this is not the place to make the provision.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, I strongly support this amendment. I may confess that my feeling as regards this Bill has been one of distrust. Having regard to the fact that industries in our country are not yet developed, this Bill may work as a deterrent to the growth of industries and industrial activities in this country. Therefore, I am one of those who would like to be very cautious in enacting provisions to the benefit of the workmen and to the injury of the employer. But, in this case, Sir, I feel strongly that I can trust to the Britisher's commonsense. His commonsense has told him that it is not likely that a man for the sake of a paltry sum of hundred or two hundred or three or five hundred rupees that he may get that he would willingly kill himself or permanently disable himself. If death results, or if total disablement results, the law presumes—that is how I read the English law—that it cannot be wilful or culpable neglect on the part of the employee. It will be a safe presumption to draw in such a case for I have yet to find a man who will kill himself for the sake of two hundred rupees, unless he is insane or temporarily insane. I mean it is human nature. Therefore it is a safe rule of evidence to go upon; and as we are anxious in this case, as we have been told several times, to avoid the clutches of lawyers and law courts, why give a loophole to employers to resort to law in such a case. You want to save the employee from the clutches of the law, but you put the employers in those clutches by suggesting these differences. I do not know if Captain Sassoon would like to be placed in my hands: What is it you are doing here? A man has killed himself. He is an employee, poor fellow, who leaves behind a widow and children quite unprovided for. All that the amendment says is in such a case compensate him to the limited extent which this Act provides. What does it provide? Forty-two months' wages.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Thirty months' wages.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: And in the case of total disablement, something more. Therefore I think it is not a very harsh measure to adopt, it is a reasonable course to adopt. Captain Sassoon suggests that we should wait for national insurance legislation. I do not know when we are going to get that; but here we are legislating for workmen's compensation as between employers and workmen. Why not take this opportunity to provide for this case here? Captain Sassoon, by this very argument, admits the necessity for some legislation. In his generous heart he feels no doubt that some compassionate allowance is needed for the widow and poor children of the workman. He feels that; then why not provide for it in a measure which deals with the liability of the employer to the workman. In this country it is much more necessary than in England, because the presumption of ignorance here can be more safely drawn than in the case of English workmen. English workmen are educated; they know the value and use of the appliances which are provided there. But here, Sir, even members of highly placed families do not know the actual use of the various parts of the machinery installed in the works. I know, Sir, of the case of a daughter of a Member of the Executive Council who very nearly killed herself by tying her silk cloth to the switch of an electric fan. Thereby she was about to be killed. What I mean is that ignorance is so great in these cases that you can safely draw the presumption, if such accident occurred that it was due to ignorance and not to wilful disobedience to any lawful order or rule. I therefore submit, Sir, that it is but right that we should provide for such cases. The Government themselves recognise the necessity for it in the original Bill. That is a strong argument in favour of this amendment. No doubt the original Bill as introduced provided only for half compensation; but now I see Mr. Joshi has grown more ambitious and he is asking for full compensation as in the English Act. The English Act allows full compensation and therefore Mr. Joshi asks for it. If any one will move for half compensation, I am willing to accept it, whether Mr. Joshi is willing to accept it or not. But it seems to me that it is a case where we must provide for some compensation; otherwise we shall be acting cruelly in the case of the ignorant workman for whose benefit we are enacting this measure. The one argument that has been used against this is that it will encourage carelessness. Sir, it is an argument which has no weight behind it. As I have stated already, a man cares more for his life than for anything else. Therefore it is not likely to have that effect; if we pass this amendment it is not likely to have that effect. I therefore strongly support the amendment.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, as Mr. Rangachariar has just pointed out, Mr. Joshi's amendment goes further than we went in the original draft of this Bill. We provided in these circumstances only for half compensation, and I wish to point out to the House that there was no clause in the Bill which aroused greater opposition than that. Practically every employers' association in the country condemned it, and no less than six Local Governments thought that there was no justification for that clause. I desire to point out to the House that Mr. Joshi's clause is even more drastic; it is not a matter of half compensation—it is a matter of full compensation. Now, Sir, let us see what Mr. Joshi's arguments are. His first argument is that the omission of this clause is against the whole principle of workmen's compensation. I deny that in toto. What is the main principle of the Workmen's Compensation Act? The main point of it is that the workman has not got to prove negligence on the part of the employer. Now what I want to point out here is that we are not dealing with negligence; we are dealing with accidents arising when a workman is directly under the influence of drink or drugs; we are dealing with accidents arising out of wilful disobedience of rules expressly framed for a workman's safety; we are dealing with accidents arising out of wilful removal of safety devices. It has nothing to do with negligence. In each of these cases we assume that there was not merely negligence, but something wilful. Therefore, Mr. Joshi's argument that the omission of this clause is against the principle of workmen's compensation is entirely unfounded.

Now, let me take Mr. Joshi's next argument. He has got no argument at all. All he can say is that this appears in the English Act and therefore we must have it in our Act; and here again I join issue with him at once. All the way through we have made it perfectly plain that we never intended our Bill to be a slavish imitation of the English Act. We made it perfectly plain that we intended to legislate for India and India's conditions. Now, I am not going to say—and I hope Mr. Joshi will not think that I am going to say—that my objections to this clause are due to any difference between the conditions of India and the conditions of England. I am not going to base my objections to the clause on any argument based on different conditions of industry. I make Mr. Joshi a present of arguments of that kind. My objection to the clause, as usual, is based on principle. As I have said, all that Mr. Joshi has been able to say was that this appears in the English Act. He said that we must adopt the principle of the English Act. Now, what is the principle on which this clause of the English Act is based? Mr. Joshi has told us. He says in the first place it is a principle that you should not punish the sons and the children for the sin of the father. If a man by reason of his being drunk kills himself in a factory, then, he says, it is wrong in principle that his dependants should be punished, and therefore you must pay compensation which otherwise if the workman had not been drunk and had been killed you would have had to pay to his dependants. Now, I put it to the House, is it right in principle? It is purely a matter of a compassionate allowance. Is it not the way of the world? Suppose a man is accused of murdering another man and suppose he is hanged; his dependants suffer, his wife and children suffer; does any one pay them compensation? The wife and children of the murdered man suffer; does any one pay them compensation? Here you have got a precisely similar case; when a man by reason of his being drunk does a thing which reacts most terribly on his dependants, why should you say that compensation shall be paid to his dependants? At any rate, why should you say that the employer should pay that compensation? If you want to pay compensation let the State pay it; do not put it upon the employer; do not let the employer have to pay compensation for an act which he could not have prevented. Then again, Mr. Joshi referred to some arguments used apparently by Lord Gladstone, or Mr. Herbert Gladstone, as I think he was then, in the House of Commons. Mr. Herbert Gladstone said that it was unfair to make a charge of this kind against a dead man. It seems to me, Sir, a singularly weak argument. In this case we are not merely dealing with a dead man, but we are dealing with men who are permanently disabled, so that that argument loses its force. I say that we are here now to legislate for India. We are not here to copy the English law merely because it is the English law, and if we are going to copy the English law, I say that that provision of the English law must satisfy our sense of logic and our reason.

Now, Sir, I come to the main objection to this clause, the objection which has weighed most with me. What is the main object, what is the main benefit that we hope to get from this legislation? We are placing a burden upon the employer; we are placing upon him the obligation to pay compensation to workmen for injuries referred to in this Bill. We hope that by doing so, and by the pressure of the Insurance Companies, those employers will be more and more careful in their factories. They will pay more and more attention to the safety of their workmen; they will go in for safety devices; they will frame more carefully rules for the safety of their workmen. And yet, Mr. Joshi comes and says that he wishes to introduce a clause which makes it very nearly useless, for an employer to put in those safety devices, to make those safety rules. According to him, if a workman injures himself or kills himself by his own wilful misconduct or by his disobedience to rules or by the removal of the safeguards, still the employer has got to pay; therefore why should the employer go in for these safety devices? That is one of my main arguments against this clause. The other argument is this. You cannot defend a clause like this by any argument based on reason, and you cannot pretend that it is fair to the employer to make him responsible for accidents which he could not possibly have prevented. Sir, I oppose the amendment.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: Sir, after the very able manner in which the Honourable Mr. Innes has shown the weakness of some of the arguments of Mr. Joshi, there remains very little for me to say, but there is one point to which I wish to draw the attention of the House with reference to the English Act. But before I do so, let me explain my own position in the matter. I have my sympathy for the desire of Mr. Joshi to give some sort of compassionate allowance to the workman who loses his life even by his own wilful misconduct, and if he had drafted out an amendment to that effect in the proper manner, probably it would have been possible for me to support it; but as it is, I am afraid his amendment, as drafted, cannot be supported.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: May I say one word, Sir? Compensation is compassionate allowance, and it is nothing but that. That is the principal argument.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: Mr. Joshi based the whole of his case on the parallel of the English Act, and he led the House to believe that under the English Act the amount of compensation or compassionate allowance claimable by such workman or his dependants would be the same as if in the case of death due to any other cause and not by drink or wilful misconduct. There is nothing like that in the English Act at all. If he carefully and critically studies that Act, he will see that all that the Act provides for is this: "If it is proved that the injury to a workman is attributable to his wilful misconduct, then in that case his claim shall not be disallowed except in case of death. Well, this only means his claim is only allowable"

Mr. N. M. Joshi: According to the Act.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: There is a good deal of difference between the fact that his claim, in spite of the fact that he was drunk, is allowable and the fact that he is entitled to the same allowance as otherwise such claim is referred to an arbitrator who probably allows one-third or one-fourth or the full amount of compensation as he deems fit. Under Mr. Joshi's amendment on the other hand what Mr. Joshi wants is that, although the workman, by his drunkenness or by his mischief has brought on his own death, the employer is to be penalised by the giving of the full amount of the compensation, as if the workman was not drunk. There is no such provision in the English Act at all. All that the English Act provides is that his claim should be allowed. There is a worldwide difference between that and Mr. Joshi's amendment. And, although I have full sympathy with the object Mr. Joshi has in view, I am afraid I cannot support him in the amendment as drafted by him.

One word as regards what has fallen from Mr. Rangachariar. He says no man would bring death on himself for the sake of two or three hundred rupees. Well, we do not say that he would bring death on himself for the sake of the money. Whatever may be the motive, why should an innocent man, i.e., the employer, be penalised? If Mr. Rangachariar wants to give him something out of sympathy, he can devise to give something in another form. But don't penalise the employer for no fault of his.

Mr. R. A. Spence (Bombay: European): I move, Sir, that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"To proviso (b) in clause 3 (1), at the end add the following:

"Unless the injury results in death to the workman or in his permanent total disablement in either of which cases the employer shall be liable to pay compensation to which the workman would otherwise have been entitled."

The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Five Minutes to Three of the Clock. Sir Campbell Rhodes was in the Chair.

Sir Montagu Webb (Bombay: European): Sir, I beg to move:

"In clause 3 (2) omit the words:

"If a workman employed in any employment involving the handling of wool, hair, bristles, hides or skins contracts the disease of anthrax or."

The effect, Sir, of this amendment, if it be carried, would be to exclude the disease of anthrax from the operation of the Act. I do not suppose that I need occupy the time of the House by any lengthy description of the disease of anthrax. It is a cattle disease; and it also affects sheep and goats. In recent years, it has been communicated to human beings, and shows itself in the form of a malignant pustule, or boil, or carbuncle which generally proves fatal. In Europe and in the United Kingdom, one or two people have died of this disease every year. I believe a little over 100 people have died of anthrax in the last 25 years; and in the United Kingdom and in Europe a determined effort is now being made to stamp out the disease.

Now, I desire at the start to make it quite clear that I have not the slightest desire to relieve the employer from his liability, make full, proper and adequate compensation to any labourer who contracts an occupational disease who may suffer or die of anthrax whilst working for that employer. But what I do submit, Sir, is that in this country among the people who work in those trades,—who handle wool, hair, hides or skins—men, women and children, it is a matter of extreme difficulty, if not impossibility, to decide where, how and when anthrax may have been contracted. In the first place, a great quantity of hair and wool, bristles, hides and skins come into India from outside, partly over the sea, and more largely over the land frontiers. Now, no arrangements exist, no organisation, by which hair, or wool, or hides and skins infected by anthrax can be examined, there is no means of detecting the presence of the anthrax germ. Then again, skins, bristles, hides, wool and so forth are transported all over this country. There is at no stage any organisation or machinery to detect whether those goods are infected by anthrax or not. The germ is a difficult one to detect and a very difficult one to kill. I believe that it can retain vitality for many years under the most unfavourable circumstances. Now in these circumstances although Government may from time to time notify that different parts of the country and the cattle in those districts have been affected by anthrax, it is impossible, I submit, to make regulations which would protect all the people who may handle wool, hair, bristles, hides or skins. Then again, Sir, in my experience the people who are engaged in this trade are very often daily labourers. They are not permanent employees. These people who are engaged in picking and sorting wool and handling skins are very often coolies taken on in the morning and discharged in the evening. I would ask this House how are these people to be examined to discover the presence of anthrax. It looks like some skin disease which is very very common in India. How are these coolies and labourers to be examined? How is medical provision to be afforded? Are they, before they commence the day's work, to be stripped, men, women and children, to discover if they have any sore on their bodies, which may possibly turn out to be anthrax? And then supposing that there is a sore, is it every doctor who can tell whether that sore is anthrax or not? I believe that it requires a bacteriological examination to decide whether the sore or boil or whatever it is, is anthrax or not. It is a matter of the very greatest difficulty to detect. I have not been able to discover with the information at my command, that anybody in this country has died of anthrax through handling hair, wool or hides or skins. They may have done so. I am very familiar with the wool business myself and within my own experience nobody handling wool has died of anthrax. I believe some little time ago somebody who used a Japanese shaving brush died of anthrax. That is not quite the same case as that of labourers who are engaged in the wool trade or the hides and skins trade. I have during the course of the last ten years myself attended more than one conference in Yorkshire and London, and I am very familiar with all the steps that have been taken and the legislation that has been passed to endeavour to check and eradicate this disease in Europe, but I feel that it would be a matter of very great difficulty to apply those measures and steps in this country where the conditions are so entirely different. It is for this reason, Sir, that I move that we take anthrax out of the scope of the operation of this Bill. I do so, Sir, not because I do not recognise the danger of anthrax, not because I do not recognise the liability of the employer to compensate work people who may suffer from that danger, and not because I am not aware of the fact that anthrax is included in similar legislation in other countries. I do so because I urge that conditions in India are such that the practical application, the equitable application of the principle of compensation as between employer and workman will in practice prove to be almost impossible. If anthrax be included in this Bill, it will mean that labourers, men, women and children either must be inspected to discover if they are affected by anthrax, or, the employer will be liable to pay compensation for people who die of anthrax who have not contracted the disease whilst in his employ, but have caught it somewhere else. It is for these reasons, not because I desire to relieve the employer from the liability to compensate, but because the practical difficulties in this country are so great as to make the equitable application of the principle in practice almost impossible, that I move that the words which I have read out, be omitted from the beginning of clause 3, sub-section (2).

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: Sir, I am afraid I must oppose this amendment. Sir Montagu Webb's first point was that anthrax requires bacteriological examination and that no ordinary doctor can diagnose a case of anthrax straight off without first having some bacteriological examination. Well, Sir, I have taken expert advice on that very point. I have taken the advice of the Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India, who is himself a very great expert on anthrax and who has just attended on our behalf an Anthrax Conference in London. He tells me that it is by no means necessary that every factory and every woollen mill should keep a trained bacteriologist. He says that the malignant pustule which is the ordinary manifestation of the disease can be diagnosed clinically and no doctor would think of awaiting the result of a bacteriological examination before commencing treatment. Even in Germany only in 50 per cent. of the cases is the material sent to a bacteriological laboratory in order to confirm diagnosis. I think, Sir, I have answered the first point made by Sir Montagu Webb.

Sir Montagu Webb's second point was that, as far as he knew, cases of anthrax were of very rare occurrence in India. If that is so, and I believe it is, then I do not think that employers need worry very much if we do include anthrax within the scope of the Bill. We have included anthrax within the scope of the Bill because essentially it is an occupational disease; possibly it is the most typical occupational disease there is: and I think I am correct in saying that every Workman's Compensation Act in the world, or practically every one, makes provision for anthrax. We included it in the Bill because in woollen mills, in exporters' godowns of wool, hides and other places where anthrax is liable to occur—in these industries anthrax is essentially a disease of the industry. Moreover, I think there are certain things that can be done for the workman in places like that. In England pictures of the malignant pustule are placed everywhere for the information of workmen, so that they may seek early treatment. Pictures of this kind are hung up in the factory. Nor is there I think any necessity why those workmen should be inspected before they come to work. After all it is for the workman to prove that he has got the disease.

As regards Sir Montagu Webb's last point, namely, that in these woollen mills and in exporters' wool godowns daily labour is usually employed, I think I am correct in saying that the disease of anthrax supervenes very quickly; not only that, its fatal effect follows very quickly. On the whole, I think, that the case for inclusion of anthrax in the Bill particularly strong and I would repeat that anthrax is the most typical occupational disease that any one could think of.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Sir, when this subject was brought up in the Committee which sat on the Bill I pressed strongly, and I think I was left almost unsupported in the end, for the inclusion of other occupational diseases besides anthrax. In fact I went so far as to enumerate a few diseases, such as lead poisoning, kala-azar (which is a residential disease pathognomonic to certain parts of India), chrome poisoning, etc., etc. The Committee did not agree with me. At the same time I think they felt that when this Bill had been in operation for some time—this being an experimental stage of it—there would be need to include these occupational diseases to a greater extent than they have seen fit to do to-day. There is no doubt that the occupational diseases included in a similar Bill in England cover a very large field indeed, and to only include anthrax in this Bill is, I consider, a very very conservative attitude to take up; and, for this reason, I do not agree with Sir Montagu Webb's amendment; in fact, I oppose it. If Sir Montagu Webb is correct in his figures that no deaths from anthrax, to his knowledge, have taken place in such occupations in India, why, as Mr. Innes said, why should the employer trouble himself about its inclusion as an occupational disease in this Bill? But as such deaths are likely to take place, and are most certainly due to occupation I think the employees so occupied should be protected, especially when one considers the extreme rapidity and fatality of this disease and the difficulty owing to the paucity of research institutions of diagnosing it in its earliest stages in India as compared to England. Sir Montagu Webb has not adduced any good reasons in support of his amendment except to plead the cause and protection of the employer. His other reason is that conditions in India are such that the equitable application of compensation between the employer and employee will be almost impossible of execution. If anthrax be included, labourers he says, must be inspected. That is exactly what the Workmen's Compensation Act is going to lead to, viz., more careful inspection of employees. If anthrax is to be excluded from this Bill it would deprive the Bill of a very important and necessary safeguard. I, therefore, oppose the amendment, Sir.

Mr. Darcy Lindsay: I move that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Chairman: Amendment moved:

"In clause 3 (2) omit the words:

'If a workman employed in any employment involving the handling of wool, hair, bristles, hides or skins contracts the disease of anthrax or'."

[Mr. Chairman.]

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Sir, I beg to move the following amendment which stands in my name:

"In clause 3, sub-clause (5), after the word 'person' insert the words 'and damages have been awarded in his favour'."

This, Sir, is the clause where alternative remedies have been dealt with. The clause as it stands states that a man who goes to a Court for a suit in damages for an accident is prevented from going to the Workmen's Compensation Commissioner. My amendment proposes that if a man goes to a Civil Court for damages for an accident and if he succeeds in getting damages he should be prevented from going to the Workmen's Compensation Commissioner. But if he does not succeed in his suit, then it should be open to him to go to the Workmen's Compensation Commissioner. Sir, this amendment is again an instance of my fondness for slavishly following English legislation. To frankly admit, I admire the English legislation; I admire the English people also, at least the English people in England. But, Sir, I cannot understand why my Honourable friend Mr. Innes should not like Indians like myself slavishly following the English legislation. I am, therefore, causing great disappointment to him by asking the House to slavishly follow the English legislation. After all, what is the argument to prevent a man going to the Workmen's Compensation Commissioner if he fails to get any damages from the Civil Court? The argument is that the man should not be encouraged to go into litigation. Sir, if that is the argument, this clause does not prevent that. The man has his alternative remedies. If there had been any clause here to prevent a man going altogether to the Civil Court, I should have supported it. I am in favour of giving only one remedy to the working classes. To give them two remedies no doubt is to put them at a disadvantage; and therefore if the Government had proposed that the workman should have only one remedy I should have supported it. But unfortunately they put before the working class man—they suggest to him, as a matter of fact he does not know it himself—they suggest to him by means of this section that there are two remedies open to him. Is it right, after having done that, to penalise the man if he sometimes makes a mistake and goes to the Civil Court. Therefore I think it is absolutely wrong—at least as long as the working classes in India are illiterate and ignorant—to penalise them for a small mistake of theirs. I hope therefore that the House will accept my amendment.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I rise to support the amendment moved by Mr. Joshi. I shall take the House through clause 19 also which will show that this sub-clause (5) is absolutely unnecessary. In clause 19 we provide that 'no Civil Court shall have jurisdiction to settle, decide or deal with any question which is by or under this Act required to be settled, decided or dealt with by a Commissioner'. Now if this clause stands in this Bill, then sub-clause (5) becomes unnecessary for the simple reason that a Civil Court will not entertain any suit and to penalise the worker for his ignorance in merely approaching the Civil Court for a remedy which the Court cannot and will not grant, will be very very hard for the workman. And if Mr. Joshi's amendment is accepted, then even though the sub-clause be superfluous, it will have some meaning. I therefore suggest that Mr. Joshi's amendment be accepted.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: Sir, I should just like to explain the view the Government has taken on this very difficult question of alternative remedies. Our view is that we have provided a special law which enables the workman to recover compensation from his employer. We have also provided a special machinery to enable him to recover that compensation. The law is special in that the workman has not got to prove negligence. We deprive the employer of what would be a defence under the common law. We treat the injury as a risk of the industry. We make the employer in the public interest pay. That is to say, the law to that extent imposes a special disability upon the employer, and it gives a special benefit to the workman. Now having done that for the workman, we think it only right that we should do something for the employer. We think it only fair that we should protect the employer from being harassed, not only by claims under this Act but also by suits in the Civil Courts. Therefore we give the workman his choice. He can go to the Civil Court if he likes. He can lay a claim before the Commissioner under this Act if he likes. But he must exercise his option; he cannot do both.

And the second point is that under this law we want to encourage him to use this Act. It is for that reason as I explained before that we tried to draw the Bill in such a way that both the workman and the employer can understand it, and that they can come to an agreement among themselves. And if there are disputes we try to encourage the workman to take our simple and inexpensive machinery of the Commissioners. Our whole object is to prevent the workman from wasting his money in the Courts, and the employer from being harassed by suits. That is my objection to Mr. Joshi's amendment. Mr. Joshi wants that the workman should first be able to go to Civil Courts, if he gets his damages there well and good; he cannot go any further; but if he fails in the Civil Court, he must be allowed to file a claim under this Act against his employer. I say that bearing in mind the objects with which we set out, the course suggested by Mr. Joshi is not right, and that it is fair that the workman should be required to exercise his option whether he should go to the Civil Court in the first instance or whether he should claim under this Act. I oppose the amendment.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, this is one of those cases where people in this country, especially the English people, expose their dread of Courts. I do not know why they have a dread of Courts at all. It is there they get justice; after all we are concerned in seeing justice done. I think lawyers in this part of the country are perhaps to blame. The heavy fees in Calcutta perhaps account for it; the gold mohurs which they reap in Calcutta apparently account for this dread of Courts; but the poor pagodas of Madras do not drive parties away from Courts. Now, Sir, what is the object of this? Let us remember that this Act provides a new right and a new remedy, a new right which depends upon one set of circumstances, whereas the ordinary remedy under the law depends upon another set of circumstances. Here the liability arises by the mere fact of employment. This law assumes, as the Honourable Mr. Innes told us just now, that by the mere fact of employment this liability arises on the part of the employer; and in order to give relief in respect of that liability a special machinery is created. Under the ordinary law a workman, if he resorts to the ordinary Courts, has to prove other circumstances, not merely the fact of employment; he undertakes another burden, namely, he has to prove negligence on the part of the employer before he can get a farthing; so that a man may be entitled to compensation under this Act but will not be entitled to damages in the Civil Courts. This section provides a punishment, therefore, for a man daring to go to the Civil Courts. We are enacting a law here saying "Be afraid of Courts; if you go anywhere near the precincts of a Court, take care, we will come down upon you. Although you may be entitled under this Act to compensation you may not be justly entitled to damages in the Civil Court. But you are entitled to something in law which this law creates and we will deprive you of it; we impose a fine on you, the fine being that we will deprive you of what is justly due to you." Sir, can any civilized Legislature support such a proposition? Is a Legislature going to say,— "Impose a penalty on people going to the Courts established by His Majesty and by the Government of the country"—not national Courts established by the Congress Party—I can quite understand if a penalty is imposed by saying that if you went to these panchayet Courts established by the Congress party we will impose a penalty. But, Sir, what is the crime he has committed? He has committed the sin of approaching a Court established by this very Government, and the Legislature says "We will impose a penalty upon you. How dare you go?" Therefore, we will deprive you of what is justly your due. Therefore, Mr. Joshi's amendment has got substance behind it, principle behind it, justice behind it. On the other hand, the proposal made by Government is ridiculous on the face of it. The Government expose themselves to ridicule. They themselves dread their own Court which they established. That is what they are saying in so many words. Sir, if a man goes to a Civil Court and loses, he pays costs. If he is an unsuccessful party, he pays costs; costs no doubt oftentimes are not fully compensatory of the actual costs incurred—that I know. But that is not all. That may be a reason for increasing the costs to be awarded by altering the rules by which costs are to be awarded. But do not make it a penalty for a man going to the Court and say "we will deprive you of what is your due." We deal with a set of ignorant people. The man may be an innocent person in the hands of a scheming lawyer. (Mr. R. A. Spence: "Are there any?") I suppose there are. Just as there are scheming merchants—are there not scheming merchants who took advantage of the war boom? Now, Sir, there are black sheep in every fold. Let us not therefore sneer at only one set of people. There are honourable persons and other kinds of persons in every class and profession. Therefore, I say, Sir, it is quite reasonable to suggest that if a man has already got compensation for injuries sustained, let him not have any more. But where his action failed? As I said before, if the cause of action is the same for both cases, that is, if he has to prove only the same set of facts in either case, then no doubt I can understand it. But, where he has to prove more in one Court and less in another Court, that the Court where he has to prove less should say: don't give him any compensation because the other Court has already refused it; that seems to me illogical and to be a case of creating jealousy. Don't give it to him because he has been to my neighbour. It seems to me to be a very indefensible position for any Government or anybody to take up. I therefore, Sir, support Mr. Joshi's amendment.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, my object in rising to address the House is to draw pointed attention to certain aspects of the Bill and of the clause under consideration to which attention has already been drawn to some extent. My Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri, has said that section 19 drives the party injured to the Commissioner. I submit, Sir, that seems to me to be the effect of section 19 (1) and (2) of the Bill. It reads:

"If any question arises in any proceedings under this Act as to the liability of any person to pay compensation (including any question as to whether a person injured is or is not a workman) or as to the amount or duration of compensation (including any question as to the nature or extent of disablement), the question shall, in default of agreement, be settled by the Commissioner."

There is no other alternative. Then the second sub-clause says:

"No Civil Court shall have jurisdiction to settle, decide or deal with any question which is by or under this Act required to be settled, decided or dealt with by a Commissioner."

Therefore, Sir, I think in almost 99 cases out of a hundred, all matters which crop up in connection with compensation for injury have to come up before the Commissioner, and they are required by the Bill to be decided by him. Therefore my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi, suggests that the words "and damages have been awarded in his favour" be added to sub-clause (5) which will read as follows after the addition proposed has been made:

"Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to confer any right to compensation on a workman in respect of any injury if he has instituted in a Civil Court a suit for damages in respect of the injury against the employer or any other person; and damages have been awarded in his favour."

That is how it will read when the present sub-clause (5) is supplemented by the words proposed by him to be added. Otherwise, the first portion of the clause, being followed by the subsequent portion of it, gives no intelligible meaning to the following words "and no suit for damages shall be maintainable by a workman in any Court of law in respect of any injury if he has instituted a claim to compensation in respect of the injury before a Commissioner." These words must mean that the same matter is covered by the civil suit as well as by the proceeding before a Commissioner, not cases where there are other elements justifying a claim for compensation or damage, which can be taken before a Court of law for adjudication. We are not concerned with the question of agreement, but of a civil suit instituted before the Civil Court. Therefore, there seems to be an inherent inconsistency in the Bill itself as framed because it compels an injured workman to go to a Commissioner in all cases under the Bill and then vaguely mentions the Civil Court. We can get some meaning out of it only when we contemplate that in such cases only where the facts justifying a claim for compensation both before a Commissioner as well as in a Civil Court overlap each other, the former proceedings operate to the exclusion of that in a Civil Court and in no other. Nobody can go before the Civil Court for compensation within the meaning of clause 19 of the Bill, but he must appear before the Commissioner for redress in all cases arising in any proceeding under the Bill. Therefore, I submit, Sir, the matter deserves grave consideration by the Honourable Members and to my mind, my friend's amendment, to say the least, suggests some way out of the difficulty. Without it you give the injured man no relief by pointing out to him the road to the Civil Court. I leave the matter in the hands of the House with these words.

Mr. R. A. Spence: Sir, I have even a greater feeling for lawyers than my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, and I am basing my arguments against this amendment because I have a great belief in them. I don't believe there are any scheming lawyers. The Honourable Mover of this amendment, as far as I understand him, objected to the workman being able to go to the law and also being able to go to the lawyer. And he complained, I think, that, if this amendment was not supported by the House, a man who had gone to the lawyer would not be able to go to the law of this Act. Well, now, surely, if he had gone to the lawyer and the lawyer had advised him that under the Civil Code he had a claim for damages and he had exercised that power of free will, which my Honourable friend Mr. Rangachariar thought no man should be deprived of—the right of going to the Courts which has been established by this Government and not by the Congress Party—if exercising that power of free will, he goes to the Civil Court as advised by his lawyer and if he loses his case, surely the lawyer will tell him that his case, having failed in the Court, had failed because he had got no case and therefore he would have no case under the law of this Act and therefore there would be no hardship for him in being prevented from taking proceedings under this Act.

The Honourable Mr. Innes has told us the reasons which have induced Government to cut down that clause and honestly I think his arguments are very strong and I think we ought to refuse to accept this amendment.

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, I am in favour of this argument advanced by the Honourable Mr. Innes that the workman may be made to adhere to this Bill. I am also in favour of this argument which has been advanced by the same Honourable Opposer that the employers should not be harassed. Conceding to that extent, yet I feel bound to submit before this House that things opposed to equity should not be countenanced in the form of any provision. There is a workman, altogether ignorant; he seeks for legal advice. Unfortunately, he is ill-advised and goes to the ordinary Civil Court, contemplating that he will secure a decree there, and his suit in regard to damages,—not for compensation as defined by the present Bill which is being debated upon—is unfortunately dismissed. Now injury he has sustained. He has suffered. There is another rule of law which can be availed of by him but he is deprived of it. Why? Because he was ill-advised. It is simply inequitable that he should be deprived of the provision of this Bill so far as compensation, with reference to certain prescribed injuries goes. I concede that if he is allowed any damage from the Civil Court, the amount of that damage may be deducted. But there is no reason why we should allow a peculiar provision in this Act that he should altogether be deprived of his remedy under the Workmen's Compensation Act if he resorts to the Civil Court with a view to seek ordinary remedy. Apart from that, you will be pleased to see, Sir, that the wording of clause 3, sub-clause (5) is: "Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to confer any right to compensation on a workman in respect of any injury if he has instituted in a Civil Court a suit for damages in respect of the injury against the employer or any other person." Supposing he has got a different cause of action against a person other than the employer. Then, in that case also, he is told "Oh, you should not go to the Commissioner under the Workmen's Compensation Act." Now, in this case the employer will not be harassed. It is "any other person". Is this House going to deprive the workman of another remedy against another person? I submit that this House will support the amendment which speaks for itself and is really commendable. With these few remarks I most heartily support this amendment which is based on equitable grounds.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, Mr. Joshi, if I understood him aright, was professedly attempting to follow the English law. I should like to explain to the House as briefly as possible that Mr. Joshi's amendment is really not the English law at all. There are certain special provisions in the English law which recognise claims in the Civil Court—in the County Court. But when claims are made there, they have one particular effect which Mr. Joshi has not mentioned and which perhaps the House did not realise, and that is, that if the Civil Court proceeds to assess compensation, it shall, if it is of opinion that the proceedings ought to have been brought under the Workmen's Compensation Act, award to the employer the whole costs of the case. Now, we have not got that in our law. It might be rather a dangerous provision in our law if Mr. Joshi amends it in that way, because the workman having got something out of the Civil Court and having had costs awarded against him would say, "At all events, let me again try my luck with the Commissioner; at least I may get something which will be a set off against the costs which have been awarded to the employer against me." In India a provision of that sort would probably swallow up most of the compensation subsequently awarded. As has been suggested, not by laymen in this House at all but several times to-day by lawyers themselves, this might be an advantage to the lawyer. It will force every workman, once he becomes acquainted with the law, to go to a lawyer and seek his advice as to the Court where he will stand the best chance of getting adequate damages or compensation. I would remind the House that compensation under this Act is not damages. It is quite another thing from damages—damages which a Civil Court can award. In this particular case compensation is defined as the compensation obtainable or awardable under the provisions of this Act. Now, Sir, if the workman is to be driven to take legal advice—it is suggested that he should and ought to take legal advice . . . (Mr. N. M. Joshi: "I am against it. You can prevent it.") Mr. Joshi will prevent the workman taking legal advice in this matter, he would like the workman to make up his own mind without any assistance whatever in the matter as to the proper course he should pursue. I think that is dangerous too, because it will merely tend to swell litigation. The workman, as a matter of fact, in such a case, would not proceed to file a suit for damages without some advice, and I think the House will realise how dangerous it is for any would-be client to decide on litigation without taking advice. In many places he can get it very cheaply. There are struggling pleaders just beginning their career, or perhaps pleaders who have struggled for many years without establishing a career, who are quite prepared to give advice—advice that certainly is not fit to be followed in every case—without due consideration of the law on the subject and of the facts. Sir, I think, if the workman deliberately or even inadvertently goes to the Civil Court and decides to bring a claim there for damages, then he should stand by what he has done. No provision is made in this case—I do not quite know what Mr. Joshi's contention is, but would he allow the workman half way through the proceedings in the Civil Court to change his mind and ask the Court to stay proceedings and then say, "I am going to the Commissioner to get compensation in that way. I wish to take no further proceedings in this case." In such a case the workman's money will have been wasted, and he will undoubtedly have to pay the cost of the suit up to that time. (Mr. N. M. Joshi: "Something is better than nothing.") I do not agree that something is better than nothing. If we are going to have anything in the law, we must have the thing complete. It is these "somethings that are better than nothing" that lead to difficulties and to a series of rulings on every difficult section or provision in our law in India. I entirely disapprove of that suggestion that we should have something that is better than nothing. I would suggest that the workman should in this case choose his remedy and should stick to it.

Mr. Chairman: Amendment moved:

"In clause 3, sub-section (5), after the word 'person' insert the words 'and damages have been awarded in his favour'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I beg to move:

"That in clause 3 (5) the following be substituted for sub-clauses (a) and (b):

'If he has received compensation in respect of the injury under the provisions of this Act except with the leave of the Commissioner and in any suit so instituted the amount of compensation recovered under this Act shall be taken into account in awarding damages'."

Sir, this amendment deals with the converse case. We have just now dealt with the first portion of this section in which if a man went to a civil court we told him he ought not to claim compensation under this Act. This latter portion of the section deals with the case of a man where he is sought to be prevented from going to the ordinary court. And on what ground? Mark the words—"if he has instituted a claim to compensation under the Act he cannot go to the civil court." If he has merely instituted a claim, which may be infructuous, he cannot go to the civil court. Honourable Members may have noticed from the various provisions of this Bill this compensation is awarded under various restrictions. The man has to give notice of the accident within a reasonable time. He has to give notice of the claim, and if he does not do this it is left to the discretion of the Commissioner whether to award compensation or not. Then again, the amount awarded under this Act is very small. Again, as Honourable Members must have noticed, the nature of the accident may be such that more compensation and damages would be awarded in the civil court. Therefore the right to go to a civil court is inherent with us. Whenever there is a wrong there is a remedy. That is a well-known rule of law. There can be no wrong without remedy. Therefore the right to go to the civil courts established by the Government of the country is the inherent right of every subject of His Majesty. By this clause we propose to take away that right; and for what reason? Because the man has merely instituted a claim for compensation which may or may not be successful. Therefore it is not right to have such a clause. You cannot take away this valuable inherent right of every citizen except for good cause; the good cause will be if he has recovered sufficient compensation. But merely the instituting of a claim should not be a ground for driving him out of court. That is why I have proposed, Sir, that "if he has received compensation in respect of injuries under the provisions of this Act" he should not go to the civil court unless the case is so serious that the Commissioner considers that he can give leave for going to the court. It will be seen, I do not permit him to go to Court without the leave of the Commissioner. I provide safeguards against vexatious claims, so that if he has received compensation he cannot go to the civil court except with the leave of the Commissioner, and even when he goes to the civil court, I make adequate protection to the employers by providing "and in any suit so instituted the amount of compensation recovered under this Act shall be taken into account in awarding damages." Therefore, it is a just provision; the employer does not suffer, the employee does not suffer; on the other hand the inherent right of every subject of His Majesty is preserved. You do not do any violence to that well known rule of law 'No wrong without a remedy.' On the other hand, if you leave it as it is, you simply say because you have instituted a claim to compensation, therefore you should not go to the civil court or because merely an agreement has been come to. If an agreement has been come to, what is the satisfaction to the man by merely having an agreement. If compensation had been given under the agreement, I can understand it. Supposing he does not register the agreement as is required under the Act, the agreement is no good. Therefore, in either case only if he has recovered compensation, he should be deprived of the remedy which he has under the law. Therefore, I move the amendment which stands in my name.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, if Mr. Joshi's amendment was bad, then I say Mr. Rangachariar's is worse, much worse. In the first place if the amendment proposed by Mr. Rangachariar is accepted, it will mean that there will be no objection to a workman filing simultaneously a suit under the common law and a claim under this Act, and that goes, as I have said, against one of our principles. I should be prepared to say that there was something in Mr. Rangachariar's argument if there was any chance of a workman losing his claim before a Commissioner on the ground that he was not a workman covered by the Act. If he lost it purely on a technical point, then naturally he ought to have his remedy in the civil court; but he has got his remedy, for this Act, as you see, applies only to workmen as defined in this Bill. If, therefore, a man is non-suited in a claim before the Commissioner on the ground that he is not a workman, then there is nothing to prevent him from filing a suit in a civil court. Then, again, Mr. Rangachariar makes an important point of the fact that merely if a workman has instituted a claim before a Commissioner, he is not allowed to go to the civil court and he points out that this is unfair. He suggested that there might be some reason in it if we only debarred him from going to the civil court if he got compensation from the Commissioner. But this Act is far more favourable to the workman than the common law. If a workman filing a claim before a Commissioner where he has not got to prove neglect, fails, then a fortiori he will fail before a civil court. We are preventing him from wasting his money. But the real reason why I object to Mr. Rangachariar's amendment is this; let us assume that the workman has obtained compensation from the Commissioner and then wants to be allowed to file a suit in the civil court. If we accept the amendment, we practically tempt the workman to waste the compensation that he has got from the Commissioner in prosecuting probably a useless case in a civil court. Sir, I say that is not right and I oppose the amendment.

(At this stage Mr. President took the Chair.)

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"That in clause 3 (5), the following be substituted for sub-clauses (a) and (b):

'If he has received compensation in respect of the injury under the provisions of this Act except with the leave of the Commissioner and in any suit so instituted the amount of compensation recovered under this Act shall be taken into account in awarding damages.'"

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move the following amendment which stands in my name:

"In clause 3, in sub-clause (5), omit sub-section (b) "

We have deprived, Sir, the workman from going to a civil court for damages in two cases. The first is where he has instituted a claim before the Commissioner in respect of any claim and the second is where an agreement has been come to between the workman and his employer providing for the payment of damages or compensation in respect of the injury in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

I beg to move an amendment that this sub-clause (b) which deals with 4 P.M. the agreement, may be deleted.

Sir, in the former portion of sub-clause (5) we have already provided that the workman may bring a suit for damages against any other person if he so likes. When he can bring a suit for damages against a person other than an employer, why should he be debarred from bringing that suit if an agreement has been arrived at between himself and his employer in respect to the liability of the employer. This will be incongruous. Sir, it is also possible that the employers may take advantage of this sub-clause, and at the time when a workman seeks employment the employer might say to him that he would only be given employment if he gave an agreement that in no case will he be entitled to go to the Civil Court for damages; and the workman will have to agree to it for the sake of work and this will be very hard for the workman. Therefore, I beg to submit, that this sub-clause (b) should be deleted.

Mr. A. G. Clow: Sir, I ask the House to reject this amendment. I do not think the Honourable Member has considered what the effect of it will be. The obvious effect will be that the good employer, the benevolent employer, who at once puts his hand into his pocket and pays out the compensation will still be liable to a suit for damages, whereas the quarrelsome employer who says "No, I refuse to give any compensation," and who forces the employee to file a claim before the Commissioner will thereby protect himself from a suit. Now, our whole object has been to encourage employers to pay compensation without any trouble. We have tried so to frame the Act that they will be able to calculate compensation without legal help, without official help; and the amendment moved by the Honourable Member simply strikes at the root of all this. It is a direct incitement to the employer, in order to protect himself, to refuse to pay compensation at once.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Sir, I should like to know from my Honourable friend Mr. Clow or from anyone else how the workman by this clause is protected against a dishonest employer. Suppose an employer, who is a very wealthy man and a very well educated man, persuades his employee, who is a poor illiterate man, to come to an agreement that he should accept compensation of Re. 1 or Rs. 2 a month, whereas if the complaint is made to the Compensation Commissioner a compensation of Rs. 10 a month will be due to him. How is this case provided for by this clause. As a matter of fact, my fear is that if you keep this clause, many poor people, illiterate people, will, in sheer ignorance accept a very small dole or small monthly payment from the employer, and if they once accept it and if any other people afterwards tell them that they have made a mistake they shall not be able to go to the Workmen's Compensation Commissioner and complain that they were cheated. I therefore think that this amendment is a very proper amendment and should be accepted in the interests of the ignorant and illiterate working classes of this country.

The motion was negatived.

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, the amendment which I propose to move is as follows:

"That in clause 3, sub-clause (5) (b), for the words 'an agreement has been come to,' substitute the words 'a lawful compromise in writing has been arrived at'."

Supposing, Sir, a workman goes to the civil court and institutes his claim; he will be confronted with this plea, which I am afraid in a majority of cases may be raised, that there was an agreement between the employer and the workman who is now suing in the civil court. It is very risky so far as the interests of the workman go, because agreement covers both oral agreement and an agreement in writing. If the agreement which

I should like to be substituted is reduced to writing, then that is a pretty good safeguard against injustice. But if the mere word "agreement" remains, as it has been proposed, in this clause, then every employer when he will be impleaded as defendant will say, "Oh, there was an agreement between myself and the workman"; and then both parties will be compelled to produce a number of witnesses. I think the House will agree with me that if both the parties have got to produce evidence it is very expensive, very costly, and litigation may be prolonged. But if this modest amendment of mine is accepted, Sir, the natural result thereof would be that there would be no fear of this sort. A compromise which has been reduced to writing will be produced there and then, and it will put the whole litigation to an end. Of course a second question will naturally crop up, and that would be whether that compromise is lawful or unlawful. To substantiate my contention in this connection, I may put forward a hypothetical illustration. Supposing a workman is a minor and he goes to the court and the employer says: "There was an agreement between this minor and myself." Will this House approve of this agreement which has been entered into by a minor forming one party and the employer the other party? The whole doctrine of minority would be set at naught altogether; in some cases we protect minors. But here is an Act of a very peculiar character in which the minority is also not protected. That minor workman may be duped away, he may be induced to subscribe to an agreement or bond or a deed of compromise. Therefore that deed or that bond or that agreement will be altogether unlawful. If this amendment is accepted by this House it will decrease litigation instead of increasing it. Many Honourable Members have been showing themselves averse to litigation. Here is an amendment, and I shall see how many of them will now come forward and express their sympathy with it. With these few words, I place this amendment before the House.

Captain E. V. Sassoon: Sir, the Honourable Member seems to have omitted to look at clause 28 and clause 29 of the Bill, from which he will see that no agreement is effected unless it has been registered by the Commissioner who will only do so on being satisfied as to its genuineness. On the other hand, if the employer omits to send the agreement to be registered by the Commissioner under clause 29, the workman has all his rights under this Act. Therefore, the Honourable Member will realise that the workman is well protected from the unscrupulous employer who may try and make him sign an unjust agreement without having to go to the law at all.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: Sir, I would like to supplement what my Honourable friend, Captain Sassoon, just said. As Mr. Sassoon has correctly pointed out, all important agreements under this Act have to be registered, and therefore have to be written. But I think probably Dr. Nand Lal had in his mind, when he proposed his amendment, the case of half-monthly payments for temporary disability. We definitely decided that we should not insist on the registration of those half-monthly agreements for the simple reason that the Commissioner would be flooded up with applications for registration if every petty compensation for a few days' temporary disability had to be reduced to writing and had to be registered with the Commissioner. So what we have tried to do is to provide another remedy for the workman. Supposing the employer and the workman come to an agreement for half-monthly payment, the workman always has the power under clause 6(1) of the Bill to apply to the Commissioner for a review of that agreement, and further powers are given under section 10 where the Commissioner is empowered to accept a claim, whether by way of half-monthly payment or otherwise, even though that claim may be time-barred under the rest of the Act. I think we have met the point sufficiently well.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President (to Mr. N. M. Joshi): Is your point not met by the amendment just disposed of?

Mr. N. M. Joshi: No, Sir. I beg to move the amendment which stands in my name, namely:

"To clause 3, sub-clause (5) (b), at the end add the following:

'and provided the agreement has been registered with the Commissioner'."

Sir, this amendment will practically make the registration of agreements almost compulsory. The Honourable Mr. Innes just said that important documents will be registered, but the unimportant ones will not be registered, and it is not that every agreement will be registered. It is necessary at the present stage of our working classes who are mostly illiterate and ignorant that every agreement should be registered. I have personally no fear that there will be hundreds and thousands of these agreements from every province and from every district so that the Workmen's Compensation Commissioner will be flooded with them. I do not believe accidents take place in such large numbers as was made out by my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes. I therefore think that my amendment will safeguard the interests of the illiterate and ignorant workmen against dishonest employers and I hope that protection is due to them.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Sir, may I suggest that the word "settlement" may be substituted for the word "agreement" in Mr. Joshi's amendment, as the word "agreement" is likely to cause difficulties in many cases.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: Mr. Joshi said that he did not believe that there would be many claims under this Act and he didn't believe that, if we prescribed that claims for half-monthly payments must be registered, the Commissioner would be flooded with applications for registration. Well, Sir, English experience shows that most claims for compensation arise in respect of temporary disabilities and small accidents, and I find that in one year there were no less than 355,000 claims admitted. As I explained in reply to Dr. Nand Lal, we have tried to provide for this point in another way. We do not propose, we never have proposed to insist on the registration of half-monthly payments but we have provided under clause 6 (2) a machinery for the purpose and we have given power under clause 10 (1) to a Commissioner to extend the period for a claim if he so thinks fit. I do not think myself that that amendment is either necessary or desirable.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 3 was added to the Bill.

Mr. B. N. Misra (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I beg to move:

"In sub-clause A (i) of clause 4 (i), for the word 'thirty' the word 'sixty' be substituted."

[Mr. B. N. Misra.]

This clause provides that in the case of death of a workman only thirty months' wages will be paid as compensation; that is quite sufficient. Sir, probably some of the Honourable Members will call me very greedy as I am always asking a little more. But I think Honourable Members will find that this proposal to raise thirty to sixty months' wages will not entail such hardship on the mill-owners, factory owners and rich people, nor will they find it difficult to make that payment for it will be a payment in the interests of labour itself. Sir, the workmen that are in view come mostly from the labouring class who get say about Rs. 15 to 20 or say 25 a month. The amount that is contemplated under this section will probably be from Rs. 600 to Rs. 800. Rupees 20 to 25 has been ascertained to be the average monthly wages of the workman. Now, Sir, will this payment really entail hardship upon the millowners? It has been said that it is a new Act and that industry will perhaps be ruined if workmen are allowed such compensation. Sir, this is not a general order of things. Accidents are, of course, rare. For instance in the case of agriculture or in the case of landed owners, we get famine or we get floods occasionally. We do not get them often. What is done in such cases? Whenever there is a flood or a famine, even the benign Government not only gives up the rent from the poor tenants but also comes to the relief of the famine-stricken or the flood-stricken people. I think that is a very wholesome rule observed by the Government.

Mr. President: Order, order. The Honourable Member has wandered very far from his own amendment.

Mr. B. N. Misra: Sir, I was giving an illustration.

Mr. President: The illustration is out of order.

Mr. B. N. Misra: The mill-owners, factory-owners or mine-owners, are not such poor people as will find it difficult to meet these occasional accidents which will be due to the negligence or it may be really due to some actions on the part of the owners themselves or it may be due to some natural causes. But these rich people amass their wealth with the labour of these poor labourers. The prosperity of these industries is due to the workman's labour. If the workmen are not properly looked after or if there is not sufficient inducement to workmen, I think these industries cannot prosper. These small payments, instead of being a hardship to the millowners or factory-owners or mine-owners, will really do good to them inasmuch as it will induce the workmen to readily come forward and join the factories, etc. Now, Sir, the amount that has been fixed is thirty months' wages in case of death. Is that the value set upon a man's life—whether he be a workman or any other man? If you put it at thirty months' wages, I think it is too little. If it is intended to help his dependants, then also it is very little. Of course the maximum is fixed at Rs. 2,500. Probably that may help the higher paid men such as engineers and others who get perhaps Rs. 200 or Rs. 300 a month. In their case Rs. 2,500 may be sufficient. But in the case of poor workmen, thirty months' wages is very small. The Honourable Mr. Innes said that even when a man is murdered, nobody compels the murderer to pay compensation to the relations of the deceased. When a man has murdered, the moment it is found out, he is hanged by the neck and nobody lives to pay compensation. Our civil law lays down that no man's heirs or successors are responsible for the guilt or criminal action of his predecessors. That is why the heirs or successors are not asked to pay compensation. The man is either transported to the Andamans or is kept in jail for several years.

Mr. President: Order, order. The Honourable Member is getting even further from his amendment.

Mr. B. N. Misra: Sir, my submission is, it is really a moral duty on the part of these owners who are rich men to meet this occasional expenditure which will really be a relief to the workman and will not really tell so much upon the industry. I therefore submit that thirty months' wages is too small and that it ought to be increased to sixty months' wages.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In sub-clause A (i) of clause 4 (1), for the word 'thirty' the word 'sixty' be substituted."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move that:

"In sub-clause A (i) of clause 4 (1), substitute the words 'thirty-six' for the word 'thirty'."

My amendment is based on the same principle as that of Mr. Misra. No doubt I am more modest in my demand than Mr. Misra. I have followed the period that has been allowed in the English Statute, and I shall not be ashamed of my slavish imitation of the English provision where it is beneficial to workmen. Sir, in the English Statute, thirty-six months' period has been allowed. My own impression is that even sixty months' period which was moved by Mr. Misra was not a long period. But thirty-six months' period is not much longer than the thirty months which has been allowed in the Bill. I do not know, Sir, on what basis these periods have been fixed. I submit that thirty-six months will not be long enough to put heavy pressure on the employer or the owner but will be much more convenient to the workman or his family. No doubt, the standard of living in England is higher than in this country. But at the same time, the number of dependants here is much larger than what it is in England. I submit that such a modest amendment as to substitute "36" for "30" should be accepted by the House.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In sub-clause A (i) of clause 4 (1), substitute the words 'thirty-six' for the word 'thirty'."

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: A scale of this kind must always be more or less a matter of opinion. We worked at it very hard. We had a Committee on it, as the House knows, in July, and we had a Joint Committee on it. Both the Committees have agreed that this scale is, having regard to the conditions of India, on the whole not only a fair scale but a liberal scale. It has been accepted generally throughout the country, and I do hope that the House will be guided by the advice which it has received from the two Committees and by the fact that the country generally has accepted the scale that we have proposed. I deprecate most earnestly any tampering with the scale at this time. I hope that the House will reject this amendment.

The motion was negatived:

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Sir, I move the following amendment which stands in my name:

"In sub-clause A (i) of clause 4 (1) after the word 'or' insert the words 'the sum of five hundred rupees whichever of these sums is the larger but not exceeding in any case' and omit the words 'whichever is less'."

The object of this amendment is to put down the minimum limit of Rs. 500 as compensation in a case of accident where the workman will be killed. Sir, Schedule IV of this Bill lays down the minimum compensation of Rs. 240. It sets down Rs. 8 as the lowest assumed wage, so that 30 months' wages come to Rs. 240. I consider that this minimum wage is too little taking into consideration the wages in India as well as the prices in India. In the English Act—I am very sorry to refer to the English Act again and again—the minimum compensation provided for is £150 which comes to Rs. 2,250. After all, the prices in India are not ten times as low as in England and the wages in India are not also ten times as low as in England. I therefore think that in placing the minimum at Rs. 240 we are really giving too little for the lower paid workman who may be killed on account of an accident. The sum of Rs. 240 as compensation for death to the wife and children of the workman I think will be considered by the House as too low. The minimum limit that I have proposed is only Rs. 500, about one-fourth of the minimum limit proposed in the English law. I have not proposed a very exorbitant limit at all. It only assumes that the minimum wage taken should be about Rs. 16 or 17. I therefore hope that the amendment proposed by me will be accepted by the House.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I am afraid that I must again oppose this amendment. It is perfectly true that our lowest assumed wage for the purpose of Schedule IV is Rs. 8 a month, and therefore the actual minimum amount of compensation which is payable for death is Rs. 240. But for the individual workman the minimum compensation which he is going to get depends upon the amount of wage that he was drawing. If a man was drawing Rs. 30 a month, his minimum compensation will be Rs. 900. Mr. Joshi has drawn attention to the fact that £150 is the minimum compensation payable in England. That remark is not strictly accurate, if Mr. Joshi will permit me to say so, for the English law makes provision for a case where the workman leaves only partial dependants and in that case £150 has not got to be paid but such amount as may be considered reasonable. But taking £150 as the minimum compensation payable under the English Act, let us compare that with the minimum compensation we pay. What does £150 really represent in England. The average wage of a workman in England may be taken to be £2 and therefore £150 means 75 weeks' wages or say 18 months' wages. Our minimum compensation is based throughout on 30 months' wages and I say that having regard to our conditions in India our scale is already adequate and liberal and I oppose the amendment.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I beg to move:

"That in clause 4 (1) in sub-clause A (ii) the word 'five' be substituted for the word 'two'."

In this Bill we have provided that compensation in the case of the death of a minor shall be Rs. 200 only which I consider to be very low and

I propose that Rs. 500 instead of Rs. 200 would be a very reasonable amount. The death of a minor is as valuable as the death of an adult member, if not more. There are minors who have dependants and in such cases the award of Rs. 200 will be absurdly small. Moreover if the minor were alive, his dependants would enjoy the benefit of his work for a longer period which they lose by his death. I move therefore that Rs. 500 be substituted for Rs. 200 which is very low. With these words I move my amendment.

Mr. B. C. Allen (Assam: Nominated Official): Sir, I hope that the House will throw out the amendment of Mr. Agnihotri. If it were carried my own amendment would be killed before it was born, a fact which as the prospective parent I cannot contemplate without horror. I oppose the amendment mainly on the ground that it cuts across the whole principle of the Bill. If you look at the Statement of Objects and Reasons you will see that the Bill is intended to remove the hardship caused by the death of a workman. There is no question whatever of penalising the employer or of offering a solatium to the wounded feelings of the parents. Mr. Agnihotri has stated that the death of a minor is as "valuable" as the death of an adult. He suggested that minors had dependants. I think he has overlooked the fact that a minor under the Act is less than 15 years old, and although there may be husbands of the age of 14, I imagine that the number of fathers at that age is very small. Even if there is an occasional father of 14, the chances of his being killed are almost infinitesimal. There is another perhaps even more important principle which Mr. Agnihotri's amendment ignores. I feel some diffidence in referring to the English Act, but if you turn to that Act you will find that in the case of persons who have no dependants the compensation is limited to £10, or rather to the cost of medical attendance and funeral expenses not exceeding £10. You will also find if you turn to the English law that it has thought it necessary to prevent parents from benefiting from the death of their children. Under the various English Acts a father as such has no insurable interest in his child. The Friendly Societies Act also limits the payment made on account of the death of a child to £10. Now, if these precautions are necessary in England I imagine that they are also necessary in India. I do not for a moment mean to suggest that Indian parents are not very fond of their children. In my experience it is one of the most pronounced characteristics of Indian families. But English parents are fond of their children also, and I cannot feel that the House will be acting wisely in disregarding a precaution which has been found necessary in the mother-country.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. B. C. Allen: Sir, as Captain Sassoon has withdrawn his amendment and as Mr. Agnihotri's amendment has not been carried, perhaps the House will accept the amendment which I have to move without further debate. (Cries of "No.") I understand that they do not agree. I move, Sir:

"That in clause 4 (1), sub-clause A (ii), the word 'one' be substituted for the word 'two'."

I only have to emphasise the points to which I have already called attention when speaking to Mr. Agnihotri's amendment. The draft Bill is departing from the principle of the English Act: is departing from the principle of the Bill that was originally laid before us: it is introducing a new and in my opinion unsound principle. There is a further aspect of the case. Honourable Members will perhaps say, "why on earth should this compensation be reduced when the representative of the Millowners is willing to raise it"? I must confess that when I first read his amendment, I felt that I was being smitten by one in my own house. Various explanations came across my mind. I thought of Tennyson's "wealthy men who care not how they give" and the danger such wealthy men may be to the body politic. Then I thought of that horrid tag of Virgil's— "Timeo Danaos," which might I suppose be translated "you must look even a gift horse in the mouth if the giver is a Greek". But my Honourable friend has since cleared away all my doubts. When he addressed us on the introduction of the Bill he explained with a frankness and freedom which I have always associated with the late President Wilson, that though the millowners would disburse this money they would subsequently recover it from us the consumers. And this is a point which I want the House to bear in mind, because previous experience has, I believe, almost invariably shown that when you put a cess upon an industry and that industry can and does proceed to recover that impost, it generally recovers a good deal more. In fact in this particular case it would probably be unavoidable. You could not divide the small sum payable over each individual dhoti, chaddar or whatever it is produced in these mills, and the price of each article would have to rise probably by at least one anna. Now, I have no doubt that the cotton mill industry could recover this sum. They are a highly organized industry, and it seems not unlikely that at no distant date they will be protected and will be able to recover the money. But we all know that all industries are not in that position. What about the rubber industry which some time ago was not able to extract from the consumers even so much as the cost of production? I fancy that there will be a considerable number of small Indian industries in this country which will not be in the position of wealthy industries like the mill industry. I think that we should remember what The Honourable Mr. Innes said when introducing the Bill. It is very important to consider the small industries and to carry the manufacturer with us, to make him feel that he has been fairly and justly treated. Now, what is the reason, what is the excuse offered by the Select Committee for raising the rate originally laid down in the Bill when it was submitted to the House? They say that they have to impose this charge upon the industry, not because it is a good charge, or a right charge, not because it is the just or proper thing to do, but because it "meets the views of those who were of opinion that the original provision appeared to hold somewhat cynically cheap the life of a minor." Now, I ask this House, is that a sufficient reason? Are we to do what we do not think right simply because somebody may say that we held the life of a minor cynically cheap? Is there any rule of guidance for this House except that it should do what it thinks right? Are we to do a thing which we do not approve, simply because somebody may say something? I suggest that rather than do that, we had better close our doors and retire from the work of legislation altogether.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Sir, the argument of my Honourable friend Mr. Allen seems to be that small industries will be ruined. Again, Sir, I want to know whether there are any small industries such as coffee where accidents take place in large numbers. If accidents do not take place in large numbers, a sum of Rs. 200 is not going to ruin the industry. I think, therefore, the amendment is not acceptable to any Member in this House.

Captain E. V. Sassoon: Sir, I would like to point out to the Honourable Mover of the last amendment that even the mill industry is not always in a prosperous condition and we fully appreciate that there may be times when anything that raises our cost of production would have to be very carefully reviewed. I have pointed out to this House already that it is true that any increase in the cost of production does perhaps in part fall on the consumer, and it is so in the long run; but as far as these particular charges are concerned, my own view is that whether Rs. 100 or Rs. 300 is paid as compensation for the death of a minor, the insurance premium in this case would not differ very much. All these matters come back to the amount of the insurance premium. Now, Sir, the reason why I did not move my previous amendment was not perhaps so much due to Mr. Allen's remarks on Mr. Agnihotri's amendment, as those of the Honourable Mr. Innes when speaking on the amendment moved by Mr. Joshi. It seems to me that if an adult might receive Rs. 240 or Rs. 260 as compensation, it would not be logical for me to suggest that the amount of a minor should be raised from Rs. 200 to Rs. 300. But I would like to defend the Rs. 200 as supported by the Select Committee. The point I take is that though it may be perfectly true that the minor of 14 or 15 has no dependants; at the same time his parents or grand-parents have been to some expense and trouble in bringing him up and may well hope for some return in their old age when he is in his prime of life. His death therefore in a way removes their old age pension, and I think it only fair that they should get, if I may use an insurance analogy, their premium back. For this reason, I hope that the House will not agree to Mr. Allen's amendment and will keep the Rs. 200 as supported by the Joint Committee.

The motion was negatived.

Raj Bahadur L. P. Sinha (Gaya cum Monghyr: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, I beg to move—

"That at the end of sub-clause A (ii) of clause 4 (1) add the following:

'Provided he has no invalid dependants solely depending for their livelihood on the income of the deceased minor.

'(iii) In the case of a minor having invalid dependants solely depending for their livelihood on the income of the minor, thirty months' wages or Rs. 350, whichever is more."

Sir, we generally find that amongst the working classes a minor son or daughter of a wage-earner, who has become invalid or infirm, either through natural causes or by accident, maintains the parents or dependants through his or her own earnings. Moreover, the sons or daughters of day labourers begin to work from practically their childhood because they cannot afford to do otherwise. So in the circumstances, I think Honourable Members will agree with me that blind or invalid parents or dependants solely depending on the income of deceased minors for their livelihood should not be thrown into a miserable plight because the minor in his daily duties has got injured and died.

Sir, with these few words I move my amendment.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I do not think that the House will expect me to say very much on this amendment. I think the House would be well advised to do as has been done hitherto and stick to the figure suggested by the Joint Committee.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. B. N. Misra: Sir, if I am not mistaken, probably many of the Honourable Members want it to rain copious showers over the middle of the ocean but they do not want even a drizzle over the scorched and dry land. Their attitude has been always to support the man of wealth. I have already submitted my arguments in my last speech and I do not wish to say anything more here. I respectfully submit to the House my amendment:

"That in sub-clause B (i) of clause 4 (1) for the words 'forty-two' the words 'eighty-four' be substituted."

The motion was negatived.

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, in face of the fact that amendment No. 31 which was moved by Mr. Joshi has been rejected and the same principle for all intents and purposes is involved in amendment No. 40,* I do not propose to move it.

Mr. W. S. J. Willson (Bengal: European): Sir, I rise to move the following amendment:

"After sub-clause B (ii) of clause 4 (1) add the following:

'Provided that where a workman, who from previous injury suffers permanent partial disablement, meets with an accident which in conjunction with the previous injury results in total disablement the compensation shall be fifty per cent. of the compensation provided under clauses (i) and (ii).'"

Sir, I move this amendment in the belief that I am proposing something not only perfectly fair to the workman and fair to the employer, but of positive advantage to the workman. I have no desire to cut down what is paid to the unfortunate individual who is damaged in his work but if you take the case of a man who has, either before the passing of this Act when he may not have received compensation or after the passing of this Act when he will have received compensation, lost, say, one arm. He would under the Act, if it were his right arm, get 70 per cent. under Schedule I; and then if he loses, in the course of further employment, the other arm, which would be the left arm, he would get 60 per cent., making a total of 130 per cent. of the compensation. Now, I do not think the House will consider that although a man suffers two injuries and suffers twice, he should necessarily get more than the total which he would get if he were totally disabled. Apart from that, if he has already drawn the percentage for the first accident, it seems to me that it would be positively against the interests of a subsequent employer to take him on, if the subsequent employer, by removing only one other arm in the course of an accident, renders himself liable to pay for a total disablement. We will say the first employer pays 70 per cent., the second employer who has the misfortune to lose the man's other arm has to pay 42 months' pay as for total disablement. It may be said and it has been said to me in private conversation that the argument against the amendment is that the poor man who has only one arm will be very much less likely to get a job. But, Sir, I do not think we all take that unkind view. I think there is a good deal of humanity in the world, and I think a great many employers are only too pleased if they can see their way to employ a man who has suffered from some physical disability. We have all, I have no doubt, seen damaged workmen at work in Railways and public services. There is no earthly reason why a man with one arm or one leg cannot make a perfectly good gate-keeper on any railway; but if he happens not to be looking when a train came up he certainly would be under a disability in running away and he might lose the other leg. Is the employer to be afraid of that and not employ that man? There are various machines in industries which can perfectly well be worked by a man with one arm or a man with one leg. I need not particularise them; those who are acquainted with industries and machinery will be well aware that what I say is correct. I think, Sir, that no further words should be necessary from me to emphasise the justice of what I say, that my amendment will prove in effect to be perfectly fair and positively beneficial to workmen in certain conditions, and fair to employers in any case.

* "That in sub-clause B (i) of clause 4 (1) after the word 'or' insert the words 'the sum of rupees two thousand whichever of these sums is the larger but not exceeding in any case' and omit the words 'whichever is less'."

Mr. A. G. Clow: Sir, this raises a somewhat intricate question, but I think the Honourable Member was really arguing on a fallacy, the fallacy being that the wages of a workman after an injury were the same as his wages before the injury. If he will look at the top of Schedule I, at the head of the column giving the percentage, he will see the phrase "percentage of loss of earning capacity." In other words, what we say is that in the normal case the man who has lost his right arm above the elbow has lost 70 per cent. of his earning capacity, and the wage which he might expect to receive after the injury will, on the average, be only 30 per cent. of the wage he was getting before. Consequently, when he is permanently disabled,—let us take the case of a man on Rs. 30 a month—we estimate that his average wage after the injury will be only Rs. 9. So that when finally he is completely disabled he will get 9 times 42 rupees. If the Honourable Member will take the trouble to work this out, I think he will find it comes to the difference between the compensation he originally got and the compensation he would have got had he been completely disabled.

Now that deals only with one side of the question which is the case of injuries under the Schedule. But as the House is aware, there are other permanent injuries. The Honourable Member's amendment refers not only to sub-clause (i) but to sub-clause (ii) also, and he was careful to make no reference to sub-clause (ii) in the course of his speech. "In the case of an injury", I shall read the sub-clause, "In the case of an injury not specified in Schedule I, such percentage of the compensation payable in the case of permanent total disablement as is proportionate to the loss of earning capacity permanently caused by the injury." In other words, what the Commissioner has to decide is, how much was this man earning before and how much he could earn now? If the Honourable Member can persuade the Commissioner that the workman is now able to earn exactly the same wage as he used to before the injury, obviously no compensation will be payable at all. I hope that this meets the Honourable Member's point.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I gave notice of an amendment to sub-clause B (ii) of clause 4 (1) to substitute a clause for the existing one, but with your permission, Sir, I now wish to move an amendment to substitute 'greater' for 'less' instead of the amendment of which I gave notice. Sir, the compensation which we allow in this case is Rs. 15 or a sum equal to one-fourth of his monthly wages, whichever is less. By my amendment it will come to Rs. 15 or $\frac{1}{4}$ th of his monthly wages whichever is greater. There may be cases in which a workman may be drawing, say Rs. 100 or 200 or Rs. 250, and if he gets a partial injury and is unable to work for the time being, he will be entitled to get only Rs. 15 or $\frac{1}{4}$ th or whichever be the less. That means Rs. 15 and this sum for a fortnight will be quite insufficient and inadequate for his own and his family's maintenance. Therefore, Sir, I propose that instead of Rs. 15 it should be Rs. 15 or $\frac{1}{4}$ th of the pay whichever be greater. If we take the analogy of Government servants, who when they are injured generally get half their pay for the month, we find a support to my amendment and the same analogy should

[Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri.]

5 P.M. apply in the case of workers who should also be allowed to get the half pay for the month and therefore, Sir, I move my amendment to substitute "greater" for "less."

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I need only say in respect of this amendment, Sir, that the effect of it will be that, if a workman on Rs. 10 a month gets temporarily disabled, under Mr. Agnihotri's proposal he will get compensation in half-monthly payments of Rs. 15 each half month. That is to say, a workman on Rs. 10 a month will have his pay raised to Rs. 30 a month while he is temporarily disabled. It seems to me, Sir, that the amendment is on the face of it absurd.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 4 was added to the Bill.

Rai Bahadur L. P. Sinha: Sir, I beg to move:

"To sub-clause (a) of clause 5, at the end the following be added:

'Provided the workman was not on leave without pay or under suspension for any period during the preceding twelve months from the date of accident; but in such cases monthly wages shall be calculated at twelve times the rate of monthly salary which he was drawing on the day of accident divided by twelve.'

I beg to move this amendment because there may be cases arising very often that the workman joins his work after remaining for a long time under suspension or on leave without pay. Now, Sir, in these cases, if monthly wages are calculated according to clause 5, sub-clause (a), then the workman will I think lose a great amount of money which he would have received otherwise by way of compensation. As, for example, a workman gets an accident or injury on the 15th of a month: he rejoined his work on the first of the month after six months' leave without pay or remaining under suspension for the same period. Now, taking it for granted that he was at the time of the accident drawing a monthly rate of pay of Rs. 60; if his monthly wage is calculated according to the present clause which is not so very clear on the point I think his pay of six months' active service will only be taken into account whereas if the amendment which I have proposed is accepted, I don't think the workman is expected to lose anything neither will the employer be giving anything more than what the workman's real dues would have been.

With these remarks I move my amendment.

Mr. A. G. Olow: I admit, Sir, that this is an extremely complicated clause. I observe that the Honourable Member has been so impressed by its complications that he has introduced in his own amendment a quite unnecessary complication where he says we should first multiply and then divide by 12. I suggest that the result of that mathematical calculation would be to bring us back to where we started from. If he agrees with us so far, the latter part of his amendment will read :

" But in such cases monthly wages shall be calculated at the rate of monthly salary which he was drawing on the day of the accident."

Now, Sir, if the thing was as simple as all that, there would be no need for this clause at all. Why should not we calculate every one's wages at the rate of the monthly salary he was drawing on the day of the accident? The real fact is that there are a great many difficulties in calculating salaries. Some men are paid daily, some weekly, some fortnightly. They get bonuses, they get their food, they get other concessions. All these things have to be taken into account. I hope, Sir, that I have demonstrated that if there is any difficulty in the clause, this amendment will not remove it.

But I do not think that I ought to sit down till I have answered the difficulty raised by the Honourable Member at the end, when he said that a man who had been away for six months on leave without pay or under suspension would be compensated at only half the scale he ought to get. That, Sir, is not the case. If the House will look at the Explanation, they will see that " a period of service shall be deemed to be continuous which has not been interrupted by a period of absence from work exceeding 14 days." The effect of that in this case is that it is only the last continuous period of service that the workman has rendered that counts. In other words, the workman instanced by the Honourable Member would have his wages calculated under sub-clause (b) and not under sub-clause (a) at all, and this sub-clause, although it does, I admit, look extremely intricate, is a very simple one. You divide the remuneration he has got during the period by the number of days during which he has worked. That gives you the average daily wage that he has received during his period of work. You then multiply—I am inverting the order to make it simpler,—you then multiply by 30, which gives you the average monthly wage.

I ask the House to reject the amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 5 was added to the Bill.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 6 stand part of the Bill.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Sir, while on this clause, I should like to get some information from the Honourable Mover of this Bill. Only a short time ago he referred to this clause as covering the cases of workmen who will be cheated into accepting small monthly instalments by dishonest employers. Sir, clause 6, sub-clauses (1) and (2) provide for the review of half-monthly payments payable for compensation. Clause 6 (1) makes it very clear that this review can be obtained if the workman can show a change in his condition. " Condition " means condition of health, because there is a reference to the certificate from the medical practitioner. If the review could be obtained only for the reason of a change in the condition of the workman, I do not believe this section will cover the case of a man who is cheated into receiving small payments by agreements. In the same way, the word " review " is found in sub-clause (2) of this clause. I think the word " review " here also means the same thing as in sub-clause (1) of clause 6. Therefore, a review can be obtained only if the workman can show a change in his condition either by a certificate or without a certificate. But I do not think this clause gives the right to a workman to ask for a review if he is cheated by a dishonest employer.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I will have the point raised by Mr. Joshi examined by the Department. I understand that what I said before was correct, but I will have the point re-examined, and if necessary, will consider it further with reference to action elsewhere.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 6 stand part of the Bill.
The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 7 stand part of the Bill.
The motion was adopted.

Sir Montagu Webb: Sir, I beg to move that:

"To clause 8 (4) add the following:

'The Commissioner shall on application by the employer submit a statement showing in detail all disbursements made'."

The amendment is self-explanatory. If an accident has taken place and the employer has paid the necessary compensation to the Commissioner, and the Commissioner has distributed the same to the dependants of the deceased, it is not unreasonable that the Commissioner should on application supply to the employer a statement showing how the money has been disbursed. With these words, Sir, I move the amendment.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I do not know if the Honourable Member would substitute any other word for the word "submit". Already there is a fear in the minds of the people in this country that this Commissioner who is going to be appointed under the Act will be at the beck and call of the employers. If the Legislature says that the Commissioner shall, on application by the employer, submit a statement showing in detail all disbursements made, we make him a submissive individual to the employer and he will be quite useless to the employee (servants). I hope Sir Montagu Webb was not led away by his inner consciousness or prevision in using that word "submit". I hope that that is not going to be the result of this Act.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Of course, it seems perfectly reasonable that an employer who pays compensation to the Commissioner should be allowed to know how that compensation has been distributed. At the same time, I wish to point out that if the employer has paid compensation and if there are dependants, the employer in no circumstances will get back any part of that compensation. He only gets back the compensation if the Commissioner on enquiry finds that there are no dependants. In that case, he gets back all except, say, Rs. 50 for funeral expenses. Therefore from that point of view, it does not matter very much to the employer how the compensation is distributed. My fear is that if we impose upon the Commissioner the burden of submitting—to use the word objected to by Mr. Rangachariar—this statement, we may impose rather a lot of unnecessary work upon him. At the same time, if an employer does want a statement of this kind, it seems only reasonable that he should have it, and I am quite prepared to leave the amendment to the judgment of the House.

Sir Montagu Webb: May I say I am quite prepared to accept the word 'furnish' for "submit".

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"To substitute the word 'furnish' for the word 'submit' in the original amendment."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"To clause 8 (4) add the following:

"The Commissioner shall on application by the employer furnish a statement showing in detail all disbursements made."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: My amendment is:

"In clause 8 omit sub-clause (7)."

I shall very briefly explain the circumstances under which the case contemplated by this sub-clause will arise. Let us take an adult workman. He meets with an accident, a very serious accident causing permanent total disability. The minimum compensation for such an accident is Rs. 316. The employer is willing to give that compensation and that amount is deposited with the Commissioner. Then the Commissioner finds that the man is in the hospital and he has got very severe injuries. The Commissioner may think that the man may die within six months. If the man had died instantaneously he would have got only Rs. 240. So, the Commissioner may think that if the man had died he was entitled to only Rs. 240 and he ought not to get the benefit of the remaining Rs. 96. Therefore this sub-clause gives a discretion to the Commissioner to withhold this sum of Rs. 96 or any part of the total compensation. I am against this sub-clause altogether, because, in the first place, when we settle the compensation for total permanent disability we do not provide for the life of the man which is really necessary. If a man is totally disabled in an industrial undertaking, it is but reasonable that he should be maintained by the industry till the end of his life. Instead of that, he is given only 42 months' wages. Suppose that this man who is totally disabled lives for more than seven years. Who is going to maintain him? The industry does not take the responsibility. But as soon as the Compensation Commissioner finds that the man is likely to die early he wants to take advantage of the possibility of his early death. Sir, I think this proposal is, for this reason, very mean, because, in the first place, if you provide for the end of his life, then certainly I can understand your saying that if he does not live we should get back the money. But if he lives longer, you say, "Go on the streets," but if there is a possibility of his dying earlier, you say, "Give us the benefit." Moreover, it is not only mean. In some cases this proposal is likely to be very inhuman. A man who suffers from an injury causing permanent disablement requires money for his treatment. If he gets money he can go to a doctor but when the Commissioner finds that the man is likely to die he says: "No. You are likely to die. I shall not give you the whole amount. If you want treatment, I do not think with this treatment you will get better. Therefore I would not give you the money. I will keep the money and see whether you die or not." Sir, this is very inhuman and from my point of view the Government by putting in this clause puts the Workmen's Compensation Commissioner in a very wrong position altogether. What will be the position if a certificate is brought from the doctor that the workman died for want of treatment for which he could not afford the money. The Workmen's Compensation Commissioner will say that he thought the man would not die but the doctor will say that the man died because he did not get the money. I therefore hope that the Government will see the wisdom of accepting my amendment.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I wish to explain what the position of the Government is in regard to this amendment. I am quite free to admit that the clause in its original form was put in by myself and my friend on my right. We were not advised to put it in by the July Committee. The reason of course is that Mr. Clow and myself come from the north of the Tweed and there is not much sentiment in our composition. We rather pride ourselves on trying to be logical. Now, when we were considering this Bill, the drafting of it, we were rather impressed by the difficulty arising out of the discrepancy between the lump sum payment due in the case of the death of a minor and the lump sum payment due in the case of a permanent disablement of the minor. I take that extreme case. If the minor gets killed, the compensation due is Rs. 200. If a minor is permanently disabled the compensation may be as much as Rs. 3,500. Now, Sir, the House will see that this discrepancy is a very serious thing for an employer. It is a difference between Rs. 200 and Rs. 3,500, and therefore we gave the Commissioner discretion. If a minor was very seriously disabled we gave the Commissioner discretion to hold over the payment of the lump sum up to six months in order that he might see what was going to happen. That seemed only fair to the employer. But in the course of the Joint Committee I must confess that I personally was impressed by one argument which Mr. Joshi brought forward. He pointed out that this difficulty which I have just brought to the notice of the House is incidental to the system of lump sum payments, and definitely we have elected for lump sum payments on account of the conditions in this country. This difficulty is incidental to that system and he put it to us that we could not have it both ways. If you accept the lump sum payment system, you have got to accept the disabilities of that system. I have been personally myself impressed by that argument and as far as the Government are concerned we are quite prepared to leave this point which Mr. Joshi has raised to the judgment of the House. I have tried to explain why we put the clause in and after hearing Mr. Joshi's main argument against the clause I am willing to leave it to the judgment of this House to decide whether the clause be omitted or retained in the Bill.

Mr. President: The question is that sub-clause (7) of clause 8 be omitted.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 8, as amended, do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clauses 9 and 10 do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Tuesday, the 6th February, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Tuesday, 6th February, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

WIRELESS INSTALLATION IN INDIA.

332. Sir Montagu de P. Webb: (a) Have Government received from the Associated Chambers of Commerce of India and Ceylon a representation urging the immediate provision through the agency of private enterprise if State funds be unavailable, of a Wireless Installation in India capable of transmitting messages at high speed and of communicating direct with any part of the world?

(b) If so, will Government be pleased to say what steps have been taken to meet this demand and forestall the possible foreign competition of similar world-wireless installations in Pondicherry and Java?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: (a) and (b) Government received on January 29th the representation referred to, but are not yet in a position to make any announcement as to the extent to which they are prepared to meet the specific demand which it contains.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE INDIAN CIVIL SERVICE.

333. Mr. B. N. Misra: (1) Will the Government be pleased to state whether Britain or India is going to meet the costs of the Royal Commission appointed to enquire into the grievances of the Indian Civil Service?

(2) Will there be any Indians in the said Commission?

(3) If so, what is the proportion of the Indians to Englishmen in the said Commission?

(4) Will there be any members of the Indian Legislature on the said Commission?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: Government have as yet no information.

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

OFFICIAL REPORTS.

149. Mr. Mahomed Hajeebhoy: Will Government be pleased to state the reasons for the increasing delay in publishing official reports such as the Annual Review of the trade of India?

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: The Government do not know what foundation the Honourable Member has for his general statement that there is increasing delay in the issue of official reports. As regards the Annual Review of the Trade of India, I understand that the proof of this is now ready. The delay in the issue of the Report was due to pressure of work arising out of the necessity of examining whether and in what directions the activity of the Commercial Intelligence Department could be curtailed, this pressure coinciding with a reduction in the number of officers.

TRANSFER OF ADEN.

150. Mr. Mahomed Hajeeshoy: (a) Will Government be pleased to state whether the proposed transfer of Aden is still under consideration; and,

(b) If the answer to the above question should be negative, to lay the papers relating to that proposal on the table?

Mr. Denys Bray: (a) Yes.

(b) Does not arise.

INTRODUCTION OF TARIFF VALUATIONS.

151. Mr. Mahomed Hajeeshoy: Will Government be pleased to state what, if any, protests have been received against the new tariff valuations introduced with effect from January 1st, 1923, into the Import Tariff Schedule 2, and what action, if any, has been taken in regard to such protests?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The tariff valuations are revised every year after taking into consideration the prices prevailing during the preceding year, and after consulting the principal Chambers of Commerce. The only protest so far received against the tariff valuations introduced with effect from January last is in regard to paper and the representation on the subject is under consideration.

REPORT OF CHIEF INSPECTOR OF MINES.

152. Mr. Mahomed Hajeeshoy: (a) Will Government be pleased to state what, if any, actions have been taken on the latest report of the Chief Inspector of Mines in India? and

(b) Whether further action is contemplated to minimise the possibility of fatal accidents in mines?

Mr. A. H. Ley: Government is considering in consultation with the Chief Inspector of Mines the action to be taken on his latest report with the object of framing rules to adopt the existing rules to modern mining practice, and of factories such steps as are possible to minimise the danger of fatal accidents.

TOMBS AND MOSQUES IN DELHI.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras; Nominated Non-Official): Sir, may I ask the Honourable the Home Member whether his attention has been drawn to an article in the 'Muslim' dated the 4th February 1923 in which allegations are made against the demolition of tombs and mosques in Delhi, and whether the Home Member is prepared to make a statement in regard to that matter?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): I have obtained a copy of the 'Muslim' dated the 4th February 1923 and read it. The article in question refers to a large number of buildings, some 14 in all, but in no case is it alleged that a mosque has been demolished by Government. In reading the list of buildings, with its reference to mosques lying in ruins, etc., a somewhat mistaken impression might be gained; for very many of these buildings are old ruins which have been abandoned for a very considerable time, the remains of former suburbs and villages, and have suffered from natural decay.

Though it is not stated that any mosque has been demolished, it is stated that some are in danger of destruction. As far as any action of Government is concerned, however, this is not the case. I may note that in one case in particular the mosque at Kalali Bagh, considerable local feeling was created by the fact that a mark, supposed to be a demolition mark, was placed on the compound wall of the mosque. This, however, was not a demolition but a survey mark, and the road which would otherwise have cut off part of the mosque compound was actually diverted.

I am fully satisfied, from my personal knowledge of the facts, that the Chief Commissioner is showing scrupulous care to see that nothing is done to injure any building which can be recognized as religious, and he is fully alive to the necessity of taking local opinion with him in regard to the treatment not only of mosques actually in use in the large area occupied by new Delhi, but of the numerous ruins in this area. I have seen letters on the subject addressed to the Juma Masjid and Fatehpuri Masjid Committees, and those who are acquainted with Raisina will realize that so far from attempting to destroy religious buildings wholesale, we have spent considerable sums of money in conserving them and their surroundings. The Muslim public may, I think, be assured that the local authority is doing its best to prevent any kind of incident likely to cause offence to genuine religious feeling regarding buildings in the New Delhi area.

THE WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION BILL.

Mr. President: The House will now resume consideration of the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill to define the liability of employers in certain cases of suits for damages brought against them by workmen, and to provide for the payment by certain classes of employers to their workmen of compensation for injury by accident.

Clause 11, Captain Sassoon.

Captain E. V. Sassoon (Bombay Millowners' Association: Indian Commerce): Sir, whatever views Honourable Members may have about the clauses of this Bill, I feel sure that there will be no disagreement in desiring to minimise fraudulent claims and malingering, and I believe the vast majority, including Mr. Joshi, would also like to see the principle of free medical treatment now supplied by individual firms extended. I am therefore optimistic of getting the support of this House on the amendment to sub-clause (1) of clause 11, which stands in my name:

"That in clause 11 in sub-clause (1) for the words "he shall if the employer within three days offers to have him examined free of charge by a qualified medical practitioner" the following be substituted, namely:—

"he shall remain in the vicinity of his place of employment for not less than three working days from the date on which service of the notice has been effected on the employer and during such period he shall hold himself available for medical examination and if the employer offers such medical examination by a qualified medical practitioner free of charge within such period he shall."

[Captain E. V. Sassoon.]

The purpose of this amendment is to require the workman to stay in the vicinity of his work, that is to say where he may happen to be living during the course of his employment or near by, and that he should give every facility to the employer to have him medically examined, so that not only may the degree of his injury be ascertained, but that he may also have the opportunity of availing himself of any free medical treatment that the employer may offer him. I need hardly tell the House that timely medical treatment would often ward off serious complications which would have ensued had the injuries been neglected. This amendment will therefore benefit the workman. It will also be fair to the employer who, no one can deny, should have the right of establishing the extent of the injury for which he will have to pay compensation. It may be thought that the period of three working days after notice has been effected is rather long, and that when two holidays intervene, this would mean five days in all. As far as large towns like Bombay are concerned, this maximum would never be reached, but we must consider places where the workman is sent out by his employer to carry out some work on a day before a holiday. He has an accident, sends his notice into the office, two days may elapse before the employer is aware of the accident. The district doctor may be away or he may be ill, and it may be a couple of days more before a suitable doctor can be brought to the spot. But whatever period we allow, we always have one big safeguard. And that is that it is to the interest of the employer to have the man attended to as soon as possible. The sooner he is examined, and if possible treated, the more chances there are of his speedy recovery and the less of dangerous complications, and it must not be lost sight of that the worse the man gets the larger may be the compensation the employer would be liable to pay. Now, let us take the position of the workman. It is true that he must not go away for these few days. But he is in his temporary home or with friends near by; generally he has a relative with him and certainly friends and fellow-workmen near; and he is quite free to make his own arrangements and, should he desire, to call any of the efficient, if unqualified, medical attendants of whom this House has heard so much. Now, if the employer fails to take advantage of this right of examination he leaves himself open to some very large risks. To begin with, there is always the risk of the man who receives a minor injury such as a cut or a gash and not looking after it and developing blood poison or even gangrene and the employer may become responsible for paying compensation for the loss of limb or even death. Then, again, the man may go up-country and he may be persuaded that the loss of a finger or even an arm would mean a large lump sum which would be very useful to pay off the demands of an insistent money-lender. It might be pointed out to him that this would not make much difference to him because he could remain behind and work on the land and another member of the family could go into the factory. I hope, therefore, Sir, that the House would appreciate the fairness of the amendment and that the Government will be prepared to accept it.

Mr. N. M. Joshi (Nominated: Labour Interests): Sir, I rise to oppose this amendment. Captain Sassoon said that this amendment is fair both to the employers and to the employees. My view is quite otherwise. I consider this amendment as being quite iniquitous to the employees. What does it do? It compels the workman to live in the vicinity of the place of employment, but it does not compel the employer to give him medical treatment. Captain Sassoon said that I should be in favour of the extension of medical relief. I am in favour of extension of medical relief. But I do not see here in the amendment any proposal for the extension of medical relief. If Captain Sassoon had provided that the man shall remain there and the employer shall give medical treatment, there would have been some fairplay. As the amendment stands there is hardly any fairplay here. All the advantages are on one side and the disadvantages on the other. Sir, there will be great difficulty for the working class people who may suffer from accidents, if this proposal is accepted. In the first place, take the case of a man who receives not a small injury, but a very large injury. He loses his two hands or loses one of his feet or legs. There is no hospital near the factory. What is the man to do? He must stay near the factory; he cannot take advantage of the hospital. Is it really right that the man should be compelled to stay near the factory although there may not be sufficient hospital accommodation near about the factory? My friend will say he has given some power to the Commissioner to make exceptions. I do not know whether he has given it or not. But he may say that he has given the power to the Commissioner to overlook such lapses. But is it right, in the first place, to deprive the workman of his natural right to go to any place he likes after such a severe accident and take whatever treatment he likes? Is it right to take away that right and to compel him to stay at a place where he may not get assistance, where he may not have his relatives near by where he may not get any nursing, where even he may not get any food? Take the case of a man, a miner as my Honourable friend Mr. Sircar would have it, who goes to the mine after walking 8 or 10 miles every day. That man has not got any arrangement for food near about his place of employment. There is no lodging compulsory upon the employer, there is no provision of food compulsory upon the employer. If that is not compulsory upon the employer, what right have you to compel the workman to stay near his place of employment? Sir, if my Honourable friend had made compulsory provision for residence, compulsory provision for nursing, compulsory provision for food, compulsory provision for hospital, I could have understood his proposal being a fair one. But as the proposal stands, it gives unfair advantage to the employer and places the workman at a great disadvantage. I hope the House will throw out his amendment.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I am in the singularly happy position of concurring with my Honourable friend Mr. Joshi in this amendment. Captain Sassoon has not realised what the exact meaning of the phrase 'vicinity of his employment' would be in different cases. My friend, Mr. Joshi, has pointed out a few cases. I will add one more. Take railway accidents. Supposing an employee of a railway, a gangman working on the line, suffers an accident. That place of accident is midway between two stations. Captain Sassoon desires that the man should be in the vicinity of his employment. The workman lives away from the railway line, say 5 or 6 miles away, where he has got his friends and relations. Now, in the vicinity of the employment, that is to say on the main line between two stations, there is neither shelter, nor a friend, nor a relation, nor a hospital. How is that workman to remain in the vicinity of his employment? He will either die there for want of shelter or for want of food. What Captain Sassoon means is this. The man living in his bustee, in his residence, should not leave that bustee or the place of residence and should not bolt away. That is perfectly logical. But as the amendment is drafted, the phrase 'vicinity of employment' places a handicap on the workman without giving any facility whatsoever in the different sorts of cases to the employer to treat the man. I am not, therefore, in favour of Captain Sassoon's amendment as drafted by him.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member): Sir, I should like to explain the position that Government propose to take up in regard to this amendment. The position, as the Bill before the House presents it, is as follows. Clause 10 prescribes that notice of the accident must be given as soon as practicable after the happening thereof and before the workman has voluntarily left the employment in which he was injured. This notice may be delivered by registered post or by hand. Clause 11 then proceeds to say that:

"where a workman has given notice of an accident, he shall, if the employer within three days offers to have him examined free of charge by a qualified medical practitioner, submit himself for such examination."

And if he refuses so to submit himself his right to compensation is suspended until he does so submit himself. These provisions, as we have got them now, follow almost exactly the English law. But in the Joint Committee I felt that we had not got the matter quite right, and, though I did not record any note to that effect, I told the Joint Committee that I would have the matter re-examined and, if necessary, would reserve the right to move an amendment in this House.

My difficulties are two. In the first place, in clause 11 we have left it obscure where the medical examination is to be held, and, in the second place, clause 11 leaves it obscure from what date the period of three days specified in that clause is to begin. It was, I think, clearly the intention of the Joint Committee that the workman should not go off to his village which might be a very long way away before submitting himself to examination. I do not think the clause as now drafted brings that fact out clearly enough. That is the reason why I have given notice of certain amendments. I wish to make it quite clear that ordinarily the workman must remain in the vicinity of his employment for a period of three working days after notice of the accident has been received, in order that the employer may have a fair chance of exercising his right to offer the workman free medical attendance; and my amendment suggests that if the workman voluntarily leaves the vicinity before the period specified his right to compensation shall be suspended until he returns and offers himself for this examination. Captain Sassoon's amendment goes further. He proposes that the workman must remain in the vicinity of his employment for at least three days in order that the employer may offer him free medical attendance; and he suggests that if the workman does not remain for those three days all right to compensation shall disappear. That is to say, he proposes a more drastic remedy. Now the point seems to me rather evenly balanced. On the one hand, it seems to me essential that we must let the employer be in a position of satisfying himself that any workman who has been injured by accident in his employment has really been injured. It seems to me essential that the employer should have confidence in the legislation we propose to introduce. I do not think there is anything in the point which has been raised by Mr. Kamat about vicinity. Vicinity is obviously a comparative term, and I have not the least doubt that the Commissioner will put a reasonable interpretation upon that term. Nor do I think that there is anything in Mr. Joshi's point, that this is unfair to the workman. After all, in this Bill we are doing a great deal for the workman. We are giving him this right to compensation, liberal compensation; we are not imposing upon him at all the burden of proving negligence. Surely in his turn the workman must do something for the employer; and looking at the matter as a whole, I personally think it is reasonable that the workman should be required to stay in the vicinity of his employment in order that the employer may offer him free medical attendance.

I am aware that the English law is different in this matter; but we have in this matter to take into account the different conditions in England and in India. In England you have innumerable medical practitioners. You have innumerable towns; and it is perfectly easy, even if a man does go away from his place of employment, it is perfectly easy for an employer to satisfy himself that he has been examined by a qualified medical practitioner in a neighbouring town. But in India, where we have these enormous distances and where duly qualified medical practitioners are not so numerous, the conditions are different. Take the case of Burma. As everybody knows, Indian labour is very largely employed in Burma. A man gets injured in Burma. Are we to allow to go racing off to say Madras, and are we to suppose that the employer would be content if he gets some sort of certificate from a village in Madras to say that this man has been injured? Surely that employer has a right to say "I want the man examined by my own duly qualified medical practitioner; and if I cannot exercise that right I shall have no confidence that I am fairly called upon to pay compensation." That is why I have put in my amendment. I think it is a reasonable amendment. Whether we should go further and put the severer penalty proposed by Captain Sassoon seems to me a delicate question. As far as the Government are concerned, I am perfectly prepared to leave it to the judgment of the House. I myself and the Government Members, the Members on the Government Bench, will remain neutral in the matter and as far as we are concerned, we shall leave it to the House to decide the point.

Mr. N. M. Samarth (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, the Honourable Mr. Innes has exploded the fallacies which Mr. Joshi and Mr. Kamat started. The point in clause 11, sub-clause (2), is that if a workman, on being required to do so by the employer under sub-section (1) or by the Commissioner at any time, refuses to submit himself for examination by a qualified medical practitioner, or in any way obstructs the same, his right to compensation and to take or prosecute any proceeding relating to compensation shall be suspended; and in order that the workman may not be mulcted in the way in which the Bill proposes to do, and to remove the defects of drafting which clause (1) contains at present, Captain Sassoon has put forward this amendment. The objections to the amendment disappear when you have in view the proviso which he proposes in another amendment to sub-clause (2), which says:

"Provided further that the Commissioner may for sufficient cause admit a claim for compensation notwithstanding the failure of the workman to remain in the vicinity as required by sub-section (1)."

Captain Sassoon takes into consideration the fact that it may be that there may be sufficient cause for the workman to be removed from the place far away so that he may not be available in the vicinity. Well, he must be in the vicinity in the first place, in order that the employer may have a fair chance of seeing what the nature of his injury is and of giving him such medical assistance as may be needed in order that the original injury may not develop into anything serious if neglected.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: There is no question of medical assistance here.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: Yes, given free of charge.

Mr. President: Order, order.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: What is the meaning of his remaining in the vicinity? In order that he may be examined by a qualified medical practitioner and apparently in order that he may be treated. It is surely in the interests of the employer that the injury should be cared for by a qualified medical practitioner, for if it were neglected he would have to pay heavier compensation than he would otherwise have to do. Therefore I say it is in the interests of the employer to see that everything that is needed is done for the injured workman. All the objections as to the necessity of his removal to a distant place or to a hospital, are taken away by the proviso which Captain Sassoon proposes, namely, that if the Commissioner finds that there was sufficient cause for the workman not to remain in the vicinity, then, in spite of the fact that he was not in the vicinity, he will get the compensation which the Commissioner thinks proper in the circumstances of the case. I think, therefore, there is a great deal in Captain Sassoon's amendment which deserves support and I trust the House will accept it.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, the House knows very well that Mr. Joshi is a very practical man, and as a practical man he always advances arguments which, however much we may differ from him, appeal to reason. Only in this instance I was rather surprised to find Mr. Joshi resorting rather to heat, to passion—which is not his weakness at any rate—than to argument, in trying to oppose the amendment put forward by my Honourable friend, Captain Sassoon.

Of course Mr. Joshi has his own views and he is entirely welcome to them, one thing can be said about him, it is this that he always says what he thinks is right. But I think if Mr. Joshi will go a little deeply into himself he will find that it is rather a suspicion. (Mr. N. M. Joshi: "Quite natural.") It may be natural I do not know—but it is rather a suspicion of the source from which the amendment comes that is responsible for his opposition. I want Mr. Joshi to come down to the plane of practical politics and remove his prejudice for the time being and not consider the source from which the amendment is coming but to discuss it on its own merits; I want him then to say whether he honestly believes that there is anything in the amendment which is likely to prove detrimental to the interests of the working classes, or on the other hand there is not anything in the amendment which, if carried, is likely to prove of immense advantage to the working man. I want to ask a few questions of Mr. Joshi. I must say at once that I hope Mr. Joshi will not suspect me, as I am afraid he suspects others. (Mr. N. M. Joshi: "I am not quite sure.") I want to ask him a few questions. Let us come down to the plane of practical politics. Take the case of Bombay itself where you find more instances of people being in factory life than elsewhere perhaps. Take a case where a man in a mill meets with a serious accident. Suppose this clause as proposed by Captain Sassoon is not provided; what would be the result?

You have to consider it from that point of view. Mr. Joshi knows as well as I do that there is unfortunately a kind of superstition prevailing among these men that as soon as an accident takes place, which may not be at all of a fatal or even of a serious character, the workman begins to feel that he is going to die or that he is going to be permanently disabled, and the one thing that he wants and says is "Let me go away from here to my people, to my village and die there." That is a very admirable feeling, I admit; but I do not think it ought to be encouraged. (An Honourable Member: "Why not?") Because by encouraging that feeling you are hastening the death of that man, which probably would never have occurred otherwise if you had made it possible for ordinary medical assistance to reach him in time. (Cries of "No, no" and interruption). I hope I shall not be interrupted like this; I think it is a practice which ought to be condemned that Members should interrupt another Member when he is speaking, especially when the interruptions are not relevant—I am sorry to digress, Sir—but there is too much interruption, I think. How far are these villages from Bombay? These Bombay workmen come from Konkan or the Ratnagiri district; it takes two or three days to go from Bombay to any places in Ratnagiri district; you know that the journey is not a very pleasant one; you have got to go in a steamer where comforts are very few as Mr. Joshi very well knows. Now, if you encourage that superstition in the man and if he goes away refusing medical aid, being certain that he will get compensation or that his family will get compensation, he goes as it were to die in the midst of the members of his family in a far-off village, the journey to which is very difficult and is sure at any rate either to make his injury more serious or even to make it prove fatal. Now, I think that this amendment proposed by Captain Sassoon aims at protecting the workman against himself; and in India you cannot help it. The one thing that you have got to do is to protect these ignorant workmen against themselves. What does this amendment want? That the man will live in the vicinity of the place of his work. Now, is there anything unreasonable in that? Take the example of a man working in a Bombay factory; he is working for instance in one of the Parel mills; he is not forced to live in the mill itself; he is asked to go and live in a chawl, and I am sure Mr. Joshi will agree with me that if he lives in a chawl for three days, he will have a better chance, a much better chance, a surer chance of being looked after well than if he went to the village where he would be neglected altogether. But Mr. Joshi's argument is this: "I have no objection to this amendment if you make it compulsory on the employer to offer medical assistance to the workman." I take it that I am right in thus interpreting Mr. Joshi's argument. Now, I know that the clause does not make it compulsory on the employer, nor does the Bill do it; even if this amendment is not carried it would not make it compulsory on the employer to give free medical assistance to the man. But what does it amount to in practice? As a matter of fact Mr. Joshi very well knows—I need not tell him here—but I may inform the other Members that in Bombay there is not a single large group of mill agents which does not provide for free medical examination for their workmen.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: But you are taking only the Bombay example.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I am speaking from the practical standpoint; I am speaking of what is done by large employers of labour and if you are not going to act in accordance with that from the point of view of the men who are employed largely in large factories, well, I do not know what this House is going to be guided by. Therefore as I say in Bombay you have the example of the workmen being given free medical assistance, day in and day out, by mill agents. As soon as a man meets with an accident he gives three days' notice—that is provided for in the Bill itself. Here Captain Sassoon rightly suggests three working days; as a matter of fact my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, proposes to move an amendment* on the point; that is reasonable, otherwise the notice will not reach the employer at all. Now what happens in these three days? If the employer offers medical assistance—at all events he is bound to offer and speaking about Bombay I know that he is bound to offer medical assistance to the man—if he offers that the man should be medically examined the man should not refuse it. Now, do you want him to refuse it? There again a prejudice obtains among these ignorant workmen that the moment they feel that they have met with a serious accident they do not want to be examined by any medical officer; they want to be examined for instance by some quack, or they want to resort to all kinds of superstitious methods of curing themselves. Now, I think that if we acquiesce in encouraging this kind of practice we are doing, in the name of service to the labouring classes, serious injury to the cause of labour itself, serious injury to the cause of humanity itself. Let us not carry our ideals too far so as to narrow our vision and to blind ourselves to all the good that could come out of a reasonable arrangement like this. Again, is not the employer doing only a reasonable thing in saying that if he has to pay compensation to the workman for the injuries that he suffers from, at least he has a right to be told three working days before the man leaves the place that he has met with a serious accident, that the employer must also have a chance of giving him free medical examination so that the patient may have a chance of being cured by the treatment of an efficient medical practitioner? Now, I say that it would amount to the employer giving free medical assistance to the workman. Would it be anything else than that? Is it not in the interests of the employer to see that the workman is neither totally disabled nor that he meets with death? It is in the interests of the employer to see that the workman is cured as soon as possible so that he may be saved the burden of giving compensation either to the workman if he is totally disabled or to his family if the man happens to die. So, looking at it from the practical point of view, it seems to me that it is an equitable arrangement, it is a fair arrangement; it is in the interests of the employer by all means, but I say it is more in the interests of the workman himself that he should be offered an opportunity of being treated by a qualified medical practitioner. I therefore think that the House would do well in not taking a prejudiced view on this question and to support the amendment, for it really aims at bringing about better results than the clause in the original Bill itself.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally (Sind: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, it seems to me that the objection on the part of my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi, is more on account of the clause as suggested by my Honourable friend, Captain Sassoon, there being no provision in it to compel the employer to offer free medical treatment to his employee and I understood Mr. Joshi to say that if there was any clause of that kind to compel the employer to offer medical treatment free of charge to the employee he would have no objection to the clause as proposed. If that be his objection, and if I understood him aright, I would suggest to the Honourable Mover of this amendment as well as to Government the addition of the words 'and treatment' after the word 'examination' in the first instance, and also after the word 'examination' in the second instance; that is to say; the employer would offer medical examination and treatment to the employee, free of charge.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Free board and lodging.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: I do not know, Sir, whether it is at all necessary to give free board and lodging; because ordinarily he will have his own lodging and board also. It is only in exceptional cases and where the workman meets with an accident at a place which is far distant from his own place, free board and lodging will be necessary. But in such cases, as the Honourable Mr. Innes pointed out, the word 'vicinity' is too flexible a term, and it will be interpreted by the Commissioner as well as by the employer more liberally than what Mr. Joshi thinks it is liable to, and I believe that if the two words that I suggest are added, all reasonable objections will be met. Therefore, I commend the addition of these two words to the Honourable Captain Sassoon as well as to Government.

Mr. President: Has the Honourable Member moved that amendment?

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Yes, Sir.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"After the word 'examination' where it first occurs in the amendment standing in the name of Captain Sassoon, to add the words 'and treatment,' and similarly in the following line after the word 'examination,' to add the words 'and treatment'."

Captain E. V. Sassoon: Sir, as far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the doctor who examines the injured workman giving him treatment also. I take it that Mr. Joshi does not necessarily insist that the treatment should last as long as the workman might want it, but would give more or less first aid treatment which would be to the greatest advantage of the workman as well as the employer. I should like, however, to point out to Mr. Joshi that there has been a great deal of opposition from workmen against forcing any treatment on them if they did not want it. They may prefer to have one of their own doctors to look after them, and that is the reason why I only suggested in my amendment that the examination should be compulsory, and only the examination. If Mr. Joshi wants the treatment also to be compulsory, I am prepared to accept it.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju (Ganjam cum Vizagapatam: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, a greater responsibility is thrown on the Members of this House by their not knowing whether Government would support or oppose this amendment. In such matters, Government should make up its mind either to support or oppose it, but unfortunately they have not made up their minds. In this case, Sir, Mr. Joshi rightly asked 'what about the provision for free board and lodging of the injured workman' if he stops in the vicinity, which was suggested by Captain Sassoon. I may mention, Sir, that in the Perambore Mills, the Act applies not to Bombay alone—about three-fourths of the labourers live 5, 6 and even 10 miles away from the place of employment. Does Captain Sassoon want that these people should live near Perambore Mills where they work? I may also state that a necessary anxiety is shown by some of my Bombay friends that some men may court death in order to secure compensation for their dependants, which, to my mind, is against human nature. (A Voice: 'No.') I may point out that, if Honourable Members will refer to clause 4 in the section itself, they will find that there it is clearly provided that the workman is bound, if the employer offers him medical treatment, to accept such treatment, otherwise his compensation would be reduced. Therefore, there is no difficulty about attendance because it is provided in clause 4 of this very Act. In England, Sir, excepting giving notice of injury, even medical examination is not at all necessary. They say: "The want of notice in the case of death is no bar to the maintenance of action if the Judge is of opinion that there was reasonable excuse for such want of notice". Sir, the object of introducing the amendment, without any provision being made for board and lodging, or even to compel the employer to provide medical treatment, is, that the injured man must stop for three working days near the place of employment, and then he will have the right to claim compensation, otherwise he would forego that right to claim compensation. Then about the examination, the injured man is bound to be examined and he is prepared to be examined, and lastly he is entitled to be treated and he is prepared to be treated, and he cannot avoid being treated by some one engaged by the employer. Supposing there is no house or accommodation available, he lives in the place in which he usually lives. What is the objection? If the employer is so anxious to avoid heavy compensation, he should depute a medical officer to look after the injured person and treat him properly at his residence, because if the injured person avoids medical treatment, he will suffer the consequences. When such is the case, I do not see without sufficient safeguards as suggested by Mr. Joshi and Mr. Kamat, how Captain Sassoon's proposition can be accepted, unless Government will accept the responsibility themselves.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I am afraid, Sir, I must oppose the amendment suggested by Mr. Wali Mahommmed Hussanally without any notice at all, and I am very reluctant to introduce into this Bill words and phrases, the effect of which I am not certain. Also I do not myself think that the actual insertion of the words is necessary. I am perfectly satisfied in my own mind that if any doctor, and I am sure Colonel Gidney will support me

Mr. President to Mr. N. M. Joshi: I must ask the Honourable Members from Bombay to desist from their conversation.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I am sure that Colonel Gidney will support me in this that if any qualified medical practitioner examines an injured workman, he will give him first-aid treatment without being required to do so by any law. I would also point out that clause 4 of the Bill actually presupposes that such treatment will be given. On the whole, I do not think it safe to accept this amendment as I am not fully certain what the effect of the insertion of the suggested words will be. Therefore, I am afraid I must object the proposal to insert the words ' and treatment '.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, this question gave considerable difficulty to us in the Joint Committee, and we thought that it is not easy to provide for all cases which are likely to come up. Mr. Jamnadas has been speaking of Bombay city conditions. My friend Mr. Venkatapatiraju spoke of Madras conditions. But let us remember that this Act applies not only to big concerns but also to small concerns, to factories within the meaning of the Factories Act. I think it is to these cases we have to look. Many of them would not have qualified medical practitioners in their factories, many of the employers running these factories are poor themselves. They would have to search for medical practitioners in order to have the examination that will take them some little time. Therefore, we thought it best to provide for these cases by rules to be made under the proviso, as Honourable Members will see:

"Provided that a workman shall not be required to submit himself for examination by a medical practitioner otherwise than in accordance with rules made under this Act."

The rules will have to be made, having regard to local conditions and we thought that these cases could well be provided for by rules. At the same time, let us remember what is the object of this examination by the employer. The employer wants to get evidence. That is the whole object of it. His object is to get evidence beforehand, as soon as the accident occurs, so that the workman may not exaggerate the injuries, may not aggravate the injuries by bad treatment and all that. So we give an opportunity by this clause to the employer to procure early evidence and his own doctor to examine the employee. Now, if an accident occurs in a factory or in a place where a workman is employed, I think the employer is as much likely to know of it as the workman himself. Because the employer is sure to have a manager on the spot who would know about the accident and therefore, if he wants to have evidence (he is not bound to), but if he wants to arm himself with evidence he will take care to have his doctor ready to examine the man. On the other hand, let us see the point of view of the poor workman. My Honourable friend, Mr. Jammadas Dwarkadas, has spoken of the superstition—but it is not a superstition, it is a sentiment—prevailing among my countrymen. I do not think you can call it a superstition if they want to die in their own homes. I think we ought all to encourage and not discourage it. I do not see the harm, if I like to die in my own house where I was born and among my kith and kin. Why is it a superstition? I think it is a sentiment we ought to honour and respect. And, therefore, Sir, when we have regard to the main object of the provision, namely, to give an opportunity to the employer to secure evidence, I do not see why we should give more facilities than the section as it stands provides. I think Captain Sassoon has forgotten his usual generous sentiments when he came forward with this amendment. He knows he has got three days within which to do that and I am sure in cities like Bombay the rules may provide for examination on the spot and probably there so much time will not be needed. You can have it done in three hours in a city like Bombay. The man is injured and a medical man will be on the spot and probably on the premises and the whole examination could be done in three hours and I therefore submit, Sir, it is unnecessary to interfere with the section as it has been framed by the Joint Committee, which I assure you we took quite a long time in considering, and we left it to the rules to provide for cases and cases. I am rather surprised at the attitude that Mr. Innes has taken to-day in this Chamber. He, as a member of the Joint Committee, instead of pledging the Government to support the Joint Committee's amendment, says the Government are neutral in this matter. If this is the attitude of Government, we should have taken a different line altogether in the Joint Committee. I am supporting the amendment as it was framed in the Joint Committee and I know no reason why the Honourable Mr. Innes should depart from the attitude which he took up there. I oppose Captain Sassoon's amendment and support the clause as it stands.

Lieut.-Col. H. A. J. Gidney (Nominated: Anglo-Indian): Sir, in reference to what the Honourable Mr. Innes has just said, I do give him my support in its entirety. He conceded the principle, and I believe there is nothing further to say on it. As being one who took a considerable part in the deliberations of the Joint Committee when this matter was discussed, I rise to oppose Captain Sassoon's amendment. This House can readily picture a mofussil station where an employee is injured. It has say a small factory which employs a sub-assistant surgeon—a very eminent man in his own way but of mediocre talents so far as emergency surgical operations are concerned. Or it may be the first aid required from this mediocre doctor is not sufficient to render complete aid, or might be the cause of making a mild injury a very serious one. I see no reason why the patient or the employee should not have a free choice as to the medical practitioner he wants. But to insist on that injured man remaining three days in the place of his employment is, I say, a most unjustifiable restriction. I therefore oppose the amendment.

Mr. R. A. Spence (Bombay: European): I move, Sir, that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The original question was:

"That in clause 11 in sub-clause (1) for the words 'he shall if the employer within three days offers to have him examined free of charge by a qualified medical practitioner' the following be substituted, namely:

'he shall remain in the vicinity of his place of employment for not less than three working days from the date on which service of the notice has been effected on the employer and during such period he shall hold himself available for medical examination and if the employer offers such medical examination by a qualified medical practitioner free of charge within such period he shall.'"

Since which an amendment has been moved:

"After the word 'examination' insert the words 'and treatment' in both places where the word 'examination' occurs."

The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that the original amendment 12 Noon. be made.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: Sir, I beg to move:

"That in clause 11 in sub clause (1) for the words 'within three days' the following words be substituted, namely:

'before the expiry of three working days from the time at which service of the notice has been effected'."

Sir, in speaking on the last amendment I explained fully to the House the reason why I have given notice of these amendments which stand in my name to clause 11, and I do not think that there is any necessity for me to waste the time of the House by repeating what I then said. I explained that my object was to clear up a vagueness and obscurity in the section as it stands at present. Mr. Rangachariar in his speech said that the Joint Committee had discussed this question at great length and he suggested that I ought to have been content with the solution arrived at by the Joint Committee. But, as I explained in my previous speech, I never was content with the solution at which the Joint Committee had arrived and I told the Joint Committee, though I did not make any note to that effect in the Joint Committee's report that I would like to have the matter re-examined with the object of moving, if necessary, an amendment in this House.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Why do you want "working days"?

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: Mr. Rangachariar says that the proviso to sub-clause (1) of clause 11 meets the point.

That proviso says:

"Provided that a workman shall not be required to submit himself for examination by a medical practitioner otherwise than in accordance with rules made under this Act."

But I am advised that that proviso does not meet the point and that the Local Government could not provide by rules under the Act that the workman must not leave the vicinity of his employment before submitting himself to free medical examination offered to him. That is the very reason why I have put in this amendment. Mr. Rangachariar asks me why I have put in "three working days." The reason is that a notice might be delivered at a factory or a mill on a day when that mill or factory was closed, and it seems to me that if we do give a period to the employer in which he may offer free medical examination, we should make the period a proper period and that we should not include in that period days when the mill or factory is closed. I commend, Sir, my amendment to the House.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"That in clause 11 in sub-clause (1), for the words 'within three days' the following words be substituted, namely:

'before the expiry of three working days from the time at which service of the notice has been effected'."

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Sir, I wish to move a small amendment to the amendment proposed by the Honourable Mr. Innes, and that amendment is:

To omit the word "working".

I have given notice of my amendment to the Honourable Member. Sir, we have been told here that the employers are a very kind-hearted class. Sir, I wish I could believe all that about them. I want to believe that. But, Sir, if the employers are really kind-hearted, why should they not be ready to act on a notice received on a Sunday? If there is notice of an accident on a Sunday, a kind-hearted employer will surely at once move to send a doctor to the employee, and even the doctor, under the rules of his profession, will not grudge sacrificing his Sunday's rest for the sake of an injured workman. I therefore feel that there is no necessity for putting in this word "working" at all. Notice of an accident, at least of a serious accident, on a Sunday ought to be taken as effective notice to the employer. As soon as he sees that there is an accident he must take steps to send a doctor. I am not a lawyer, and not being a lawyer, I do not understand the meaning of the words "service of the notice has been effected". I therefore feel that this word "working" is not necessary at all and that therefore it should be deleted.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"To omit the word 'working' in the amendment moved by the Honourable Mr. Innes."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that the amendment, amended as follows, be made:—

"That in clause 11 in sub-clause (1) for the words 'within three days' the following words be substituted, namely:

'before the expiry of three days from the time at which service of the notice has been effected'."

The motion was adopted.

Rai Bahadur L. P. Sinha (Gaya cum Monghyr: Non-Muhammadan): I beg to move:

"In clause 11 (1) between the words 'to have him examined' and the words 'free of charge' insert the following:

'at his place of residence where he lives during his term of employment'."

I am moving this amendment only as a safeguard against the cases which may arise. Take for example a labourer gets some injury by accident arising out of his daily duties and he has given notice of that accident to his employer who according to the proposed clause will only be compelled to have the workman examined within 8 days free of charge but we don't know where the workman is expected to be examined. It may be that the doctor on receipt of information of the accident from the employer may in his turn send a notice to the workman asking him to present himself for examination at a certain place which may be far away from the workman's usual place of residence; moreover the injured man might not be in a position to attend at the doctor's place owing to his injury being of a more or less serious nature. Now the employer may in certain cases take advantage of this section not to grant him any compensation on the ground that the workman did not submit himself to medical examination which was offered to him by the employer. It is therefore only fair that medical examination should be offered to him at his usual place of residence where he generally lives and where he is employed.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I do not think that the amendment should be accepted and that for two reasons. In the first place, I do not think that we ought to tie down the medical examination to the workman's place of residence. Quite conveniently it may take place, at any rate, in the case of slightly injured persons, at hospitals or dispensaries attached to the factory. In the second place, we have got a proviso here which I think covers the point.

The motion was negatived.

Captain E. V. Sassoon: Instead of moving this amendment now, I prefer, with the leave of the House, to move the amendment as an amendment to the following amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes.

Mr. President: Does the Honourable Member mean that he wants to move the amendment after the Honourable Mr. Innes has moved the next?

Captain E. V. Sassoon: Yes, Sir.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I beg to move:

"That in clause 11 in sub clause (2) for the words 'and to take or prosecute any proceedings in relation to compensation or in the case of a workman in receipt of half-monthly payments his right to receive half-monthly payments shall be suspended until such examination has taken place' the following words be substituted, namely: 'shall be suspended during the continuance of such refusal or obstruction'."

This amendment, Sir, is not an amendment of any importance. It is a drafting amendment which has been suggested to us by the Legislative Department. It does not affect the merits of the case at all.

Captain E. V. Sassoon: I would like with the permission of the House to move an amendment to this amendment as follows:

"That after the word 'obstruction' at the end of the amendment, the following be added:

'Except in the case of the first examination after notice of accident in which case the employer shall not be liable to pay compensation to the workman in respect of the accident:

Provided that the Commissioner may for sufficient cause admit a claim for compensation notwithstanding failure to comply with the requirements of the clause."

Now, I would like to point out to the House that as the amendment now stands, should a workman not wait after having given notice and answer, the penalty will be suspended. But the clause, the words, as I mentioned in my previous motion, sustain a suit or a claim.

injury, and go away without any treatment or examination, this injury would become a more serious one meaning the loss of a limb. He would come back and under the provisions of this Bill, at any time within six months of the notice he would be allowed to make a claim. The claim for a permanent injury would be a lump sum and therefore suspension would really be no penalty at all. The workman therefore will be able to take no notice of these instructions. He can send in his notice, leave, and at any time within six months can come in and say, "I have in consequence of the cut in my arm, lost my arm, and therefore I am entitled to the full benefits under the Bill." Therefore I suggest to obviate any possible, I will not say probable, any possible fraudulent claim it would be only fair that in the event of his leaving within the three days, which are not working days now, and without having been medically examined he should not benefit under the provisions of this Bill, unless, of course, he is able to persuade the Commissioner that his reason for leaving without being examined was a sufficiently strong one to justify the Commissioner admitting his claim.

Mr. President: Is the Honourable Member's amendment the same as that of which he gave notice on the 3rd February?

Captain E. V. Sassoon: With slightly verbal alterations, to the same effect.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I think the amendment now moved by Captain Sassoon is in substance the same as amendment No. 50* and No. 53.* Those two amendments have already been fully discussed by the House and the House has voted against them and that being so I think the House should maintain the same attitude and reject this amendment.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: I think Captain Sassoon has suggested a very correct precautionary measure because as a medical man I can put before you an instance of a slight injury to the forearm, involving the destruction of one of the important nerves. It is not apparent to the layman. It is not apparent to the injured person who may come to realise it after some months and he then claims this lump sum for permanent disablement and I think the provision here although it introduces a layman to decide on a professional matter is better than allowing a man to take unfair advantage of this period of detention.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that the original amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I beg to move:

"That in clause 11 after sub-clause (2) the following sub-clause be inserted, namely:

(3) If a workman before the expiry of the period within which he is liable under sub-section (1) to be required to submit himself for medical examination voluntarily leaves the vicinity of the place in which he was employed his right to compensation shall be suspended until he returns and offers himself for such examination."

On List of Business.

I have already explained the reason for this amendment. The House will see that it is a far more modest proposal than that suggested by Captain Sassoon. All we do is that we say that if a workman leaves the vicinity of the place before submitting himself to such examination his right to compensation should be suspended until he returns and so submits himself. I hope the House will accept this amendment.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I propose to move a small amendment to the amendment moved by the Honourable Mr. Innes and that amendment is "Omit the words 'returns and' in lines 6 and 7 of his amendment. The effect of the amendment will be that the man must offer himself for examination but it is not necessary that he should return to the place. The reason of my amendment is quite obvious. There will be some cases in which it will be very difficult indeed for a man to return but if the injury is very small, then the man should return but this will be provided by the fact that these medical examinations are going to be according to some rules and it is quite possible to frame rules for the medical examination under the Act to provide that in the case of small injuries causing a particular percentage of disablement the man must return but in other cases the man need not return. The whole thing is provided for by simply saying that the man must offer himself for examination and the interpretation of the word 'offer' will be made according to the rules that will be framed by Government for medical examination. Therefore I think the words 'returns and' ought not to be there. If the injury is small, the rules will provide that the man must return. If the injury prevents a man from returning, then the man will be allowed by the rules not to return but the employer will be asked to examine the man at his place of residence. I think my amendment is quite reasonable and will be accepted by the Government.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved that in lines 6 and 7 of the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment the words 'returns and' be omitted.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I must oppose this amendment. I think it would have been better if Mr. Joshi had opposed the whole of my amendment from the beginning, for by missing out the words 'returns and' he destroys the whole value of the amendment which I propose to make to this clause.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I oppose the amendment and I also oppose Mr. Joshi's amendment. It appears to me quite unreasonable to ask the workman not to leave the vicinity of the place of his employment. That is the object of this clause also. That was the objection to Captain Sassoon's amendment. That is also the objection to Mr. Innes' amendment. As I said, these matters should be decided by rules to be made. There may be cases where it will be quite just to call upon the man to stay in his place of employment for medical examination. There may be cases where he should be allowed to go away to his own home and offer himself for medical examination at or near his place of residence. There are cases and cases which it is difficult to provide for. As the amendment now suggested runs, in every case, whether the injury is one which results in death or whether it be an injury which does not result in death, the workman cannot leave the vicinity of the place. That is what this amendment aims at. I think it is a cruel thing to do that. I think these cases must be provided for by rules. We have passed clause 10. Clause 10 provides that the workman must give notice as soon as practicable after the happening of the accident and before he has voluntarily left the employment in which he was injured. Having done that, to make a provision that he should not only give notice but should also stay in the place, is not a right amendment and I oppose it.

Mr. Pyari Lal (Meerut Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): I think, Sir, to carry this amendment as proposed by the Honourable Mr. Innes would be in other words accepting the amendment of the Honourable Captain Sassoon. The whole question turns upon as to whether the workman should or should not leave the vicinity of the place where the accident occurred. The House has decided it and he is not prevented from leaving it but this amendment introduces the same thing again—that he must remain in the vicinity and he must return to the place for medical examination. I think it is very hard indeed on the poor workman. We have to consider the humane element of the thing also. To ask a man who is suffering from a severe pain to return to the place of employment for medical examination is very hard indeed and I think the House has already recorded its opinion on that point and this amendment should be accordingly rejected.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Sir, I rise to oppose the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment as also the amendment suggested by my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi. The House has just now rejected Captain Sassoon's amendment although he showed that there was a crying necessity for making some provision against fraudulent claims on the part of employees. The only advantage I can see in the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment is that something is better than nothing. It demands from the injured employee an examination within three days in the vicinity of his employment. Now I say that it is no safeguard whatever. Whereas if on the one hand, the House has rejected the safeguards suggested by the Honourable Captain Sassoon, it now asks us to accept the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment, it will certainly be going "from the frying pan into the fire." Let us pause and ask ourselves what does this amendment demand from the injured employee. It is going to insist on an injured workman remaining in the vicinity of his employment to receive treatment for three days. There may be no doctor there: how can you expect an injured workman to remain in the vicinity for three days, and prevent him from going to another place for medical relief,—to his own house probably. I say, Sir, that it is not rational, nor correct; I think it is going "from the frying pan into the fire."

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Sir, I must make my position on this amendment clear

Mr. President: The Honourable Member has already spoken.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I would like to speak on the amendment as a whole.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member did speak on the amendment as a whole.

The question is:

"That the words 'returns and' be omitted."

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I withdraw my amendment, Sir.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"That in clause 11 after sub-clause (2) the following sub-clause be inserted, namely:

(3) If a workman before the expiry of the period within which he is liable under sub-section (1) to be required to submit himself for medical examination voluntarily leaves the vicinity of the place in which he was employed his right to compensation shall be suspended until he returns and offers himself for such examination."

The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

The Assembly then divided as follows:

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I beg to move:

"That in clause 11, sub-clauses (3) and (4) be renumbered (4) and (5) respectively, and that for sub-clause (4) as so renumbered, the following sub-clause be substituted, namely:

(4) Where under sub-section (1) or sub-section (3) a right to compensation is suspended, no compensation shall be payable in respect of the period of suspension and if the period of suspension commences before the expiry of the waiting period referred to in clause (D) of sub-section (1) of section 4, the waiting period shall be increased by the period during which such suspension continues."

This amendment, Sir, is purely consequential—a drafting amendment. I need say no more.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I think, Sir, the amendment is not a consequential one. It is a serious amendment. I would draw the attention of my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, to the last words of sub-section (2) of section 11: "unless, in the case of refusal, he was prevented by any sufficient cause from so submitting himself."

Sir, it is provided that when a man has got sufficient cause not to submit himself for examination during the period of suspension, he shall be paid his compensation; and I therefore think this amendment is absolutely inconsistent with that clause. I hope the House will not accept such an amendment, which is absolutely wrong even in drafting.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Sir, I beg to move the following amendment:

"In clause 11 omit sub-clause (4)."

I am not moving my other amendment at all.

Dr. Nand Lal: What is the number of your amendment?

Mr. President: The Honourable Member means the clause now re-numbered (5)?

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Yes, Sir; new number (5).

Dr. Nand Lal: May I ask the Honourable Member the number of the amendment?

Mr. N. M. Joshi: It is not printed. It is a very simple amendment; it asks for the omission of clause (4) in the Bill as submitted by the Joint Committee; now it has become clause (5) after the addition of the clause by the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes. Sir, this clause is intended to reduce the compensation which a workman may have for his injury, if it is shown that he did not avail himself of the medical treatment which may be offered to him by the employer or of any other qualified medical treatment of which he might have availed. Sir, I think that if this is allowed to be retained a large part of the benefit which the working classes may get from this Bill will altogether disappear. The working classes in this country are not generally ready to avail themselves of the treatment offered by western medical practitioners and if on that ground a man's compensation is to be reduced, I think the working people will lose their compensation in many cases. Sir, I am not an advocate nor am I a supporter of the Ayurvedic and Unani systems of medicine; as a matter of fact the House knows well that when Government showed their sympathy—it may be lip sympathy—for the Ayurvedic and Unani systems of medicine, I was one of those people who opposed the Resolution which was brought forward in this House in support of those systems of medicine. But, Sir, I am not here to propagate my views on the Ayurvedic and Unani systems of medicine. I must take note of the condition of things as they exist in India to-day. To-day it is a fact which no body will deny that the working classes in this country have a great prejudice against western systems of medicine.

Sir, among the opinions which have been received on this Bill, there are some which are in favour of the clause and there are also some which are against it. I would only read one, namely, the opinion of the Government of Madras on this proposal. They say:

"Refusal to receive medical or surgical aid offered by an employer should not debar a workman from claiming compensation for the original injury suffered by him. Though prejudice or ignorance may in some instances induce a workman to decline medical aid proffered by the employer, considering that a differentiation in the award of compensation between the original injury and its subsequent development is not going to be easy and that it would be very difficult indeed to say that the subsequent ill-effects are due to the neglect of the original hurt or injury, the compensation should, this Government think, be awarded in spite of refusal to receive surgical or medical aid offered by the employer."

In the same way, the United Provinces Government point out the difficulty of the women workers who generally have got a great prejudice against male doctors treating them. Sir, I know very well that this clause does not totally debar a man from receiving compensation for injury even if he refuses to be treated by a qualified medical practitioner. But, Sir, if we leave this loophole in the Bill, the effect will be that every employer, though he may be very kind-hearted, will try to go to the Workmen's Compensation Commissioner before he pays the compensation. It is very easy for an employer to say to the injured workman that his wound aggravated because he received a treatment which was not a treatment from a qualified medical practitioner. Therefore, this Bill will not only deprive the poor workman of a part of his compensation but it will also leave a loophole for the employer to go to the Workmen's Compensation Commissioner. I can hardly think of an employer who will not take advantage of this clause to get the compensation reduced. I therefore think that this sub-clause in the interests of the working classes must be deleted.

Sir, there is another danger, and a great danger too. Many Honourable Members of this House have taken a very cynical view of the psychology of a workman. They had accepted, and many of them advocated, that a working man may commit suicide in order to get compensation or he may get his hand cut off, as Captain Sassoon only a few minutes back suggested, in order to get compensation. But, Sir, what does this clause provide for? Take the case of a factory which is not in Bombay. I want the House not to misunderstand me. I am not taking the case of a factory in Bombay. I am taking the case of a workman who is injured in a small factory in a suburb, or in an out-of-the-way place, where, there may be only one qualified medical practitioner paid by the employer. Now under these circumstances the only qualified medical practitioner available to the injured man is the employer's doctor. Now where is the guarantee that this employer's doctor will give sufficient and good treatment to the injured man? You will say "why not"? Sir, if we are to take a very cynical view of human nature, let us take a similar cynical view of the employer's psychology. Sir, if the man on account of the wound dies, the employer pays Rs. 240; if he lives, the employer has to pay a larger compensation. The difference between the highest limit for compensation for death and compensation for total disablement is Rs. 1,000. If a working class man will commit suicide for the sake of Rs. 240, as some said yesterday, what guarantee is there that an employer's doctor will not neglect the injured man in order to save the thousand rupees for his master? That is what is provided by this Bill, at least in some cases. I hope, Sir, since the House has taken a very cynical view of the psychology of the workman, they take a similar view of the psychology of the employer. Let us be fair to both parties, and, if you are going to be fair, there is a great danger to the life of a wounded man working in an out-of-the-way factory. There is a very great temptation for the employer to save Rs. 1,000 by neglecting him. Therefore, I hope my amendment will be accepted.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 11, omit sub-clause (5)."

Captain E. V. Sassoon: Sir, in the first place, I join issue with Mr. Joshi that the House has taken a very cynical view of the workman. (Mr. N. M. Joshi: "You yourself spoke".) I think that the voting on my amendment would have shown that whatever I have said did not get the approbation of the House. On the other hand, I am prepared to allow the House to take as cynical a view as they like of the bad employer. And, when Mr. Joshi read out the opinion of the Government of Madras on this clause, perhaps, even though I may be one of the hated class of employers, I may be allowed to read out extracts from the opinions of the Mill Owners Association on this very clause. This, I may tell you, is the opinion of a body consisting of men who, according to Mr. Joshi, nearly all of whom, I think he said, would be prepared to go to any length to save a few rupees:

"Section 4.—In connection with this clause, concerning the penalties which may be imposed on a workman as a result of his not availing himself of the services of a qualified medical practitioner when such services are offered to him by his employer, my Committee (that is to say, the Committee of the Mill Owners Association) draw attention to the deep-rooted prejudice that many Indian work people have against western medical methods.

Also, when considering this section it must be remembered that the judgment of the medical practitioner whose services are engaged by the employer may at times be biased in favour of the employer." ●

This, Sir, is the opinion of the Mill Owners Association of Bombay, not, as you may think, of Mr. Joshi:

"For the foregoing reasons, therefore, my Committee advise that the Commissioner should be advised to make allowance for the Indian workman's prejudices concerning medical practice and that in all disputes the issue of which depends upon a medical decision he should be compelled to take independent medical evidence."

Now, Sir, I do feel that this new clause No. 5 does fail in that respect, and therefore I, though I would oppose Mr. Joshi's amendment which is to remove the whole clause, would like to add safeguards to that clause. Perhaps, Sir, I am not in order in doing that now? I would like to add to the clause that the Commissioner should take advantage of the facilities given him under sub-section (2) of clause 20 and appoint a medical assessor in such cases.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 11, omit sub-clause (5)."

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I must object to the amendment proposed by Captain Sassoon. I have had no notice at all of this amendment. It has just been proposed on the floor of the House and I am afraid, Sir, I must rise to a point of order against Captain Sassoon.

Mr. President: We can only deal with that after we have disposed of Mr. Joshi's amendment.

Mr. A. G. Glow (Industries Department: Nominated Official): Sir, I am afraid that my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi, has unintentionally misled the House as to the opinions received on the Government proposal regarding this very difficult question of medical relief. This Bill was framed after consultation of Local Governments and interests throughout the country; the Government of India issued a circular letter, and in that letter they drew attention to the fact that in a number of American Acts a workman who refuses to take medical relief when offered by his employer forfeits all his rights to compensation. It was in response to this that the Madras Government said that such a proposal would bear very hardly on workmen in this country who have prejudices, justified or otherwise, against accepting western medical science. And it was in consequence of that opinion and of the opinions received from other Local Governments that the Government of India completely altered the proposal before they drafted the Bill. Now the proposal, as it reads now, merely protects the 1 P.M. employer against aggravation of the injury. There is nothing whatever to prevent the workman being attended by a doctor of the Unani or Ayurvedic school. If the doctor is efficient, if he does not produce aggravation of the injury—and remember, it is for the employer, and not the worker to prove aggravation—if no aggravation is produced, then the worker does not suffer in any way. I think that this is a perfectly reasonable clause. It was accepted by the Joint Committee without change and I am surprised to find Mr. Joshi opposing it at this stage.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: Sir, I think Mr. Joshi's amendment to drop this clause is legislation by obsession. He seems to be obsessed by the fact that every employer for the sake of Rs. 96 upon which he has been harping since yesterday will kill a workman. The second obsession is that every employer

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I never said "every employer."

Mr. B. S. Kamat: Whatever he said, of course he led the House to believe that the employers as a rule will take advantage of this section as a loophole.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Exactly; some people.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: Now, if his amendment is carried, the whole frame work of this Bill would be destroyed. If a workman, whatever his sentiments or whatever his prejudices might be up to now, wants to take advantage of a social piece of legislation like this which is—a Western product engrafted upon Indian society—he will have to adjust himself to new ideas, namely, if he wants compensation, he must submit himself for some sort of civilized medical examination. Mr. Joshi wants that the employer should be put under certain conditions. But on the other hand, he wants that the employee should be absolutely at liberty either to get his wound not treated at all by a proper man or to apply Unani medicine to it or to apply Ayurvedic decoctions to it and allow septic poisoning of the blood or gangrene or any other disease to intervene. And yet he wants that the employer should rigidly follow the Workmen's Compensation Act so far as compensation is concerned. I do not think, Sir, this is fair. You cannot have it both ways. You cannot have your cake, eat it and keep it in your pocket too. Now, I shall refer to what the Social Service League of Bombay, with which my friend, Mr. Joshi, is connected, and where he is doing such splendid work so as to evoke our admiration uniformly, say on this clause. They passed the following opinion upon this clause:

"The Social Service League of Bombay record the opinion that in this clause there should be this alternative:

'In clause 11 (4) the following should be added, namely, examination by any other qualified medical practitioner provided free of charge by Government or any local authority.'"

[Mr. B. S. Kamat.]

In any case, I point out, Sir, that he had himself admitted the necessity of some sort of medical examination for the injured person. Now, he is coming forward to delete the whole of this clause and leave the injured man absolutely at liberty either to have no treatment at all or to have Ayurvedic treatment or to take homely domestic applications for the wound and yet to go to the employer and ask for compensation in full. I therefore think, Sir, as I said at the beginning, that this is nothing but legislation by certain obsessions.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: My difficulty, Sir, is this. Mr. Joshi was a Member of the Joint Committee. He has signed the Report of the Joint Committee subject to a certain minute of dissent. He does not, in that minute of dissent, raise any objection in regard to the clause which is under consideration. Is it open to a member of the Joint Committee, who comes before the House signing the Report of the Joint Committee on the Bill subject to a certain minute of dissent in which he does not take any objection to the clause which is under consideration, to do so now?

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, this question was raised when we were considering the Police Bill in Simla during the last Simla session. I think it was understood—I do not recollect if the Chair gave a ruling on the point,—but we understood that the Members of a Joint Committee or of a Select Committee are quite free when the Bill comes up for consideration to move any amendment they like and vote any way they like and we did so. I think my Honourable friend, Mr. Samarth, is in error in this respect.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: May I say one word of explanation? I had learnt one lesson in my childhood and it was this, that it was never too late to learn. There was a time when I thought this clause was innocuous or not harmful as it was. During the last few days, having seen through the psychology of the employer, I have changed my mind.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"To omit sub-clause (4) [re-numbered (5)] of clause 11."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 11, as amended, and clauses 12 to 21 were added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan): My amendment is:

"In clause 22 omit sub-clause (1). Under the clause we provide:

'No application for the settlement of any matter by a Commissioner shall be made unless and until some question has arisen between the parties in connection therewith which they have been unable to settle by agreement'."

It is well and good to prevent the workman from going in for litigation or approaching the Commissioner unless he has a real dispute with the employer and which has been left unsettled, but it is otherwise to force that man to enter into an agreement with the employer. So far as there is a recommendation for agreement, I am at one with the Government but so far as there is a compulsion for agreement, there I beg to differ from the Government. Sub-clause (1) of clause 22 practically compels the workman to go to the employer for an agreement and if he fails to get an agreement on certain points, to go to the Commissioner, which I consider to be very objectionable, because under this sub-clause the workman will be under the belief, that he shall have to agree to the terms that may be made by his employer and if he did not do so, probably he would be ruined by his employer in the future. And he shall be in a way compelled to agree to those terms which he thinks to be undesirable. With that view, Sir, I move that this clause be deleted, which will not make it compulsory to have an agreement with the employer. The workman could approach the Commissioner directly where the need exists and without approaching the employer.

Mr. A. G. Clow: Sir, I do not think that there is any compulsion to reach an agreement. All that the clause provides is that the workman and the employer should first attempt to reach an agreement. We do not want the Commissioner to be flooded with a number of applications, when the workman has not even approached his employer and asked for compensation. If the Honourable Member will read sub-clause (d) he will see that there should accompany the application a concise statement of the matters on which agreement has and on which agreement has not been come to. There is no question of the workman having to accept anything the employer offers. I oppose the amendment.

Mr. President: The question is that in clause 22, sub-clause (1) be omitted.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Parts (b), (c) and (d) of my amendment drop out as they are only consequential. I beg to move part (e) of my amendment, namely:

"In sub-clause (3), after the word 'Commissioner' add the words 'or Secretary of any workman's union or association recognized by the employer or Commissioner and of which the applicant is or the deceased was a member'."

Under this sub-clause we provide that if the applicant workman is an illiterate person or for any other reason is unable to furnish the required information in writing, the application shall, if the applicant so desires, be prepared under the direction of the Commissioner. It will be very hard for the workman to approach the Commissioner for this and he should be allowed to give the information necessary under this clause and the information be allowed to be reduced into writing by any person he chooses; but if it is desired to stop him from asking advice from strangers, he may at least be permitted to get the assistance from the Secretary of the Union of which he happens to be a member. That will safeguard the interests of the worker also and give the information that may be required by the Commissioner. Therefore, Sir, I put before the House that there should not be unnecessary obstruction in his getting assistance from the Union and he may be allowed to have the help of the Union where the Union exists and where the employer or the Commissioner has recognized the Union.

Mr. A. G. Clow: I think the Honourable Member has misunderstood the intention of this clause. There is nothing to prevent the Secretary of any workmen's union or association from preparing the application. There is nothing to prevent the Honourable Member himself, who shows a keen solicitude for workmen, preparing these applications and I hope he will. All we say is that if the workman is unable to furnish his application and has no Secretary of the Union and no Honourable Member to come to his aid, then he has a right to ask the Commissioner to prepare his application for him.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 22 was added to the Bill.

Clauses 23, 24 and 25 were added to the Bill.

Mr. B. N. Misra (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, I move:

"That in clause 26 for the words 'in the discretion of' the words 'taxed according to Rules provided in the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, by' be substituted."

This is a new Act and if we leave the discretion to Local Governments, the practice may vary in different provinces and we do not know what the effect will be. I think it will be well to give them some basis. That is why we have it in section 22, that such application will be accompanied by any such fee; and also in section 23 we provide that the Commissioner will follow the Civil Procedure Code in order to take evidence on oath, and in section 24 also we say that a legal practitioner or other person may be authorised to appear. We have almost followed the Civil Procedure Code, and we have already fixed data, and the rules of the Civil Procedure Code provide that the presiding officer of the Court can exercise his discretion, so that the costs should be taxed according to Rules provided in the Civil Procedure Code.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: What are those rules?

(An Honourable Member: "There are no rules; different Courts have different rules.")

Mr. B. N. Misra: Rules according to which taxation takes place they are embodied. However, my point is that the basis should be to tax according to the rules which obtain under the Civil Procedure Code, instead of a simple discretion being given; I wish that it should be taxed according to rules provided in the Civil Procedure Code.

The motion was negatived.

Clauses 26, 27, 28 and 29 were added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move:

"That in sub-clause (1) (a), clause 30, after the word 'sum' wherever it occurs, insert the words 'or periodical payment'."

Sir, in clause 30 we allow an injured worker and the employer the right of appeal in certain cases. This right of appeal has been confined only to such cases which involve an allowance or disallowance of a lump sum only, and does not provide for cases where questions of half-monthly or periodical payments are involved. By the acceptance of the amendment which I beg to move we shall be extending this right of appeal even to the periodical payments which the workman may or may not be entitled to. With these words, Sir, I beg to move my amendment.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 30, sub-clause (1) (a) after the word 'sum' wherever it occurs insert the words 'or periodical payment'."

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I do not think that it is necessary to accept this amendment. We wish to limit appeals as far as possible under this Bill, and we wish to limit them to the really important issues. Half-monthly payments cannot in any case exceed Rs. 15. Ordinarily they will not last very long—they are merely given in cases of temporary disability, and I think they can quite well be left to the Commissioner; there is no need for any appeal to the High Court.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, the next amendment which I beg to move is that in sub-clause 1 (a) after the words 'a claim' insert the words 'in full or in part.' Sir, we give a right of appeal to a workman only in case of disallowance of a claim in full. If the amendment which I move be accepted, I think we shall make the meaning of this clause rather very clear; it will mean, even if the claim is disallowed in part, the workman will have the right of appeal. With these words, I move my amendment.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"That in sub-clause (1) (a), after the words 'a claim' insert the words 'in full or in part'."

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I have no objection to this amendment. It is governed by the Rs. 300 limit in the proviso. We may have to make a slight alteration in drafting in the Council of State, but no doubt this House will be ready to agree to that.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In sub-clause (1) (a), after the words 'a claim' insert the words 'in full or in part'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, in view of the policy of this Bill which is of a special character, I do not propose to move my amendment, vis.:

"In the first proviso to clause 30 (1) for the words 'three hundred' substitute the words 'one thousand'."

Sir, I am given to understand that, if I make verbal changes, Government is prepared to accept my amendments. Will you kindly give me, Sir, permission to make verbal amendments? The verbal amendments are, that instead of putting a new clause, I am putting my amendment as sub-clause (3), and instead of saying "section 5," I shall say "the provisions of section 5." Then, I anticipate your permission, Sir, and move my amendment which will run as follows:

"After clause 30 insert the following as sub-clause (3), namely:

"(3) The provisions of section 5 of the Indian Limitation Act shall be applicable to appeals under this Act."

Since the Government is prepared to accept my amendment, I think I need not detain the House. The amendment commends itself.

The amendment was adopted.

Clause 30, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Clause 31 was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"In clause 32:

'In sub-clause (1) after the word 'may' insert the words 'with the approval of the Legislature'."

Clause 32 authorizes the Governor General in Council to make rules that may be necessary on matters mentioned in the various sub-clauses of this section. My object is to have those rules before the Legislature for their approval. No doubt, we have to leave many points to the Governor General in Council but it is desirable and necessary that these rules be approved by us. The other day when I moved a similar amendment, the Honourable Mr. Innes pointed out certain anomalies; he pointed out that there were many matters in the Mining or Steam Boilers Regulations that might require expert knowledge which might not be possessed by some Honourable Members of the House and that it would be simply ridiculous to put such proposals before the House. In this case, Sir, no such difficulty will arise. Even if difficulties were to arise, the House is expected to be guided by the opinion and the advice of the Government. I therefore beg to move that whatever rules be made under this Act or under clause 32, they may be placed for approval before the Legislature. It may be said, Sir, that the amendment which I am moving is incongruous with other Acts, because they do not provide such a clause. But I wish to remind the House and take them back to the Lac Cess Act passed the year before last in the Simla Session, which has made a similar provision. With these words, I beg to move the amendment which stands in my name.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, Mr. Agnihotri has mentioned one of the objections I took to a similar proposal made by him not in connection with the Mines Bill but the Steam Boilers Bill. But he has omitted to refer to another objection which I took on that occasion. I think it wrong, Sir, that rules of this kind should require the approval of the Legislature before they are made effective.

I think it wrong, as I said on that occasion, that the time of this House should be taken up with details like rules of this kind. Everybody knows—he has only got to look at the list of business—that we have not time as it is to get through all the business before us. Everybody knows that owing to the pressure of Government business, important non-official Resolutions and important non-official Bills never come before this House; and I deprecate our wasting the time of the House with rules of this kind. They are essentially the sort of rules which ought to be left to the Executive Government, and we provide the safeguard that rules of this kind must be published before they are actually made. That is the proper safeguard. Sir, I oppose the amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 32 was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"In clause 33, after the words 'subject to' insert the words 'approval of the Local Legislative Council and'."

Sir, this amendment is similar to the one which I just moved. I have simply to answer one of the objections which the Honourable Mr. Innes has put forward, namely, that much time of the Legislature will be wasted if these rules are put up for approval. May I remind the Honourable Mr. Innes that even the rules that are framed about emigration and other laws have to be put before us for approval; and similarly there will be no harm if these rules are also put up. It happens that Bills come before us which though they have been considered by Select Committees and thoroughly considered by the Government still require some modifications which are made when they come to the House, and may sometimes be necessary that the people acquainted with local conditions may be better able to suggest certain changes or alterations in the rules when put before the House. Therefore, Sir, I beg to move this amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 33 was added to the Bill.

Clause 34 was added to the Bill.

Sir Montagu Webb (Bombay: European): Sir, I beg to move that:

"In column 2 of Schedule I:

substitute the figures 10 for the figures 25; substitute the figures 10 for the figures 20; substitute the figure 5 for the figures 10 wherever they occur; and substitute the figures 2½ for the figure 5."

The reason for this amendment is that I feel, and those for whom I speak feel, that the compensation provided in this Schedule for minor accidents is on too high a scale. I am not quite certain, Sir, upon what principle exactly the scale of percentages in Schedule I has been based; but surely there are very few occupations in which the workman would lose one-quarter of his earning capacity by being deprived of a thumb.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: A weaver.

Sir Montagu Webb: I notice that the Karachi Chamber of Commerce have worked out some of these compensations in the Schedule as they would appear expressed in goats, sheep, cows and so forth; and taking that example, I find that a workman drawing, say, wages of about Rs. 60 or Rs. 70 a month, by the loss of a thumb would receive compensation equivalent in value to 10 cows, or 150 sheep or 200 goats! For the loss of a thumb, it seems to me, Sir, that such a scale of compensation would be too high. The same remarks apply to the scale of compensation for the loss of fingers and toes, etc. For that reason, Sir, I beg to move the amendment which stands in my name

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I can answer the Honourable Sir Montagu Webb's question at once. These scales were worked out after taking the best advice we could get in Simla and Delhi and after the most careful study of the Schedules in force in the different countries. I should like also to point out to the House that throughout this debate there has been a sort of general understanding that we should leave the scales of compensation as they were left by the Joint Committee, and I think that we ought to carry that understanding right through to the end. In that view, Sir, I hope that the House will not accept this amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

Schedule I was added to the Bill.

Sir Montagu Webb: Sir, I have here a letter from Mr. Darcy Lindsay authorising me to move the amendments standing in his name. I beg to move, therefore, that:

"In Schedule II the following be substituted for sub-clause (vi) (a):

'(a) A building which is designed to be, is, or has been more than one storey in height above ground level, or.'

The object of this amendment, Sir, is only to define more clearly the conditions set forth in Schedule II and to avoid misunderstanding. As it is, the Schedule at present reads: "a building which at the time when the accident on account of which compensation is claimed takes place comprises more than one storey wholly, or partly above ground, or." The presence possibly of a single brick might be the deciding factor as to whether a building at the time of an accident was of more than one storey. It appears to me that it would avoid misunderstanding and lessen the possibilities of disputes if the definition were made a little more complete. Therefore, Sir, I beg to substitute the words which I have read out—"a building which is designed to be, is, or has been more than one storey in height above ground level, or".

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I am advised that the amendment moved by the Honourable Member brings out more clearly our original intention than the existing clause. That being so, Sir, we are quite prepared to accept the amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

Sir Montagu Webb: I beg to move, Sir:

"That in Schedule II the following be substituted for sub-clause (vi) (b):

'(b) A building which is used, has been used, or is designed to be used, for industrial or commercial purposes and is, or is designed to be, not less than twenty feet in height measured from ground level to the apex of the roof, or.'

The reasons for this amendment are exactly the same as those which I just put forward a minute ago; they are to make a more exact definition so as to avoid disputes. The amendment speaks for itself and I hope, Sir, that Government will be able to accept it.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Government, Sir, are quite prepared to accept this amendment for the reasons I have already given.

The amendment was adopted.

Schedule II, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Schedule III was added to the Bill.

Schedule IV was added to the Bill.

Mr. President: The question is that this be the title of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that this be the Preamble of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: May I point out, Sir, that clause 1 has not yet been passed which was postponed?

Mr. President: Does it require any amendment?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: No, Sir, it does not require any amendment, but it has got to be formally passed.

Clause 1 was added to the Bill.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I beg to move the next motion which stands in my name, and before I do so, I hope that the House will permit me to say just a very few words. I wish, in the first place, to congratulate the House on passing a very difficult piece of legislation, and I wish to thank them also for the great consideration they have shown in dealing with a very intricate and controversial Bill. Government have made every effort to lay before the House a measure carefully thought out to meet Indian conditions. I am sure that I will have my Honourable colleague Mr. Chatterjee with me when I say that if Government have achieved any success in this direction, they owe it very largely to the labours of the gentleman on my right, Mr. Clow. (Applause.) But, Sir, whatever efforts we have made, I am quite free to admit that in almost every clause and in almost every line of this Bill, there is room for a fair difference of opinion and I think, if I may be permitted to say so, Sir, the House has shown the very greatest restraint in dealing with these controversial matters. I think that the House arrived at the conclusion that in dealing with a controversial matter of his kind, the wisest course was to go by the understanding, the implied understanding, which had been arrived at and which had been enshrined in the Joint Committee's Report, and the fact that the House did arrive at this wise decision has enabled us, I think, to get through in a reasonable time this very difficult Bill. I think, Sir, in this Bill we have a very good augury for the future. England has arrived at her present stage of labour legislation by a process of painful evolution, and I am afraid that in that process a legacy of class bitterness has been left. I hope, Sir, that in India we shall avoid that class bitterness, and if we do avoid it, it will be very largely due to the spirit of mutual good-will and toleration which employers and the labour people have shown in regard to this Bill. I have seen representatives of the employers in the persons of the Honourable Sir Alexander Murray and Mr. Saklatwalla and the representatives of labour in the persons of my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi and Mr. Roy Chaudhury of Bengal, I have seen them day after day sitting across the table, thrashing out together the very difficult questions raised in this Bill, and I have admired very greatly the good-will, the tolerance and the reasonable spirit of give-and-take in which they approached the very intricate problems, and as long as we have that spirit of give-and-take and mutual good-will, I have no fears myself as to the way in which India will deal with her labour problems. I move, Sir:

"That the Bill, as amended, be passed."

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Bill to provide for the payment by certain classes of employers to their workmen of compensation for injury by accident, and as further amended by this House, be passed."

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, when I give my assent to this motion, I am not without apprehensions as to the effect which this Bill may have on the growth of indigenous industries in this country. Sir, England took more than a century to enact her Workmen's Compensation Act. It was only in the year 1906 that she embarked upon this piece of legislation after she had had a most successful industrial career in the world. India has yet to begin her industrial career, and before we are yet on our feet, these fetters are put upon the growth of industries. But I welcome the measure in the hope that it will be liberally administered. The Government have always got a very serious responsibility indeed in administering this measure which will become law. This measure proposes the appointment of a Commissioner quite outside the ordinary Civil Court. I hope every effort will be made by every Local Government in the selection and choice of the Commissioner. It is no use appointing merely executive officers to discharge the duties which are thrown upon the Commissioner by this Bill. He must be a highly trained judicial officer who has to be in charge as Commissioner to decide the very complicated questions which will arise in the construction of this Act. There is a very great danger in appointing a Commissioner because, having only to work compensation cases, he is likely to get into a groove from which it will be very difficult for him to extricate himself. So it would have been perhaps a better provision to allow these questions to go before the ordinary Civil Courts where sub-judges and district judges would have their ordinary suits to try, where there is less chance or risk of their becoming confirmed specialists with fixed ideas. We have had that experience. Sir, in the case of income-tax officers who have been appointed to settle legal questions. We have had that experience in the Estate Land Act cases in Madras, where revenue officers have been appointed to decide civil disputes. I hope that will not be the result in this case. I hope the officer who is chosen for this responsible position will be a man of ripe judicial experience, although he may cost the country somewhat higher. Sir, in this country labour is quite disorganized. It is not organized at all. Unlike the labourers in England and elsewhere, these people cannot afford the assistance of either skilled lawyers or skilled experts to assist them in the conduct of cases before the Commissioner, whereas before the Commissioner the employer is sure to have the assistance of able counsel and able medical men—while the poor servant will not be in a position to afford the expense. Therefore, we must take care that what we give with one hand is not taken away with the other. So, this measure will have to be very liberally and carefully administered. And there is a chance of this measure increasing the cost of articles consumed by the consumer. Insurance Companies are sure to be started and high premia are sure to be demanded. It is not after all the pockets of the employer that the money required will come out of, but the pockets of the consumer. Here is a great chance for people in this country to undertake ventures in the shape of Insurance Companies. I know, Sir, many a foreign Company have their eye on this country now. They are closely watching the progress of this legislation in this Chamber and in another place. Directly this becomes law I am sure enterprising foreign Companies will plant their Companies and their Agents here. I hope my countrymen in this Chamber—especially the magnates from the Bombay side—in addition to running mills will also encourage the growth of indigenous Insurance Companies to take advantage of this new Act, so that we may have Indian Companies taking advantage of Indian conditions and adding to the wealth of the country in this way.

Sir, there is one clause which we have passed to-day, to which I ask the serious attention of the Government; that is, sub-clause (8) to section 11. Sir, we have passed it no doubt but I hope in another place it will be set right. We have passed a clause saying that, if a man goes away from the place and if he does not return for medical examination, then the right of compensation is to be suspended. Sir, what is to happen if that man dies and is unable to return? He goes away to his place and he dies on the spot and he does not return. The compensation, according to the clause as it stands, will go. I hope that will be taken note of in another place and the necessary amendment made.

Sir, I support the motion.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: May I be permitted, Sir, to say a few words in supporting the motion before us that the Bill be passed? I may say at once, Sir, that I do not apprehend that the passage of this Bill will in any way hamper the growth of industries in this country. Mr. Rangachariar has just told us that, after years of industrial development in other places, measures of this character have been adopted. If other countries have made the mistake of not starting in the right direction and allowing the evils that grow as a necessary adjunct to industrial development, I am sure we, at any rate, will not repeat the mistakes that they have made, especially when we consider the result of the mistake that have been made by other nations. In other countries we find as a result of the mistakes made by them that hatred, suspicion and distrust have come in where mutual understanding and good will ought to have been the rule. In this country we want to avoid hatred. In this country we want to avoid mutual distrust. In this country we want to avoid mutual suspicion. The best way to do it is to start with these precautions and then take up wholeheartedly the industrial development of this country, which seems to be in sight at a not very distant date, and we shall soon find that we shall be a prosperous India, rich, industrially developed, and without the feelings of hatred, mutual suspicion and distrust that are unfortunately in existence in other parts of the world. It is for us to avoid the mistakes that have made possible the existence of all those evil conditions in other countries, and if we begin in the right direction, as I am sure that this Legislature is beginning, we shall have achieved a good deal not only as a service to our own countrymen but as an example to other nations that will in future take upon themselves the task of industrial development. I may also, Sir, with your permission, add a word of congratulation to the Government of India for undertaking legislation of this kind. It has been rightly pointed out by a Labour Leader in Bombay, who has not always been in sympathy with Government actions, that so far as labour legislation in this country is concerned, since the inception of the Reforms the Government have gone beyond even his wildest dreams. Perhaps that is an exaggeration.

(At this stage Mr. President vacated and Sir Campbell Rhodes took the Chair.)

But I feel that a beginning in the right direction has been made. It is to the advantage of the country; it is to the advantage of the world, because it will be held as an example to other nations which are going to rise industrially. Sir, with these words, I heartily support the motion before us.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: May I be permitted to say one word in support of this motion? Sir, whatever may be the merits of the clauses and the proposals in this Bill, we owe a great debt of gratitude to the Honourable Mr. Innes, to my Honourable friend, Mr. Clow, and to my Honourable friend, Mr. Chatterjee, for bringing it forward and securing its passage through the Assembly. Sir, this Bill is the beginning of what is to follow in future and I welcome it in that light. The Bill no doubt has got its defects. I have pointed them out during the discussion. But, Sir, I would like to refer only to one of them. I felt greatly pained when I found yesterday the House refusing to help the widow and the children of a workman when he dies on account of an accident although the accident might have been caused by his wilful misconduct. That vote has unfortunately placed a very undesirable stamp upon the whole House. It has shown to the working classes that on certain occasions they may not get justice—not only that they may not get justice but that they may not even get compassion from this House. Sir, that is the effect of that vote and it means nothing else. (Honourable Members: “No, no.”) I am glad to hear it does not mean that. I have pointed out one defect of the Bill. I should also like to point out the strong point of the Bill. The strong point of the Bill is exactly that which my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, said is the weakest point. The strong point is the procedure by which the workman is to get compensation. It is wrong in the present condition of the working classes in India to send a workman to a Court or into the hands of a lawyer. I am not a friend of the lawyer, and I therefore feel that that is the strongest point of this Bill.

There is only one word more. Mr. Rangachariar mentioned in his speech that our industries are only just beginning to be started and established and expressed his apprehension that a legislation of this kind may not help them. May I tell him to learn, as Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas told him, by the experience of the western world. If you want western industries, if you want western industrialism, and if you do not adopt the western methods of social insurance and other ameliorative measures, certainly you will not only have the bitterness that you see in the west, but you will see here much worse things than that. Therefore, if the country wants industrialism, I think it is better in the interests of the country that all measures which are necessary to avoid the evils of industrialism should be taken. Nobody will express the opinion here that modern industrialism has no evils, and if these evils are there, we must take measures to prevent those evils before we undertake to develop industries. If you do not do that, then you will suffer not only what the west has suffered but you will suffer more. With these words I again congratulate the Honourable Member for having got this Bill passed in this Assembly.

Dr. Nand Lal: This a very useful piece of legislation and my belief is that it will prove a very effective step towards the industrial development of this country. I feel bound to offer a suggestion to the Government of India, which is this, that they will be pleased to impress on the minds of the Local Governments that, at the time of appointing Commissioners, they will kindly see that either very able and trained lawyers are appointed or judicial officers of great experience are put in charge of this important work. At the same time, if the Commissioners will be in need of expert assistance, the Local Government should be careful to appoint experts of great capabilities and not pay attention to creed, caste or colour. With these few words I commend the motion which has been very ably moved and I congratulate the Government on this very useful measure.

The motion that the Bill, as amended, be passed was adopted.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Three of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Three of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. President: The Assembly will now proceed with the further consideration of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Court-fees Act, 1870, as passed by the Council of State.

Clause 62 was added to the Bill.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, I move:

"That in clause 63, in clause (f) of the proposed section 239, for the words 'the possession of which has been transferred by one offence' the words 'the possession of which has been transferred in the same transaction' be substituted."

Honourable Members will find this is an amendment to section 239 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and the clause is "persons accused of offences under sections 411 and 414 of the Indian Penal Code or either of those sections in respect of stolen property, the possession of which has been transferred by one offence." Now, section 411, I may inform the Honourable Members of this House deals with the offence of receiving stolen property and section 414 with the offence of concealing stolen property. Now, in the first place I want the Government to explain what they mean by the clause 'the possession of which has been transferred by one offence.' Will they illustrate to me how the possession of property of one offence can be transferred so as to constitute offences under sections 411 and 414 of the Indian Penal Code. It seems to me what is intended is that if there is a theft, say, of half a dozen articles one man is made the receiver of property: another conceals that property: the third one assists in the concealment of the property. These are all offences committed in the same transaction and consequently persons who are privy to an act which constitutes a series of acts in the same transaction may be dealt with together. That seems to be therefore the intention so far as we on this side of the House understand it. If the Government justifies the retention of the clause which they have inserted in this sub-clause (f), I shall be pleased to withdraw my amendment. Otherwise I suggest to the Government that the adoption of the amendment made by me is an improvement on the language of the official draftsman.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 63, in clause (f) of the proposed section 239, for the words 'the possession of which has been transferred by one offence' substitute the words 'the possession of which has been transferred in the same transaction'."

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, my Honourable and learned friend asks that I should endeavour to explain what is the meaning to be attached to the words 'the possession of which has been transferred by one offence' in clause (f) of the proposed section 239. I would in the first place direct his attention to the fact that exactly the same words are included in clause (e), and he has not suggested any change of those words. Now, Sir, the Honourable Member has suggested that the official draftsman should explain what these words mean. This, however, Sir, is not a Government clause at all, it is a proposal of the Lowndes' Committee, introduced by them, and that Committee was not a Government Committee at all. They said, with reference to this clause, 'we accept this clause with certain verbal modifications and have added a new sub-section dealing with offences under sections 411 and 414 of the Indian Penal Code.' The clause is exactly as drafted by the Lowndes' Committee. My Honourable friend proposes to substitute for those words the words 'the possession of which has been transferred in the same transaction.' I would suggest, Sir, in the interests of the accused, that it is distinctly dangerous to make that change. But perhaps it will be sufficient if I merely explain what the meaning of the words is. Take a concrete example. A is a cattle-thief; two cattle are stolen; B is the dishonest receiver to whom A has passed on one of the cattle; C, the dishonest butcher who knows the cattle to have been stolen and assists in their concealment by slaughtering the other. Well, Sir, if A is present, A, B and C can all be tried together under clause (c). If A has disappeared, then this is not possible, and the provisions of clause (f) are required. The possession of these cattle has been transferred in one offence, the original offence of theft. One person has later committed an offence under section 411, and another person has committed an offence under section 414. The two cattle were stolen at the same time, that is one offence. I do not know whether it is necessary for me to go on and explain further as to how the proposed amendment is dangerous, but there is no doubt about it that the amendment proposed by my Honourable and learned friend has a much wider application than the words in the Bill, and I think the House will agree that it is desirable not to make the change.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, in view of the explanation given by the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson, I do not wish to press my amendment.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Clauses 63, 64 and 65 were added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I beg to move:

"In clause 66, insert the following at the beginning:

'In sub-section (1) of section 245 of the said Code after the word 'accused' the words 'to explain points or circumstances appearing in evidence against him' shall be inserted.'"

Section 245 provides:

"If the Magistrate upon taking the evidence referred to in section 244 and such further evidence (if any) as he may, of his own motion, cause to be produced, and (if he thinks fit) examining the accused, finds the accused not guilty, he shall record an order of acquittal."

I wish to insert the words "to explain points or circumstances appearing in evidence against him" after the word "accused." The clause, as amended, will require the Magistrate to explain the points or circumstances appearing in evidence against the accused and not ask him general questions about other details not against him. Sir, similar provision has been made under section 342 in connection with warrant cases and I think that procedure is more desirable than the one which we have already provided in section 245. Section 245 should also be altered and brought in conformity with the provisions of section 342. With these words, Sir, I move my amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): Sir, I think this amendment has been moved under a misapprehension. There are several sections of the Code which provide for the examination of the accused at a particular stage of the inquiry or trial. This section 245 is only one of them. In all these places where at a particular stage of the inquiry or trial an examination of the accused has to be made, that examination has to be made in accordance with the provisions of section 342. Section 342 is the provision which guides the Magistrate in all these cases. It is quite unnecessary in section 245 to lay down the details of the examination, because section 342 governs section 245. It is there already and it is quite unnecessary to put it into the Code a second time.

Dr. H. S. Gour: May I just point out, Sir, in addition to what has fallen from the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith, that my Honourable friend is wrong in saying that section 342 only relates to warrant cases. If he will refer to Chapter XXIV, he will find that that Chapter deals with general provisions as to inquiries or trials, and consequently it entirely covers the case which my friend is now seeking to provide for.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 65, insert the following at the beginning:

"In sub-section (1) of section 245 of the said Code, after the word 'accused' the words 'to explain points or circumstances appearing in evidence against him' shall be inserted."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 66 was added to the Bill.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, I beg to move:

"In clause 67 (i) in proposed sub-section (1) for the words 'upon information' substitute the words 'in consequence of information'."

This is merely a verbal amendment and I invite the attention of the Treasury Benches to accept it, if they consider it an improvement.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, as my Honourable friend has not endeavoured to justify the amendment which he has proposed, I would merely explain the reason why these words as they stand in the Bill are more appropriate than the words proposed by my Honourable friend. Cases are instituted by taking cognizance. Section 190 is the section dealing with taking cognizance of an offence and we want to use the same words as in section 190 in section 250.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I withdraw the amendment, Sir.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu (Godavari cum Kistna: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I move:

"In clause 67, sub-clause (i) in proposed new sub-section (1) of section 250, for the words 'by his order of discharge or acquittal' substitute the words 'at the time of discharging or acquitting the accused'."

That clause runs as follows:

"(7) If, in any case instituted upon complaint or upon information given to a police-officer or to a Magistrate, one or more persons is or are accused before a Magistrate of any offence triable by a Magistrate, and the Magistrate by whom the case is heard discharges or acquits all or any of the accused, and is of opinion that the accusation against them or any of them was false and either frivolous or vexatious, the Magistrate may, by his order of discharge or acquittal, call upon the person upon whose complaint or information the accusation was made forthwith to show cause why he should not pay compensation to such accused or to each or any of such accused when there are more than one, or may, if such person is not present, issue a summons to him to appear and show cause as aforesaid."

Well, Sir, the complainant can only be called upon to show cause why he should not be made to pay compensation, after the accused has been formally discharged or acquitted; and the accused person can only be discharged or acquitted by means of a judgment which is written and signed. The Madras High Court has held that oral judgments are not valid under the Criminal Procedure Code, and so when an accused person is discharged or acquitted, it means that the judgment has been written and signed by the Magistrate. It is only after that that the Magistrate can call upon the complainant to show cause why he should not be made to pay compensation to the accused. So, the order which the Magistrate will pass ordering the payment of compensation can only be affixed or appended to the judgment as a postscript, so to speak. Therefore, it is impracticable for the Magistrate to order compensation or to call upon complainant to show cause, by his order of discharge or acquittal. He can only do it after he has acquitted or discharged the accused. That is the reason why I want to insert the words "at the time of discharging or acquitting the accused."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, there is something perhaps a little unsatisfactory about this sub-section (1) of section 250, though not for the reason, I suggest, that my Honourable friend Mr. Pantulu has given. I do not think that any real difficulty arises from the fact that the Magistrate is required to do this by his order of discharge or acquittal. But if Honourable Members will look at the clause closely they will find that in the case where the complainant is present the clause requires the Magistrate to call upon him to show cause by his order of discharge or acquittal. When the complainant is not present he does it outside his order of discharge or acquittal. He issues a summons. I think that is distinctly unsatisfactory. I should like to meet my Honourable friend in one way, and I have an amendment here; it does not embody his words "at the time of" because we think that those words are apt to be vague and to lead to difficulties, lead perhaps to additional grounds of appeal and revision. What is the time of discharge or acquittal? We are generally told it takes a clever man to do two things at the same time. If he is delivering his judgment, he cannot at the same time write an order calling upon a man to show cause. Therefore we cannot have the words "at the time." I tried hard to think of a phrase which is satisfactory and have come to the conclusion that it is not possible. We must stick to the order, and I would suggest that whether the complainant is present or not, the Magistrate must in both cases call upon the accused by his order—where he is present, call upon him directly, or where he is not present by his order direct the summons to be issued. The amendment will then run, if the House will permit me to move it:

"For the words beginning with 'call upon the person' and ending with 'or may,' the following words be substituted:

'if the person upon whose complaint or information the accusation was made is present, call upon him forthwith to show cause why he should not pay compensation to such accused or to each or any such accused when there are more than one, or,'"

and then it will go on "if such person is not present, issue a summons to him to appear and show cause as aforesaid." It means another amendment, Sir, a second amendment—for the word "issue" insert the words "direct the issue of."

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I withdraw my amendment, Sir.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

The amendment (proposed by Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith) was adopted.

The second amendment—to omit the word "issue" in order to substitute the words "direct the issue of" in proposed sub-section (1) of clause 67 was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move:

"That in clause 67 in proposed sub-section (2) in sub-clause (i) after the words 'such amount' omit all words commencing from 'not exceeding' to the words 'third class'."

Sir, in section 250 of the present Bill we provide that in false and frivolous or vexatious accusations a compensation up to Rs. 100 may be awarded; and in the case of a Magistrate of the second or third class the amount has been limited to Rs. 50. My amendment will make it uniform for all classes of Magistrates, whether first, second or third. I think, Sir, the amount of fifty rupees which was provided in the old Code was a proper amount because if the accused thought that the amount awarded to him was not sufficient he could go to a Civil Court and have compensation or damages from that Court as well. One hundred rupees for each of the accused will be rather a high amount to be awarded in such cases of compensation. Therefore, Sir, I propose that the amount of fifty rupees which was provided in the old Code should be struck to and should not be changed in this new Bill. With these words, Sir, I propose my amendment.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, as has been mentioned by my Honourable friend the Bill proposes to increase the amount which may be awarded as compensation under this section from rupees fifty to rupees one hundred in cases dealt with by a first or second class Magistrate. In 1911 the Punjab Chief Court wrote that they would raise the penalty, which is entirely inadequate at present, to Rs. 150, and that, Sir, is the genesis of the present proposal. If Rs. 50 was inadequate in 1911, surely Rs. 100 is inadequate now. My Honourable friend says that it is possible to go and file a civil suit. That is true, Sir, but in this section we provide a summary proceeding with the object of stopping these vexatious and frivolous prosecutions, and I think, Sir, it is most desirable to increase the amount of compensation which may be awarded in the manner proposed in the Bill. I therefore, Sir, oppose the amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move in the same sub-clause:

"That before the word 'third' insert the words 'second or'."

As the first amendment of mine has failed, I wish to provide by this amendment that the awarding of compensation to the extent of Rs. 10 should only be confined to 1st class Magistrates, and 2nd and 3rd class Magistrates could only award compensation to the extent of Rs. 50.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, the present provision in the Bill which restricts the power of Magistrates to award compensation exceeding Rs. 50 was introduced by the Joint Committee. They thought, Sir, that it was undesirable that a Magistrate who had only power to pass a sentence of fine up to Rs. 50 should have power to order compensation to an amount exceeding Rs. 50. This, Sir, does not apply to the case of a second class Magistrate who can award a sentence of fine up to Rs. 200.

Another point is, Sir, that these cases are very likely to be those in which a second class Magistrate exercises jurisdiction. In these circumstances, Sir, I oppose the amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. B. N. Misra (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, practically the first part of my amendment has already been disapproved by the House, which was also the amendment of my Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri, and so it remains for me only to move the second* part of my amendment which relates to (2A), the latter portion, that is, "shall suffer simple imprisonment for a period not exceeding thirty days". I propose that 30 days is too long a period. Possibly the offence for which the complaint might have been instituted may be of a very simple nature, and even if an accused was convicted for such offence, he might be sentenced to pay a fine. But when a complaint is presented and it is found to be vexatious and frivolous, to make the complainant in default of payment to pay a fine (which is now Rs. 100) to undergo a sentence of thirty days, will be very severe.

Sir, sometimes it happens that, after a complainant presents a complaint, the accused tries to win over the witnesses so that they may not prove the facts of the case. On account of the machinations of the accused, if the complaint is not proved, he may get Rs. 100. He may perhaps bribe the witnesses Rs. 5 or Rs. 10 each and spend Rs. 20 or Rs. 30 and get a compensation of Rs. 100. This would be very unjust. The Magistrate may hold in cases where the witnesses are won over by foul means the complaint to be false and frivolous. Sometimes it may be that the Magistrate may not be able to study the situation and there may not be many witnesses—there may be a single witness and that witness may be unwilling to appear. In such cases, it is a very hard case to impose a very heavy fine as well as to ask the complainant to undergo such a severe punishment, imprisonment for one month. I submit the result would be that probably many people won't go to court. Supposing a rich man, a big zamindar has given some blows or a slap or abused filthily one of his tenants, the tenant would be afraid to come to Court because the zamindar is an influential man who can win over the witnesses. This poor man will have no remedy, because the Court will again punish him. So the threat of these punishments will deter a man from going to Court. Under these circumstances, I respectfully submit that the House will accept my proposal that the punishment to be inflicted should not be so severe as one month in default of payment of Rs. 100.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley (Home Member): The existing law provides for Rs. 50 compensation and, in default of payment, 30 days imprisonment. The House has already agreed that the maximum of compensation should be raised to Rs. 100. It hardly seems consistent, therefore, to reduce the period of imprisonment to seven days. I cannot myself exactly follow out the arithmetical ratio which the Honourable Member has in his mind, but it seems to me of a peculiarly inverse nature. The arguments which he has used and the instances which he has quoted apply of course equally against the whole scheme for compensating the accused as the result of false, vexatious or frivolous complaints. I would remind him that all that is provided is a maximum. It by no means follows that, because the law provides a maximum, the Magistrate will invariably, as he seems to suggest, award to a man who brings a frivolous complaint the full imprisonment for 30 days.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, there is a great question of principle in support of the amendment moved by my Honourable friend, Mr. Misra. Sir, it is an uncivilised method of recovering compensation to put a man in prison. I wish he had moved for the total abolition of imprisonment in default of payment of such compensation. How is it a compensation to the accused person—compensation for costs incurred by him in regard to his defence? It is no compensation to put the complainant in jail. Sir, it seems to me ridiculous that the Legislature should provide any imprisonment in this way. By all means recover the amount by selling his movable or immovable property. But if the man is unable to pay, simply because he went to Court complaining of an offence committed against him and may be he is not sufficiently influential to prove it and the Court comes to the conclusion that the complaint is vexatious, you put him in jail! I quite admit that it would be right to compensate, by making payment to the accused money for costs incurred by him. But to go and put a man in jail because he is unable to pay seems to me to be barbarous. I, therefore, Sir, support the amendment.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras ceded districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, the principle under which my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, supports this amendment is the principle probably which applies to every provision in our law in which non-payment of a fine, non-payment of a debt is followed under various circumstances by imprisonment. That is, when we attack the entire principle which pervades all branches of law, then I think the argument of my learned friend here would hold good. But why this sympathy for a man who has dragged another into a criminal Court and the Court, after proper inquiry, has found that the complaint was frivolous and vexatious? Why should we assume that the Court which has found that the complaint was frivolous and vexatious came to that conclusion because one man was rich and the other man was poor, one man was able to win over the witnesses and so on? All these considerations are entirely outside the position, the basis on which this compensation has been fixed. We must assume in arguing a question of law, a question of legislative measure, that the court which passed judgment passed it rightly. But if you give the go-by to the finding of a court and then say that the court may have been misled, and therefore the consequences of that judgment ought to be nullified by these provisions, I think that is not a clean way of arguing a legislative measure. If the Court has gone wrong in its finding there are provisions for revision. There are provisions of law to guard against that. If the compensation is wrong, the man has the right to appeal against the award of compensation. This is a matter on which there need not have been any argument. Because the Bill says "fifty" you want to put in "thirty" or because the Bill says "forty" you want to put in an amendment saying "thirty". You must fix it at some amount. Then this alternative of imprisonment in default of payment exists for ordinary simple debts. If a man gets costs in a civil suit and the other man does not pay it, then he is liable to be imprisoned. Why this tenderness for a man who has brought a criminal case which a court has found to be vexatious and frivolous.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, there has been considerable misapprehension on the part of my learned and legal friends in reading the very elementary provision which prefaces section 250. It is not in a case of frivolous or vexatious prosecution that the Magistrate is empowered to impose a fine by way of compensation. The case must be found to have been false, and either frivolous or vexatious. In the first place, therefore, it must be a false charge, added to which it must be either frivolous or vexatious. In other words, it must be a case not merely which is not proved but a case which has been proved to be a false case and super-added to which a frivolous and vexatious case. That was the premises upon which my learned friend Mr. Rangachariar built up his argument.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: No, that was not my argument.

Dr. H. S. Gour: He further said that it was an uncivilised and barbaric thing for a man to be imprisoned for not paying his debts. I am surprised at my friend supporting a theory that it is a barbarous and uncivilised thing for a man to be imprisoned for not paying his debts. Surely, Sir, this is much more than a debt. A man has launched a prosecution in court. Let us assume, as the section assumes, that it is found to be both false and frivolous or vexatious. What is the remedy which the aggrieved accused has against the complainant? It is not a debt as my Honourable friend, Mr. Subrahmanayam, assumed, it is in the nature of a fine for having made a false and frivolous case against the accused.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: It is compensation.

Dr. H. S. Gour: My friend on my left says "compensation".

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): It is a sanction.

Dr. H. S. Gour: If he has not got property, movable or immovable, from which this compensation is to be recovered, is he to go scot-free? If so, it is setting a premium upon all poor people.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Upon paupers.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Paupers and vagabonds to institute false and frivolous prosecutions because forsooth they will have nothing to pay, nothing to lose, by implicating respectable people in cases under the Indian Penal Code. I cannot understand, Sir, what my learned friend meant by saying that the case may not be proved, witnesses may have been suborned, influence may have been brought to bear upon the case, and so the case may fail. But my friend forgets that in all these cases, the Court will acquit the accused, because the case has not been proved. The Court will not pronounce it to be a false case and the Court will not pronounce to be a frivolous or vexatious case. If it does, you have the right of appeal and revision. I therefore submit that upon every ground this amendment fails and ought not to receive the support of the House.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): I oppose this amendment. Take a hypothetical case. Two persons are enemies. One is a rich man and he employs an ordinary man to lodge a false complaint against his enemy who is a very respectable man. The complaint is altogether vexatious and false. It has been dismissed and it has been found by a competent Magistrate that it was frivolous and that it was vexatious. Look at the disgrace to which the accused has been put. He has been dragged to the Court for nothing. He had to spend money in engaging Counsel. He was summoned to the Court, and no wonder in some cases he may be sent to a lock-up. The competent Magistrate after having gone into the evidence, after having examined all the circumstances, comes to this conclusion that the complaint is altogether unfounded and the complainant has been called upon to pay compensation, Rs. 100 if the case is tried before a first class or a second class Magistrate and only Rs. 50 if the case is tried by a third class Magistrate. He fails to pay that. As a matter of fact, he defies the law and then the Code provides that if he does so, he may be imprisoned for a period not exceeding 30 days. It will depend upon the discretion of the Magistrate. He may award imprisonment for 7 days, or for 15 days but not more than 30 days. Then you will be pleased to see the character of the imprisonment. It is simple imprisonment and such a sort of compensation is reckoned to be fine and would be realised as such. I think the amendment has got no justification whatsoever and it should be rejected. On no principle can it be supported.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I beg to move:

"In clause 67 in sub-clause (ii) after the word 'substituted' insert the following: 'and the words 'of the second or third class' shall be omitted'."

Sir, it has been said from the Government Benches that second and third class Magistrates have been authorised to award compensation only to the extent of Rs. 50 as otherwise they would have to award compensation beyond their powers, because a third class Magistrate cannot punish an offender and inflict a fine on him of any amount over Rs. 50. Therefore to provide against this anomaly they have provided for the award of compensation by a third class Magistrate to the extent of Rs. 50 only. In the old Code, the amount of compensation that a first class Magistrate could award was fixed at Rs. 50. Now, if a first class Magistrate had inflicted a fine of Rs. 50 on an accused, the accused had no right of appeal against that conviction or order. On that principle, if under the old Code no provision for appeal against an order of the first class Magistrate was made, that was quite sound in principle. But, here, we authorise the first class Magistrate to award compensation to the extent of Rs. 100. If the same Magistrate had awarded a punishment of fine extending to Rs. 100, but not below fifty, the accused could have had a right of appeal against that fine. In this case why should not the complainant have a similar right of appeal against the order of the first class Magistrate? It looks anomalous. If we adopt the principle in one case, why should we not adopt it in the other case?

[Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri.]

Therefore, I beg to move that even the compensation awarded by first class Magistrates should be subject to appeal as that awarded by second or third class Magistrates. With these words I commend my amendment for the consideration of the House.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, at the present time there is no appeal from an order of compensation passed by a Magistrate of the first class. I think the substance of the amendment moved by my Honourable friend is that if a Magistrate of the first class passes a fine exceeding Rs. 50 an appeal would lie, why then should an appeal not lie if he makes an order for compensation exceeding Rs. 50? If it would meet my Honourable friends I am quite prepared to agree to an amendment of the Bill on those lines. But I would ask the Assembly to deprecate any extension of the rights of appeal beyond that. There are at present, Sir, in the Code ample provisions as regards revision which will check any possibilities of failure of justice. If that suggestion will meet my Honourable friends, then we on the Government Benches would be prepared to agree to such an amendment.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I am quite prepared to accept the amendment which has been suggested by Mr. Tonkinson.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: I would suggest that we may go on to later amendments, with your permission, until the draft of this amended clause is ready.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I beg to move:

"That in clause 67 (iii) after the words 'from the date of the orders' the following be inserted:

'or such further period as the Court may, in the circumstances of the case, think fit to direct'."

This is a very simple amendment and I hope Government will see their way to accept it. The additions made by Government to sub-clause (4) are as follows:

"And where such order is made in a case which is not subject to appeal, the compensation shall not be paid before the expiration of one month from the date of the order."

The object is that the payment of compensation should be withheld for a period of one month when giving the complainant a right of revision. But the revision may take a much longer time, and I therefore suggest the addition of the following words—"or such further period as the Court may, in the circumstances of the case, think fit to direct." If the case is already launched on the revisional side of the High Court, it is not likely that it will be disposed of within one month, and therefore I submit that the Court must have jurisdiction to extend the period, and not limit it strictly, as it has been in the amended clause, to 30 days. This is all the more necessary, Sir, in view of the fact that we have already adopted the provision for alternative imprisonment in case of non-payment, and I therefore suggest that the addition of these words should be made at the end of sub-clause (iii).

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 67 (iii) after the words 'from the date of the orders' insert the following:

'or such further period as the Court may, in the circumstances of the case, think fit to direct'."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I quite agree with Dr. Gour that, if revisional proceedings have been launched, it is not likely that the proceedings will be terminated within one month, and that the Magistrate ought to have power to delay the payment of the compensation. Sir, the Magistrate has got that power: it is quite unnecessary to add it in the clause. If my Honourable friend will look at the clause which the Bill adds, it says that compensation shall not be paid before the expiration of one month from the date of the order. "Shall not be paid before." There is nothing to say that the compensation shall be paid on the expiration of one month. It is perfectly clear that the Magistrate has a discretion, and in a case like that he will exercise his discretion. It is unnecessary to add words to the Bill which would be redundant.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, I withdraw the amendment.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: I move, Sir, that the final consideration of clause 67 be postponed until we have prepared a draft on the clause which the House has just been discussing.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I wish to move the third amendment which stands in my name, namely:

"In clause 67-A, after sub-section (2) the following sub-section shall be added, namely:

"(3) The Magistrate before proceeding to hear the evidence shall if requested allow the accused reasonable time to prepare his case."

Sir, section 252 as it stands at present reads thus:

"When the accused appears or is brought before a Magistrate, such Magistrate shall proceed to hear the complaint (if any), and take all such evidence as may be produced in support of the prosecution."

Sir, it does leave a discretion to the Magistrate to adjourn the case for a reasonable period in order to enable the accused to prepare his case, but what happens often is that the Magistrate takes up the case immediately when it is put before the Magistrate and the accused and his counsel do not generally get an opportunity to go through the chalan, or the papers filed by the police in the Court and thus are not able to prepare the case to defend the accused. Therefore, I suggest that provision of the nature I suggest be incorporated in this Code. Then the Magistrates will certainly give some opportunity to the accused to prepare their cases. I do realise that in many cases probably the accused may take undue advantage of this provision and may want to delay the proceedings; I admit that it is just possible, but, I propose that a period considered reasonable by the Magistrate be allowed and not a period which the accused thought reasonable. Therefore, the amendment which I have moved may be accepted by the House.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I suggest to the House that this is a case, most certainly a case, in which we should not trench upon the Magistrate's discretion. As my Honourable friend admits, most Magistrates will allow reasonable opportunity for the accused to prepare the case if good cause is shown to them. But, surely, in the ordinary course, the best way for the accused to prepare his case is to begin by listening to the evidence for the prosecution. How else is he going to prepare his case, unless my Honourable friend contemplates the preparation of false defences and that sort of thing? (Mr. Agnihotri: "No, no.") As I said, Sir, I think this is a case in which the Magistrate's discretion should not be taken away, just as we, who are sitting in this House, on a question of motion for postponement of business, are entirely in the hands of our President. You are not obliged, Sir, to put any motion for the adjournment of business; it is entirely in your discretion, and it would be a serious hampering possibly of public business if it were not so.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 67-A, insert the following at the end:

'The Magistrate before proceeding to hear the evidence shall if requested allow the accused reasonable time to prepare his case'."

The amendment was negatived.

Clause 67-A was added to the Bill.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Sir, mine is merely a drafting amendment and if it does not commend itself to the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith, I do not want to press it.

Mr. President: I cannot allow amendments to be moved conditionally. Does the Honourable Member move it or not?

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I move it, Sir. It runs as follows:

"In clause 68, to the proposed new section 255-A add the following:

'Before passing the sentence'."

The object of my amendment is this. Previous conviction can only be proved after the accused has been convicted. I want to make it clear that this should be done before the accused is sentenced. That goes without saying. But I propose that these words be added at the end in order to make it quite clear that evidence should be recorded before the sentence is actually pronounced.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I do not know whether it is really necessary to oppose an amendment moved in such halting terms. I suggest it is entirely unnecessary. There is no doubt, of course that this action will be taken before passing a sentence. It is quite obvious I should think, Sir, to any one that that would be so. I would merely invite the attention of the House to the fact that in Chapter XXI of the Code the sections are arranged chronologically. This provision comes in proposed section 255-A, and the sentence comes in section 258. I think, Sir, that this amendment is therefore unnecessary.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 68, to the proposed new section 255-A add the following:

'Before passing the sentence'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 68 was added to the Bill.

Rao Bahadur P. V. Srinivasa Rao (Guntur cum Nellore: Non-Muhamadan): Sir, the amendment standing in my name, runs as follows:

"In clause 69, omit the words 'if the Magistrate thinks fit'."

In place of the amendment that stands in my name, I hold in my hands a copy of the amendment drafted by the Government; and I am advised

Sir, to move it in place of my amendment, and if you permit me, I am prepared to do so, though, I must say, that I am not satisfied with it. But as a compromise and under the circumstances, I am willing to move it in place of my amendment. That amendment, Sir, runs thus :

"That in clause 69 for the words 'either forthwith or if the Magistrate thinks fit at the commencement of the next hearing of the case' the following be substituted, namely :

'At the commencement of the next hearing of the case, or if the Magistrate for reasons to be recorded in writing so thinks fit, forthwith'."

I do not think any speech is required from me to commend it as the Government have, I understand, accepted it. I therefore move this amendment.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 69 was added to the Bill.

Clause 70 was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move the following amendment.

"In clause 71, for the words from 'after the' to the word 'inserted' substitute the following :

'after the word 'complainant' the words 'or his authorised agent' shall be inserted, the words 'and the offence may be lawfully compounded' shall be omitted'."

Sir, in clause 71, which refers to section 259 of the Code, we provide that "When the proceedings have been instituted upon complaint and upon any day fixed for the hearing of the case the complainant is absent and the offence may be lawfully compounded, the Magistrate may in his discretion, notwithstanding anything heretofore contained at any time before the charge has been framed, discharge the accused."

Sir, this section of the present Code provides that in the absence of the complainant the case may be dismissed in default if the offence be compoundable. Sir, the Lowndes Committee recommended that in every case instituted upon complaint the case may be dismissed in the absence of the complainant. They said :

"We think that no useful result follows from attempting in ordinary complaint cases to force the complainant to go on against his will. We therefore omit the words 'and the offence may be lawfully compounded,' as has been suggested by the Bombay Government. We think the requirements of justice will be sufficiently safeguarded by the discretion which is already vested in the Magistrate under this section."

What I beg to submit is that if the case has been instituted upon a complaint, whether it was a cognizable case or a non-cognizable case, the complainant should have the liberty to withdraw from the case, or absent himself or not proceed with the case as he thinks fit.

It may be argued, Sir, that in cognizable cases, the State has to look to the interests of the public and such cases may not be allowed to be withdrawn or dismissed in default. Well, Sir, in such cases the clause as it stands now provides that such cases could only be dismissed at the discretion of the Magistrate; so there will be no hampering of justice and no escape of a criminal even in cognizable cases. Moreover, in cognizable cases in 90 out of 100 cases the police do take cognizance of such cases, and even after the filing of the complaint if the police considers that in the interests of justice and to protect the interests of the public it was necessary to take cognizance, they could take cognizance, and in that case this section 259 would not apply because 259 applies only in those cases in which a complaint has been instituted in Court at the instance of the complainant. Here 'complaint' does not mean an information to the police, but 'complaint' in this clause means a direct allegation made in a Court of law. Therefore, Sir, the interests of justice would not suffer in any way if my amendment is accepted.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"That in clause 71, for the words from 'after the' to the word 'inserted' substitute the following:

'After the word 'complainant' the words 'or his authorised agent' shall be inserted, and the words 'and the offence may be lawfully compounded' shall be omitted'."

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I admit that the amendment proposed by my Honourable friend would bring the Bill back to the measure as it was drafted by Sir George Lowndes' Committee. I would merely in opposition to the proposal of Sir George Lowndes' Committee and the proposal of my Honourable friend read the remarks of the Chief Commissioner, North-West Frontier Province, with reference to that clause. He said:

"I also would press for the retention of the words 'and the offence may be lawfully compounded', which it is proposed to omit from section 259; otherwise it leaves the door open to blackmail and an abuse of justice, for it will encourage persons guilty of serious criminal offences to pay complainants not to continue the prosecution."

Sir, I submit that that is not an imaginary evil, and that that proposal in the Bill is a proposal which should be accepted as it stands.

The amendment was negatived.

Clause 71 was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move:

"That after clause 71 insert the following clause:

'71A. In section 260 of the said Code, in subsection (1) after the proviso insert the following further proviso:

'Provided further that no case in which the accused objects to its trial in a summary way shall be so tried'."

Sir, here we have

Mr. President: Before the Honourable Member begins to discuss the merits of the proposed amendment, I am not at all satisfied that it is within the scope of the Bill; I am prepared to hear him on that point.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, there was an original clause in the Bill which was numbered as 72 and it referred to section 260 of the Criminal Procedure Code. That clause has been omitted by the Joint Committee, and therefore I am entitled to move either its re-insertion or any amendment in that section. On this point I may perhaps mention, Sir, that on the very first day I requested the Deputy President to give me a ruling, and the Deputy President who occupied the Chair on that day was pleased to give me a ruling that I could put in amendments of this nature; and in accordance with that ruling, on previous occasions I have moved amendments referring to clauses of the Bill which have been dropped by the Joint Committee, and as such, Sir, I am entitled to move an amendment in regard to this clause also.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Mr. Agnihotri has recalled a ruling of the Deputy President on this matter. It is true that certain amendments have been allowed on the strength of that ruling. But I think the Deputy President allowed those amendments on their merits because he felt that they did actually refer to the subject matter of the Bill and I submit, that the question whether an amendment does refer to the subject matter of the Bill or not is really the crucial and decisive test. Now, may I put to you, what Mr. Agnihotri proposes in the present case? Section 260 was mentioned in the original Bill but it was proposed to amend this section (which is a somewhat long one) in one small matter only. There were a large number of sub-clauses in section 260 defining the particular offences which were to be brought within the scope of the summary procedure. It was merely proposed to add one additional offence, namely, the offence of attempting to commit suicide, within the scope of that section. This proposal however having fallen through, the whole section has been omitted in the Bill as it came to us; but taking the opportunity of the fact that the section was mentioned (for this very limited purpose) in the original Bill, Mr. Agnihotri now proposes an amendment which makes a substantive alteration in the whole of our procedure regarding trials by summary procedure. I claim then that this is not an amendment which is relevant to the subject matter. As I say, he will by this amendment introduce considerations which are not in any way pertinent to the purpose for which section 260 was mentioned in the original Bill.

Mr. President: I should like to know from the Honourable Member whether he accepts the description given by the Honourable the Home Member about the clause in the original Bill and whether it tallies with his view of it?

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I have not been able to follow the Honourable the Home Member, Sir

Mr. President: I put the point to the Honourable Member as to whether the statement that clause 72 in the original Bill did in fact refer to a single offence and not to procedure under which offences might be tried tallies with his view?

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Yes, Sir, it referred to the addition of an offence among the summary trials that are provided in section 260 of the Code, and section 260 was brought before us in the original. If it had been embodied in the Report of the Joint Committee I would have been entitled to move any amendment in that section, according to the ruling that was previously given. In that way, if I could move an amendment to the portion other than that brought before us in the original Bill, I cannot be debarred from moving this amendment in this section.

Mr. President: I will deal with the point raised by the Honourable Member as to the latitude of the Assembly to amend any and every provision within a certain section because that section happens to be mentioned in the amending Bill. The Honourable Member is well aware that a section may cover a great variety of different things. I have not the slightest doubt that the Deputy President gave a perfectly just and accurate ruling in that particular case; but I do not accept the Honourable Member's reading of this case, because the original section only brought an additional offence within the scope of summary trials. Now the Honourable Member is proposing to introduce a very large change in the rights of accused persons who may be brought to summary trial.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): As this is a very important matter, I hope you would allow us to put our case before the House. Sir, when a particular section is brought for the consideration of the House, what is in the mind of the Government is not the governing factor, if I may respectfully say so. We have to vote upon the section, and I take it, Sir, that ultimately you will ask that this clause do stand part of the Code. Therefore, the whole of that section is open to discussion, because I take it from the formal words in which you put the question the clause as presented is to be voted upon. Clause 67 includes the matter which the Government want to take into the Code and you will have to put to the House whether that should stand part of the Code. Under those circumstances, Sir, it seems to me, where one section is brought in the fact that Government have a particular idea in mind should not be the guide and the whole of the section should be allowed to be discussed by the House.

Mr. President: I must be guided by the subjects rather than by the fact that there may be two or three quite different letters in the same envelope.

Dr. H. S. Gour: May I advert to another aspect of the question. When a certain section comes up before this House, the question is as to whether that section should be amended. The Government say that it should be amended in a particular way. Any Honourable Member of this House may suggest that the amendment should take some other form. Consequently, by the very necessity of the case the whole section becomes subject to amendment. I submit that, when this section was an integral part of the original Bill and it was left out by the Select Committee, according to the ruling given by your predecessor in the Chair, the Deputy President, and yourself, Sir, in connection with the Workmen's Compensation Bill (the omission of Chapter II), section 260 which deals with summary trials became relevant and any Member of the House, therefore, became entitled to ask for the restoration of that section as open to discussion by this House and, that section having come up for discussion before this House, it is open to any Member to suggest an amendment to that section. I, therefore, submit that Mr. Agnihotri's amendment is in order.

Mr. President: I am afraid I cannot agree. The Honourable Member has not appreciated the distinction which I have drawn between a section which may raise several different subjects of importance and those subjects themselves. I draw a line between them. Otherwise, as the Honourable Member may well see, liberty to amend the Code would be practically unlimited.

Dr. H. S. Gour: This section merely deals, Sir, with summary trials. It categorises certain offences and says that these offences shall be summarily triable. That is all. Consequently, it comes within the ruling that has just been given, Sir, that it should deal with one single subject—in this case, the mode of trial of certain offences. That is all that the section deals with, Sir. Mr. Agnihotri's amendment is that the mode of trial shall be subject to a certain proviso, which he proposes to insert. A number of different subjects have not been brought together under section 260. It is only as regards the mode of trial in a summary manner that that section lays down one principle and one single fact. And under that section we have a large number of offences which are categorised as triable summarily.

Mr. President: No, I must uphold the objection taken by the Home Member, which seems to me to be valid.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 67, to sub-section (ii) add the following:

'and for the words 'to an accused person' the following shall be substituted, namely, 'or has been so ordered by any other Magistrate to pay compensation exceeding fifty rupees'."

The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 67 was added to the Bill.

Mr. President: Clause 73.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, would the next amendment not be covered (referring to the amendment in Dr. Gour's name) by the ruling which you have just given? The Government propose to include only a particular section. My friend wants to exclude certain sections. He may perhaps move an amendment with reference to the included section but not propose the exclusion of other sections.

Mr. President: Is the Honourable Member discussing clause 73?

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Yes, Sir.

Dr. H. S. Gour: He is trying to block my motion, Sir.

(Mr. President then called on Dr. Gour to move his amendment.)

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, my amendment is to section 261 of the Code of Criminal Procedure which lays down what offences shall be summarily triable. I wish to exclude therefrom certain distinct offences. These are offences punishable by section 292 (sale of obscene books), 293 (possession of obscene books), 294 (the singing of obscene songs), 426 (mischief) and 447 (trespass). Now, Honourable Members will see that the question of what is an obscene book or an obscene song cannot be summarily disposed of. Many of the sacred songs which have the sanction of religion may be described as obscene. Many of the statues which we see in the public galleries and museums may be described as obscene. It is not a matter which can be disposed of in a summary fashion. I, therefore, suggest, Sir, that these three offences dealing with obscenity be excluded from the summary jurisdiction of the Courts. I stand on very strong ground when I say that sections 426 and 447 should also be excluded. Now, if Honourable Members will turn to the definition of mischief and to the definition of criminal trespass given in section 425 and section 441, they will find that they are extremely complicated offences, and so far as regards trespass, the lawyers are not agreed as to when civil trespass ends and criminal trespass begins. Honourable Members know that trespass may be of a dual character. It may be a civil trespass or a criminal trespass, and the civil judges have not yet drawn the clear line of demarcation between these two classes of trespass. How can a Magistrate, wielding summary powers, distinguish what the Civil Courts have failed to discriminate? And the same observations apply generally to mischief. I suggest these are extremely difficult cases, cases which require close and careful scrutiny, and that therefore the Magistrate should not be empowered to deal with them summarily. I move my amendment, Sir, which runs as follows:

"In sub-clause (i) of clause 73:

(1) After the words and letter 'in clause (a)' insert the following:

'the figures 292, 293, 294 and 426 shall be omitted' and

(2) Omit the figure '447' where it occurs for the second time."

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In sub-clause (i) of clause 73:

(1) After the words and letter 'in clause (a)' insert the following:

'the figures 292, 293, 294 and 426 shall be omitted' and

(2) Omit the figure '447' where it occurs for the second time."

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I do not know whether you have considered the point which I raised, namely, whether this is not covered by your previous ruling, because it deals with sections which are not touched by the amendment.

Mr. President: Precisely: it is covered by my previous ruling. The Honourable Member is in order in moving his amendment.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I object to the proposal of my Honourable and learned friend on the ground that it means a reduction in the jurisdiction of honorary magistrates. This section, Sir, is the section under which Honorary Magistrates try offences. I think that it is most desirable and I hope that I shall have the support of the House, which I believe includes a number of Honorary Magistrates (Voices: "No, no.") in objecting to any proposal to reduce the jurisdiction of honorary magistrates in this matter. My Honourable friend proposes the deletion of 5 sections from those which can be tried summarily under this section. I would refer the House to section 225 of the Code of 1872. Each of those five sections was included in the provision of that Code which corresponds to the present provision. I have never heard it suggested that honorary magistrates are not capable of trying such cases. There may be in a particular case a difficult question of criminal trespass or mischief, but such cases will not be transferred by the stipendiary magistrates to be tried by the honorary magistrates under this section. My Honourable friend objects to the honorary magistrates trying these offences. I would merely add that if he will refer to all the various amendments to the Village Acts which have recently been made, he will find that such offences are triable by panchayats,—section 294, section 426, section 447 are all triable by panchayats in one Act that I have here, the Bihar and Orissa Village Administration Act. Under these circumstances I oppose the amendment.

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, I support this amendment. The grounds which have been advanced in opposition to this amendment are three. Firstly, "these are cases which are tried by honorary magistrates." I quite concede that there are honorary magistrates and honorary magistrates. Some are really capable and some are not, but the offences being of a highly technical nature and as most important points are involved in them, therefore it is not desirable that the adjudication, upon various crucial points, should be left to the discretion of the honorary magistrates. As for instance, there is a book, a religious book. The case has been sent to the honorary magistrate, and in consequence of not sufficient experience and not having been a trained lawyer he gives a decision which is wrong. Do you know what will be the consequences? It will cause a stir. I think the Government Benches will accept this amendment which commends itself. Section 426 penalizes mischief,—it is extremely difficult to define what is mischief and what is not. Will the Government Benches be in favour of this provision under debate. I should say at once that it will hardly be right. Take the case of section 441. Section 447 is dependent on the definition given in section 441 of the Indian Penal Code which is somewhat difficult. There are such factors and points involved in that very definition that it is difficult to understand and follow the nicety of law in a very short time which the summary trial will allow. I need not go into other grounds of opposition with a view to save time. The suggestion is that summary trial should not be extended to the sections under discussion. I commend this amendment to the Government Benches. I think they will have no objection to the acceptance thereof.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 73 was added to the Bill.

Mr. President: Clause 74. Dr. Gour.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I have an assurance, Sir, from Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith that all these consequential changes* will be considered and made at the conclusion of the debate in this House.

There is no Chief Court in Lower Burma and I take it that it will be taken due note of as a consequential amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: It will not be a consequential amendment in this Bill. The matter is being provided for in another Bill.

Clause 74 was added to the Bill.

Clause 75 was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"That in clause 76, sub-clause (i) after the word and figures 'Chapter XVIII' the words 'and cross-examined by him' be inserted."

Section 288 of the existing Code provides that the evidence of a witness duly taken in the presence of the accused may in the discretion of the presiding judge before whom such witness is produced and examined be treated as evidence in the case. Sir, what I beg to propose is that the mere fact that the statement has been taken down by the committing Magistrate in the presence of the accused should not be deemed to be such evidence as may be admissible in the Sessions Court under section 288 but where the witness has been examined in the presence of the accused and the accused had a chance of cross-examining him or an opportunity of cross-examining him or had cross-examined him in such a case only such a statement may be admissible in the Sessions Court, otherwise not. It may happen, Sir, that in the Sessions Court the witness was cross-examined by the accused while he was not cross-examined in the committing Magistrate's Court and the statement which he had given before the committing Magistrata was not broken down in the cross-examination as

* Amendment No. 229 in List of Amendments:

"To clause 74 add the following:

'and in the same section omit the words 'and includes the Chief Court of Lower Burma'."

[Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri.]

it happened in the Sessions Court. It will be perfectly justifiable for the Sessions Judge to include that evidence of the committing Magistrate's Court into this Sessions Court and to convict the accused on that evidence. I think this is not a good provision and therefore in order to safeguard the interests of the accused it is better that such a statement should be made admissible in the Sessions Court wherein the accused had a right or an opportunity or has cross-examined that witness. Otherwise not. With this view I beg to move the amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I should like to read to the House section 238 as it would stand as amended by Mr. Agnihotri:

"The evidence of a witness duly recorded in the presence of the accused under Chapter XVIII and cross-examined by him may in the discretion of the presiding judge be treated as evidence."

I do not know whether it is the evidence which is to be cross-examined or the accused or Chapter XVIII. The word 'cross-examined' might apply to any of those. The substantive to which the words will not apply is 'witness.' Therefore the drafting of my friend's amendment is really hopeless. I think my friend has also overlooked that this is a provision that enables the evidence taken by the committing Magistrate to be taken as evidence in the Sessions Court only after the witness has been examined and cross-examined in the Sessions Court. That is a sufficient safeguard in this case. It would be entirely unreasonable, as my friend suggests, to lay down that unless the witness was cross-examined in the Magistrate's Court it would be impossible to use his evidence in the Sessions Court. It would enable the defence to obstruct, boycott the prosecution altogether. They would be given an opportunity of cross-examining in the Magistrate's Court, and as a matter of fact, Sir, I understand that it is a very common thing for the defence to reserve their cross-examination till they come to the Sessions Court. In every such case, Sir, it would be impossible to treat that evidence, use that evidence, as evidence in the Sessions Court even though the witness might be a purely formal one, a purely technical one.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Wednesday, the 7th February, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Wednesday, 7th February, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Twelve of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S ASSENT TO BILLS.

Mr. President: I have to acquaint the Assembly that His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to give his assent to the following Act:

The Criminal Tribes (Amendment) Act, 1923.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. President: The Assembly will now proceed to the further consideration of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Court-fees Act, 1870, as passed by the Council of State.

Rao Bahadur P. V. Srinivasa Rao (Guntur cum Nellore: Non-Muhamadan Rural): Sir, as a result of the formal conference we have had and the agreement we have come to, I request your permission for moving, in place of the amendment which stands in my name, another amendment with some modifications. That amendment runs thus:

"That in clause 77, sub-clause (a), before the word 'evidence' the word 'oral' be inserted.

And for the proviso the following be substituted, namely,

'or (c) with the permission of the Court when any document which does not need to be proved is produced by any accused person after he enters on his defence:

Provided that in the case referred to in clause (c) the reply shall, unless the Court otherwise permits, be restricted to comment on the document so produced."

Sir, the principle involved is that the accused should have a right of reply in all cases tried in a Court of Sessions or a High Court. This principle has been recognized by the Lowndes Committee and also by the Joint Committee. This amendment goes a great way in giving the accused a right of reply. I therefore hope that the amendment will commend itself to this House.

Mr. President: The amendment moved is:

"That in clause 77, sub-clause (a) before the word 'evidence' the word 'oral' be inserted."

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): I accept that amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. President: The further amendment moved is :

" And for the proviso the following be substituted, namely,

' or (c) with the permission of the Court when any document which does not need to be proved is produced by any accused person after he enters on his defence :

Provided that in the case referred to in clause (c) the reply shall, unless the Court otherwise permits, be restricted to comment on the document so produced."

Mr. H. Tonkinson: I accept that amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 77, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Clauses 78, 79 and 80 were added to the Bill.

Clause 81 was added to the Bill.

Clauses 82, 83 and 84 were added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions : Non-Muhammadian): Sir, I beg to move :

" That in clause 85, sub-clause (1) omit the figures ' 211 '."

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I understood that my Honourable friend was not going to move the amendment in this form. We are prepared to accept an amendment on the following lines :

" That in clause 85, in the proposed new sub-section (i), after the words ' ten years ' the following be inserted, namely, ' or any offence punishable under section 211 of the Indian Penal Code with imprisonment which may extend to seven years ' ; and further that the figures ' 211 ' be omitted."

The reason for this, Sir, is that under section 211 there are three classes of courts which may try offences

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I accept the amendment suggested by the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson.

Mr. President: The amendment moved is :

" That in clause 85, sub-clause (i) omit the figures ' 211 '."

A further amendment to the amendment moved is :

" That in clause 85, in the proposed new sub-section (1), after the words ' ten years ' the following be inserted, namely, ' or any offence punishable under section 211 of the Indian Penal Code with imprisonment which may extend to seven years ' ; and further, that the figures ' 211 ' be omitted."

The question is :

" That the original amendment be amended by that addition."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, my amendment has been altered slightly. In place of the amendment on the printed sheet, I move:

"That in clause 85, to proposed new sub-section the following be added:

'And shall on application made by the accused furnish him with a copy of such record:

Provided that the accused shall pay for the same unless the Magistrate for some special reasons thinks fit to furnish it free of cost."

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 85, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Clause 86 was added to the Bill.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, in place of the printed amendment, I beg to move the following:

"That in clause 86-A in the proposed new section 339-A, for the words 'to whom a pardon has been tendered', the words 'who has accepted a tender of pardon' be substituted."

The motion was adopted.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, in place of the printed amendment, I beg to move the following:

"That in clause 86-A, for sub-section (2) of the proposed new section 339-A, the following be substituted:

'(2) If the accused does so plead the Court shall record the plea and proceed with the trial, and the jury or the Court, with the aid of the Assessors or the Magistrate as the case may be, shall before judgment is passed in the case find whether or not the accused has complied with the conditions of the pardon, and if it is found that he has so complied the Court shall, notwithstanding anything contained in this Code, pass judgment of acquittal."

The motion was adopted.

Clause 86-A, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Bhai Man Singh (East Punjab: Sikh): I move, Sir:

"That in clause 87 in sub-section (2) of section 340 before the word and figure 'Chapter X' the word and figures 'Chapter VIII' be inserted."

The object of my amendment, Sir, is that any person against whom proceedings are taken under Chapter VIII of this Code may be a good witness who should be examined on oath in those proceedings. As you will see, Chapter VIII, sections 107, 108, 110 and so forth, concern the proceedings for maintaining good behaviour and for keeping the peace, etc. After all, as we have seen, they don't consist of offences themselves but mostly consist of quite other things. The man might be asked not to commit a breach of the peace. The man might be asked to furnish security for giving seditious lectures. Or the man might be bound down because he had sought to be obnoxious, or his speeches might be so dangerous that anybody would pick a quarrel with him and there might be a breach of the peace and so forth. There is absolutely no reason why that person should not have the chance of appearing as soon as the statement is made and giving his own statement on oath as a witness. I hope in these circumstances that my amendment will be accepted.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, it will be obvious to the House that I am in evident sympathy with my friend Bhai Man Singh's amendment when I have given notice of an amendment much wider in terms. The object of the Honourable Mover of this amendment is to allow the person against whom proceedings have been instituted for being of good behaviour or for keeping the peace to give evidence in his own behalf. In England, by a recent Statute, the accused is now empowered to give evidence on his own behalf, and I intended to extend the provisions of the English Statute to certain offences under the Indian Penal Code. However, on maturer consideration I do not propose to move my amendment; but I think there is a great difference between offences under the Indian Penal Code and proceedings under the Code of Criminal Procedure. Honourable Members will find that this Chapter VIII is a part of Part IV of the Code of Criminal Procedure which is headed "Prevention of Offences." Consequently all proceedings under Chapter VIII are of a preventive character. They may be regarded as of a quasi-criminal character, and I think the rule which obtains in England might well be tried in this country by enabling the non-applicant in all cases of security for peace and good behaviour to be able to give evidence on his own behalf. He will not be compelled to do so. It is purely permissive and optional. If he desires to explain a point which has been proved against him by the Prosecution there is no reason why he may not give evidence on his own behalf. He will no doubt be subject to cross-examination. As Honourable Members are aware, all accused under the present law are entitled to make a statement, and as a matter of fact they have to make statements in answer to questions put by the Court, and all that the present Code provides is that such statements shall be considered by the Court. But they have not quite the same value, evidential value, as the sole statement of the accused who has explained away the points that have been proved against him by the prosecution and who has submitted himself to the cross-examination of the prosecuting counsel. I submit that this procedure in England has been successful, and I do not see why in all cases of this character the accused should not be at liberty to give evidence if he is so minded. I therefore support the amendment.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley (Home Member): Sir, I am quite prepared to admit that there is a difference between the action taken under the Indian Penal Code and the action taken under our present section; but I will put it to the House that if we are to embark on a procedure which gives the accused the right of giving evidence on his own behalf we ought to treat the question as a whole. The question is one which has had a long history behind it in England; it has a history of considerable controversy behind it in India also. I need not go into the history of the English case; those who have read the proceedings which led to the passing of the English Act will realise how strong were the differences of opinion on the subject. When it has been discussed in India there have been equally strong differences of opinion. Generally speaking, the Indian Bar, when we previously circulated the matter for opinion, as a whole was against it. Obviously in a country where an accused person cannot always afford to obtain first class advice, he is in a very dangerous position if he is exposed to cross-examination on any statement that he may make in his defence. So far we have admitted the accused to give evidence in his own behalf only in regard to cases arising out of those sections of the Criminal Procedure Code which I may describe as of a semi-civil character—Chapters X, XI, XII, XXXVI, the last of course being that which refers to the maintenance of wives and children, and I think that before we go beyond this distinct category of semi-civil cases and give that right in criminal cases, pure and simple, for there is no doubt that section 110 for instance partakes of that character, we ought to reconsider the question as a whole. It is for that reason that, though I admit there is substance in the points put forward by Bhai Man Singh and Dr. Gour, I think we should be well advised not to follow their proposal, but to leave the whole question over for consideration anew, when public opinion and the Courts have come to some more clearly defined views as to the advisability of admitting the accused to give evidence on his own behalf.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, the Honourable the Home Member admits it is a case needing inquiry. How is this inquiry to be made? You must begin somewhere and make an experiment and see how it works before we can come to a conclusion on a matter of this sort. These proceedings against persons calling upon them to furnish security either for keeping the peace or for good behaviour are evidently fit cases where the persons are in the position of quasi-accused; they are not really accused of offences, but they are suspected as persons likely to commit offences. Therefore in such cases there are very many instances to my mind where this procedure will be very apt. In calling upon persons, especially educated persons to give security for keeping the peace as has been frequently done in the last two or three years when politicians have been called upon to give security for keeping the peace, I think it is but right that they should be allowed to give evidence in their own behalf to explain what they are doing, explain the meaning of words which they have uttered or which they are about to utter. I do not think any risk is run by allowing them to go into the box if they so like. No doubt it is a risk—I quite appreciate it—no doubt ignorant persons who are called upon to give security will run a risk, but I take it we can prevent it by giving discretion to the Magistrate. If the Honourable the Home Member would admit it, I would with your permission add the words “wherever the court so permits” or some such words so as to safeguard it further. Not only it is the option of the accused, but also in order to protect ignorant persons from being harassed by cross-examination I would suggest ‘with the permission of the court.’ That will be an additional safeguard in order to prevent miscarriages of justice. Now, the Code permits a court to put questions to accused persons under trial for explaining circumstances which appear in evidence against them. I know, Sir, that the power is judicially exercised; it has often been of great use in enabling courts to get at the truth of a case. Honourable Members, if they have read the report of the Racial Distinctions Committee, will have noticed Mr. Carey’s minute there. Mr. Carey makes it a point that accused persons where, for instance, they are in distant plantations where the occurrence takes place known only to the accused and the person injured, they ask for a right that the accused should go into the box. Mr. Carey insists on it in his minute, so that it is apparently a privilege valued by Englishmen, a privilege which has been on trial in England for some time and while Dr. Gour is quite right in giving up his amendment and not extending it to all accused persons, yet I think, Sir, we will not be making any very dangerous experiment by allowing it in this case. The law now proposed allows it in certain other chapters of the Code, such as inquiry into urgent cases under sections 144 and 145 and inquiry into maintenance cases—in such cases also the persons against whom proceedings are taken stand in an analogous position as in this case under chapter VIII. Perhaps if there is serious objection to this, then, Sir, why not limit it to cases where a person is called upon to give security for keeping the peace, instead of extending it to persons who are called upon to give security for good behaviour? Probably cases where persons are asked to give security for good behaviour may be said to be more serious cases, because habitual offenders and other cases might come in there. Therefore I think if not the whole of Chapter VIII at least the first portion of it—cases coming under section 107—may be taken; that is persons called upon to give security for keeping the peace under section 107 may be given the option. If the Honourable the Home Member accepts it I will propose it as an amendment—proceedings under section 107 instead of Chapter VIII. I think, Sir, a beginning should be made, and I hope, Sir, the Honourable the Home Member will see his way to accept my suggestion; and I propose, Sir, formally to substitute the words "proceedings under section 107" for the words "Chapter VIII."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: I am quite prepared, Sir, to agree to section 107 being substituted.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The original amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu (Godavari cum Kistna: Non-Muhammadan Rural): I move, Sir:

"That in clause 87, in sub-section (2) of the proposed new section 340, for the words 'if he so desires, be examined' the words 'offer himself' be substituted."

That section runs as follows:

"Any person against whom proceedings are instituted in any such Court under Chapter X, Chapter XI, Chapter XII, or Chapter XXXVI, or under section 552 may, if he so desires, be examined as a witness in such proceedings."

If my amendment is carried out it will read "Any person against whom may offer himself as a witness in such proceedings." I believe, Sir, that this amendment of mine improves the wording of the section, if I may say so without egotism, and I hope the Honourable the Home Member will accept it.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): I agree to this amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

Clause 87, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. Ahmed (Rajshahi Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I move:

"That after clause 87 insert the following clause"

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, before the Honourable Member moves his amendment, I want to ask your ruling as to whether it is within the scope of the Bill. The Honourable Member proposes to amend section 342 which is not in the Bill, and never has been in the Bill.

Mr. President: Does the Honourable Member agree with that statement of fact?

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, it is admitted by all

Mr. President: Order, order. Before the Honourable Member proceeds to discuss the merits of his amendment, I should like an answer to my question.

Mr. K. Ahmed: The answer is in the negative, Sir.

Mr. President: Objection by the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith is upheld.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir:

"In clause 88 sub-clause (i) after the word 'substituted' insert the following:

'and in the table in the said sub-section, the following amendment shall be made.'

After entry relating to 'Criminal Intimidation' add the following entries:

Act caused by making a person believe that he will be an object of divine displeasure.	508	The person against whom the Act was committed."
--	-----	--

Mr. President: I have not been able to follow the Honourable Member. I don't know which portion he proposes to omit.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I want to omit the sub-clauses (a) to (f) and start with (g) only.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"That in clause 88, sub-clause (i) after the word 'substituted' insert the following:

'and in the table in the said sub-section, the following amendment shall be made':

'After entry relating to 'criminal intimidation', add the following entries:

Act caused by making a person believe that he will be an object of divine displeasure.	508	The person against whom the act was committed."
--	-----	--

Is that what the Honourable Member wants?

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Yes, Sir, only that portion.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Then the Honourable Member does not move the rest of his amendment?

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sub-clause (ii) will come in, Sir:

"In this clause in the proposed table in sub-section (2) of section 345, the following amendment be made.

"Insert in their proper places the following entries:

Criminal misappropriation of property.	403	Owner of property which was misappropriated."
--	-----	---

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"In sub-clause (ii) in the proposed table in sub-section (2) of section 345 make the following amendments:

"(b) Insert in their proper places the following entries:

Criminal misappropriation of property.	403	Owner of property which was misappropriated."
--	-----	---

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, we are prepared to accept this amendment if the Honourable Member on his part will accept the substitution of the word "dishonest" for the word "criminal," so that it will read "dishonest misappropriation," instead of "criminal misappropriation." That is the proper description of the offence.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I accept it, Sir.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In the proposed amendment to substitute the word 'dishonest' for the word 'criminal'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

The question is that the amendment, as amended, be adopted.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I now come to the other amendment, namely, criminal breach of trust in respect of property not belonging to the State which is in sub-section (2) (c). This amendment relates to the section of the Penal Code which deals with criminal breach of trust in respect of property. My object in moving for the inclusion of this section under this provision of the Code is that in such cases also the accused and the complainant should be permitted to compound the offence. There may be cases, in which several parties may be aggrieved, the whole public or a number of persons or bodies besides the complainant, be concerned, and in such cases the composition of such offences would be undesirable and objectionable. But this has been safeguarded by putting section 406 in the second sub-section of section 345 which enables the compounding of offences with the permission of the Court only. Were the Court of opinion that permission in such a case should not be given, then it could stop compounding of the offence and there will be no hampering of justice. I would propose therefore that this amendment be accepted. I will just put before the House a case to show how harmful would be the omission of this offence from the list of the compoundable sections sometimes. In one case a lady and her husband's brother were sitting together. Her husband's brother asked the lady for the loan of her wedding ring for a day or two, the request was acceded to by the lady. Thereafter the man went to college and did not return the ring. In the meantime the husband and wife fell out and the wife started proceedings for judicial separation. The brother returned the ring to the husband and declined to return it to the lady, and she in her annoyance filed a complaint against him under section 406 for criminal breach of trust. After the case was filed, the friends and pleaders on both sides thought that the husband and wife should amicably be brought together and reconciled, but this could not be possible unless the case was withdrawn or compounded which was absolutely impossible under the present law. The lady had to take shelter behind a subterfuge that she had no witnesses to offer, and absented herself from the case and the court was kind enough to stop the proceedings. But if the Court had thought otherwise, it could have proceeded with the case and the relations between husband and wife would have been further estranged. Therefore, I submit, that there are also cases in which only individual persons are concerned and in such case there will be great hardship, if we do not insert such a provision but where the accused is one of a bad character, a scoundrel, or has been in the habit of committing breaches of trust, or where there are many persons aggrieved, then certainly he should not get the benefit of this section, and that could be done by vesting the Court with the power to allow the composition of the offence only when it thought desirable.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In the proposed table in sub-section (2) of section 345 make the following amendments:

"(b) Insert in their proper places the following entries:

Criminal breach of trust in respect of property not belonging to the State.	406	Owner of property in respect of which the offence was committed."
---	-----	---

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, I have the misfortune to oppose this amendment. The Honourable Member has given an illustration by no means an apt one, and I think if my Honourable friend assumed in the case which he cited that it was a case in which the accused had committed a criminal breach of trust, he is under a wrong impression. If my friend will only turn to the definition of "Criminal breach of trust" in section 405, he will find that the foundation of the offence lies in dishonesty. There must be a breach of trust and there must be dishonesty. In that case there was no dishonesty.

Now, Sir, cases of breach of trust are of a most serious character, and my friend himself admits in omitting to make the rest of the cases compoundable under sections 408 and 409 that all cases of criminal breach of trust are not fit to be compounded. What reason has he then given for making a case under section 406 compoundable? Honourable Members will find that an offence under section 406 is not bailable and if it is made compoundable it will set a premium on blackmail. A man will complain against a person who is immediately arrested and sent to jail and for the purpose of extricating himself out of jail he will open negotiations with the complainant, pay him the money and get out of the clutches of the law. There is no harm done, so far as the complainant is concerned, because he has compounded with the accused, but let us look at the question from another point of view. I employ a porter at the railway station and ask him to carry my baggage to a carriage standing outside. He walks off with it. That is criminal breach of trust. He comes to me and says he will pay me a certain amount of money and I should let him go. Out of misapplied kindness I let him go. I confirm him as a habitual station thief. He goes about as passengers light from the train, he keeps on committing offences of a similar character, and becomes a licensed thief at the railway station and keeps on swindling people by hundreds, it may be by thousands. Does my Honourable friend think that an offence of such an egregious character should be allowed to be compounded at the instance of the complainant? I give other cases. A person is entrusted with a sum of money. It is his duty to take it to the Bank. Instead of taking it to the Bank, he decamps with it. That is criminal breach of trust. I lay him by the heels. He then asks me to forgive him. I forgive him. He goes again and gets employment with other people and, knowing that the offence is compoundable and he can always purchase his liberty, he keeps on swindling other people. I have been very fortunate in catching him. There may be other people less fortunate and he may decamp with their money. A person who is guilty of such atrocious crimes should, I submit, be not permitted to go free at the instance of a private complainant. He is a danger to society and to the public. Honourable Members will also see that the offence of criminal breach of trust is little, if at all, distinguishable from the general offences of theft and cheating. They all belong to the same genus, and my friend has not suggested—in fact it has never been suggested here—that the offence of cheating or of theft should be compounded. (Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: "It is already provided by the Government.") The offence of theft certainly has not been provided for and if they have provided for the offence of cheating they have done so in spite of our protest. But whatever may be the question, we have to deal with the specific case of criminal breach of trust and I submit that he is not an offender against the individual but an offender against the public justice. He is an offender against society and therefore I submit he should not be permitted to be freed at the instance of the complainant. I therefore oppose this amendment.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras ceded districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhanmadan Rural): Sir, this question of compounding an offence may be stated simply in this form. For instance, in breach of trust, the complicated case is of a clerk or a cashier who is entrusted with money and is found not to account for the sum entrusted to him. Then a prosecution is lodged. Proof of the embezzlement is not always easy when it has occurred over a period of time. Oftentimes, owing to the difficulties of proof, men get off. Sometimes, the prosecution itself, i.e., the complainant finds it is very difficult to pursue the case and he tells the Court: "I am not in a position to prove it." That is one form in which an offence like this is allowed to be dropped. Now, whatever may be the heinousness of it, this is a case between two persons and the proof of the offence is within the knowledge and within the control of the complainant. As the law at present stands, the Court has to depend for the proof of the offence on the complainant and if the complainant does not choose to prosecute the case vigorously, then the case must fail because there is no intervention of the police, there is no intervention of a public officer in the prosecution in such cases. Now, that is the position which I think every businessman will understand. Now, in such a case, if the parties have come to some kind of understanding, that is a restoration has been made or the accounts have been settled or, through the interference of other people, what the complainant does is he goes to Court and tells the Magistrate: "Well, I cannot prove it. No doubt I believe the man is guilty but I have not sufficient proof." The Court cannot take up the case from that point. It is not in a position to pursue the case. Now, in cases where there is this settlement between the complainant and the accused, what happens is that this form, which probably everyone in the Court knows is practically compounding of a non-compoundable offence, is going on. Now, instead of allowing people to do this thing in an indirect and secret fashion, what the amendment suggested by my friend, Mr. Agnihotri, seeks to do is, with the permission of the Court, to allow the parties to compound. Now, I don't see any difference between the two. This one is what happens in practice when it is a case between party and party the other is with the permission of the Court to allow the case to be compounded. And therefore the argument of my friend, Dr. Gour, does not apply. If the prosecution is started by the police or by a third party, that is a public body or the State, then it is a different thing. But all that the amendment seeks to establish is that what is done now secretly and sub rosa should be expressly set down, and that, with the consent of the parties and with the permission of the Court, the case should be dropped. Therefore, there is a great deal to be said in support of the amendment which my friend, Mr. Agnihotri, has moved. ■

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I oppose the amendment very much on the same ground as those already adduced to the House by my friend, Dr. Gour. The real criterion in these cases, in deciding whether an offence should be compoundable or should not, is this: "Is the offence one that affects two persons only? Does it just affect the complainant and the accused or may the effect of the offence go beyond that?" As Dr. Gour suggested, if there is any chance of an offender being a public danger, then in the case of that particular offence there should be no question of composition. I should just like to refer the House to two of the illustrations in the Penal Code under section 405: A is a warehouse-keeper. Z, going on a journey, entrusts his furniture to A. A dishonestly sells the goods. Now, that is a matter between A and Z. But the warehouse-keeper has other goods than Z's. Suppose the warehouse-keeper is able to appropriate the goods for his own use and then, by handing back the value of the goods to Z, is allowed to go scot-free. There is a public danger in that, he may do it again and there is no guarantee that he will not do it a second time. Another illustration, Sir. "A, a revenue officer, is entrusted with public money, which he is required to pay into a treasury . . ."

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Section 406 will not be applicable to that case.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: May I read the illustration from the Code? "A, a revenue officer, is entrusted with public money and he is either directed by the law or bound by a contract . . ."

Dr. Nand Lal: May I point out, Sir, that you are reading the illustrations under section 405 which gives the definition?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Where else am I to get the illustrations but in this section?

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Under section 405 which defines Criminal Breach of Trust, but the illustrations cover cases under sections 407, 408 and 409.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I see that the Honourable Member has doubts about it. The point really is that a person who commits criminal breach of trust is a danger to the public. I think there can be no question about it. It is not just a matter between the man who loses his property and the criminal who takes it, and in such cases I feel perfectly convinced that there should be no chance of composition.

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, I most heartily support this amendment and it is no less than a wonder to me that an able lawyer like Dr. Gour has opposed it. Sir, the complainants, who go to court with their complaint under section 406, as a matter of fact, go to court, in some cases, with a view to extort money from their clients, customers or dealers, and therefore the criminal machinery in those cases is abused. The dispute is of a civil character and that civil character is wrongly and unlawfully twisted into a criminal case. My learned friend, Dr. Gour, says that it affects the community and it will give rise to blackmailing. I cannot understand how it would. Supposing A gives two or three clothes to his washerman to wash, but unfortunately the washerman uses those clothes for himself or his children use them, though eventually he returns them. According to the definition as given in section 405, he will come within the clutches of the law and section 406 will be applicable. I ask Dr. Gour what sort of dishonesty has been committed in that action? According to the definition of dishonesty, which means wrongful loss to one person and wrongful gain to another, there is no dishonesty in this case. And yet, that washerman may be prosecuted and most probably he may be convicted of having committed an offence under section 406, because he has used those clothes against the term of his contract. The provision of section 405, Sir, you will be pleased to see, runs as follows, and section 406 is dependent on section 405 :

"Whoever being in any manner entrusted with property"—the washerman is entrusted with property—"or with any dominion over property"—he has got dominion over property . . . —it cannot be denied—that he converted to his own use that property," because he has used those clothes or he has allowed his children to wear them. Taking the technicality of the law he will be considered guilty. Will Dr. Gour countenance this view that there should be so many criminal cases, and that for ordinary things criminal complaints should be lodged? Therefore, the amendment suggests that, in such cases, the complainant, who is the owner of those clothes, and who unfortunately went to court, should be able to say that he will compound it or compromise it. There is no harm done by his doing so. The community does not suffer at all. I cannot understand in what way the community suffers. This is a kind of contract between the complainant and the accused, that is, between the owner of the clothes and the washerman. Then, Sir, section 405 goes on:

"or dishonestly uses or disposes of that property in violation of any direction of law prescribing the mode in which such trust is to be discharged."

Now, Sir, suppose A has been asked to go to the bazar and purchase a pair of shoes. Well, unfortunately, he uses for his own purpose the money which was given to him. The next day he borrows money from his friend and purchases the pair of shoes as was ordered or desired by his friend or relation or associate. Then, that friend or associate who gave money to him may say "why are you so late?" And he replies "unfortunately I spent the money which you gave me". He will be within the clutches of the law, because he has not acted according to the directions given by the man who had entrusted the property, that is the money, to him.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Read Explanation 1.

Dr. Nand Lal: I have read that. He will be within the clutches of the law.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Read it to the House.

Dr. Nand Lal: He has used that money for himself, so far as the wording of this definition goes. Has he not used it, Sir? Rs. 5 were given to him, as I have already submitted, to purchase a pair of shoes. He did not spend that money in buying shoes but utilised it for his own use. Technically, taking the letter of the law, he comes within the clutches of section 406 and he may be prosecuted and convicted for that. Then my learned friend, Dr. Gour, says, it will give rise to blackmailing. I cannot understand that. Rather it will be a weapon in the hands of those dishonest creditors, those dishonest dealers who will force other people to be dragged to the criminal courts instead of suing them in the civil court. Supposing there is a contract between A and B to make a chair within two days. Unfortunately, he fails to act up to it and therefore he is unable to execute the contract. According to this definition he will be within the clutches of law, because he has not acted in accordance with the terms of the contract. Contracts and engagements should not be considered a subject matter for determination or decision in criminal Courts. That is why the Magistracy are crying that so many civil cases are given the garb of criminal complaints and the Courts are flooded with cases. My learned friend, Dr. Gour, says "Supposing you have entrusted property to a coolie to carry" I may tell him that section 406 will not be applicable to that case. It is section 407 which will apply. If anything is handed over to a carrier, he may carry the thing from Delhi to Lahore or from Delhi town to the Railway station. He will be called a carrier. Further, I may point out to my learned friend that section 406 will not, as I submitted before, apply.

Dr. H. S. Gour: A porter is not a carrier.

Dr. Nand Lal: A porter is not a carrier?

Dr. H. S. Gour: Of course not.

Dr. Nand Lal: What is he then? He is not a repository.

Dr. H. S. Gour: He is a porter.

Dr. Nand Lal: Then, Sir, Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith says, supposing money is entrusted to a revenue officer, then also, I may submit, section 406 is not applicable. That is quite a different offence. If a public servant criminally misappropriates money, he will be tried under a separate section. If a clerk or a servant in a company or office commits criminal misappropriation as such, he will be tried under section 408 or 409, but not under section 406. Section 406 is of a very mild character. It relates to the transactions which we find every day in life. (Dr. H. S. Gour: "It is non-compoundable, and three years imprisonment.") There are a number of offences which are non-compoundable, no doubt about that. The illustrations which have been given from the Government Benches are not of sufficient force, so far as the present debate goes. Therefore, in brief, I submit that this amendment which commends itself should be accepted, unless the Government Benches wish that all civil suits and civil contracts should be given the garb of criminal cases.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): I move that the question be put.

Munshi Iswar Saran (Cities of the United Provinces: Non-Muhammadan Urban): I entirely agree with Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith that you should not allow offences to be compounded with which only the complainant is not concerned but the public at large is concerned. That is a very sound proposition to which I think no objection can be taken. But I am afraid he has not carefully considered the proposition that has been placed before us by Mr. Agnihotri. If you refer to section 407 there you find criminal breach of trust by a carrier. If you refer to section 408 you find criminal breach of trust by a clerk or servant. Again if you go to section 409, you find criminal breach of trust by public servant, or by banker, merchant or agent. The amendment which has been moved by Mr. Agnihotri does not refer to these sections but only refers to section 406. In section 406, then it is obvious that the two persons concerned are the man in respect of whose property a criminal breach of trust has been committed and the man who has committed it. Now, the point is—should the parties be allowed to compound the case? Sir, we find that the clause requires that you can compound it with the permission of the Court. It is not as if these two persons could compound it without giving the Court any chance of deciding whether or not that offence was compoundable. I submit, if there be any objection to it, it is removed by the provision that this case can be compounded only with the permission of the Court and not without it. It is rather difficult for a humble individual like myself to express any opinion with confidence when two distinguished and learned doctors disagree. We find Dr. Nand Lal on the one side haranguing with his usual force. We find Dr. Gour maintaining his position with equal vehemence. He says, if you allow these cases to be compounded, what is to happen? The man gets into the habit of doing the same thing over and over again. If you refer to clause 88 you find one offence, which can be compounded, is marrying again during the lifetime of husband or wife. Apply Dr. Gour's remarks. If you allow a man to compound that offence, then according to the learned doctor, he gets into the habit of repeating that offence.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I wish to point out the grave danger in allowing such cases to be compounded. Take the case of a goldsmith. It is a very common case in almost every village or town. You entrust him with gold or silver for making ornaments and he does work for the public generally, for the village public or the town public. If the man commits a criminal breach of trust and you allow it to be compounded you offer a premium to such dishonest fellows to carry on that trade. Take the case of a tailor. You entrust him with valuable cloth to be converted into clothes. He carries on the trade for the benefit of the public and for his own benefit. If you allow such cases to be compounded, I think you will be running a very grave danger. The safeguard that you do it only with the permission of the Court is an illusory safeguard. The Court is not likely to know of the circumstances or the antecedents of the people. The Court is not omniscient. I think it is allowing too much in the hands of the Court, and the Court has only to dispose of the particular case before it. On the other hand, probably, the Court will be very glad that one case is out of its hands. (A Voice: "No, no.") The Court may say "I am saved the bother of trying this case," or as Mr. Subrahmanayan said, it may be a complicated case requiring investigations. So I think we are running a serious risk in allowing such cases to be compounded.

Mr. President: Clause 88 Amendment moved:

"In the proposed table in sub-section (2) of section 345 insert the following entry:

Criminal breach of trust in respect of property not belonging to the State.	496	Owner of property in respect of which the offence was committed."
---	-----	---

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I move the following amendment:

"In clause 88, subclause (ii) in the table in proposed new sub-section (2) of section 345 omit all the entries relating to the offences of (1) Cheating, (2) Cheating a person whose interest the offender was bound by law or by legal contract to protect, (3) Cheating by personation, (4) Cheating and dishonestly ~~including~~ delivery of property or the making alteration or destruction of a valuable security, and (5) Marrying again during the lifetime of a husband or wife."

These offences which I want to omit are offences punishable under sections 417, 418, 419, 420 and 494 of the Indian Penal Code. These are not compoundable at present under the existing law but they are made compoundable with the permission of the court, in the Bill. My proposal is that they should not be made compoundable even with the permission of the Court. Taking the cases of cheating first, they constitute a very serious batch of offences. No doubt, the persons immediately affected are particular individuals and every offence, in the first instance, is a tort, but it is more than a tort. The crime affects not merely the individual but also society at large. It is an offence against society. Therefore a man who commits the offence offends not only against a particular individual but also against society and society has a right to be protected against criminals. Therefore, to make an offence compoundable really amounts to this. You settle the dispute between the criminal and the person who is immediately affected by the crime but the society at large which is also offended against by the commission of the crime is left unprotected and that is the reason why the more serious offences are not made compoundable, because it is not only the party who is immediately affected by the crime that is involved but also the society at large. There is another aspect of this case. The complainant in these cases may not always be the person who is cheated, because the law does not require that the complaint should be made by the person cheated. Suppose the prosecution is conducted by the police and behind the back of the police the accused goes and compounds the offence with the man who is cheated. The prosecutor may know nothing about it. I think that is a very undesirable state of things. The police prosecute a man for the commission of an offence and the offence is compounded without the knowledge of the police. I think, Sir, that there is a great danger in allowing such offences to be compounded. Again, take the case of bigamy, marrying again during the lifetime of a husband or wife. It is an offence against public morality. I do not think such offences should be allowed to be compounded even with the permission of the court. Some of my friends may say, 'You have got the guarantee of proper discretion being used by the Magistrate in refusing to allow the offence to be compounded.' Well, most of these cases come in the first instance before the Magistrates and during all these days we have been trying our very best to show that the Magistrates cannot be trusted to use their discretion properly. That is the game which we have been playing. We now want to believe that these Magistrates will use their discretion properly. Is it not likely, as has been pointed out by Mr. Rangachariar that there may be some Magistrates who would be anxious to get these cases compounded, so that they may not have any more trouble with these cases? We hear of Civil Judges, District Munsifs and Sub-Judges who bring pressure to bear on the parties to compound their cases, and when a party does not want to come to terms, well, generally he is supposed to labour under a disadvantage to that extent. And so it is not at all unlikely that there may be Magistrates who wish to get rid of their cases, who wish to show a clean sheet at the end of the quarter or at the end of the year, and to show all these cases as disposed of. I for one, Sir, would not trust even a Judge to exercise his discretion in allowing such very serious cases to be compounded. I would not give power even to a Sessions Judge to allow these cases to be compounded. I well remember, Sir, a case of cheating in which no less a person than my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, was a victim. There was a man, Sir, who appeared under a false name and cheated my friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, and not only he but a number of other prominent gentlemen in Madras were cheated by that man. I had the satisfaction of sending that man to jail. Would Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar allow that man to be let loose on society? I think, therefore, in all the circumstances, these offences should not be allowed to be compounded either with or without the permission of the Court.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 88, sub-clause (ii) in the table in proposed new sub-section (2) of section 345 omit all the entries relating to the offences of—(1) Cheating, (2) Cheating a person whose interest the offender was bound by law or by legal contract to protect, (3) Cheating by personation, and (4) Cheating and dishonestly inducing delivery of property or the making alteration or destruction of a valuable security."

The question is that that amendment be made.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I rise to oppose the amendment moved by the Honourable Mr. Pantulu. He has given certain reasons for moving the amendment. One of them is, how would you allow cases prosecuted by the police to be compounded behind their back? If my Honourable friend had taken the trouble of going through the whole of sub-section (2) of this section, he would have found that it is not only those cases which are non-cognizable that have been made compoundable, but there are also other cases which are cognizable and which have been so provided by the Government, and which my Honourable friend has not objected to and has accepted them to remain as compoundable. For instance, sections 324, 325, 327, 328, 343, 346, 347,—all these cases are compoundable and all these cases are cognizable cases. So, may I ask, how can such cases be compounded with the permission of the Court behind the back of the police? The police ceases to have any right in a case the moment they put up the case before the Magistrate. They have taken cognizance, they have brought it to the notice of the Magistrate that the cases are of a nature in which the public is interested and the offences are such in which the State is interested. When the Honourable Mr. Pantulu would authorise a compromise in such cases, why should he not allow a compromise in cases under sections 417, 418, 419 and 420? The second point advanced in support of his argument for his amendment is that they affect many persons and if you were to allow the compounding of such offences with one man, the other persons would have a grievance against the accused. My humble submission is that in such cases leave it to the discretion of the Court: The Court may or may not permit the compounding of the offence.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: You trust the Court now.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Certainly, the Government gives discretion to the Courts and trust them; I may or may not trust the Court at all, but that does not matter. That is another matter, whether I trust the Court or not, but I can at least claim to use that argument against you who had implicit trust in them so long. Sir, if many persons are affected by any offence which has been put up by the police, and if the complainant on whose complaint the police prosecuted that man compounds the offence with the accused, what barrier is there to bring up the accused again, where is the barrier to prevent the Magistrate or Judge from proceeding against that accused and for not granting that permission which is made indispensable under this clause? My Honourable friend has given a case in which some of our Honourable friends were affected. In that case it was a very right thing that such a man was convicted. Supposing one of them was kind-hearted enough to compound that offence, would the police have been debarred from prosecuting the man again? Would any other person or my Honourable friends have been debarred from prosecuting him again for that? Supposing the charge was framed when such a composition would have amounted to an acquittal of the accused; in that case the Court could not have permitted such composition when many persons were concerned, or when the man had cheated many other persons. The cases in this section refer only to cases which are more or less of a technical nature. It is not only that the present Joint Committee accepted this amendment, and brought it into the Code, but even the Lowndes Committee, which consisted of very eminent lawyers and Judges, considered it desirable that these cases should be included in this clause of the section. My Honourable friend has also referred to section 494—so far as morality is concerned, everyone would certainly admit such a contention, but there are customs and customs prevailing in the different parts of the country, and are not uniform in all parts of the country. Take the case of positions of the country which are in a very backward condition where the man, the husband, may be satisfied with coming to the Court . . .

Mr. President: Order, order. That question is not before the House.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: So on these grounds I beg to oppose the amendment moved by my Honourable friend.

Mr. R. A. Spence (Bombay: European): I move that the question be put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"In clause 88, sub-clause (ii) in the table in proposed new sub-section (2) of section 345 omit all the entries relating to the offence of marrying again during the lifetime of a husband or wife."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Fifteen Minutes Past Two of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Fifteen Minutes Past Two of the Clock.

Rao Bahadur P. V. Srinivasa Rao: Sir, with Mr. Agnihotri's permission and on his behalf I move the amendment standing in his name:

"In clause 88 for sub-clause (iv) substitute the following:

(iv) For sub-section (5) the following sub-section shall be substituted, namely:

(v) Notwithstanding anything contained in this Code any case instituted on a complaint, not being one by a public officer as such, may be compounded by the person aggrieved."

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, in rising to oppose this amendment, I think it will be only necessary for me to remind the House of the discussion which took place upon the amendment No. 226 which was moved by my Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri, yesterday. My Honourable friend then proposed that in section 259 the words "and the offence may be lawfully compounded" should be omitted. The effect of that, Sir, would have been that in proceedings instituted upon complaint, if the complainant was absent then the Magistrate would be able to discharge the accused. Now, Sir, in substance the present amendment is exactly on all fours with that amendment. When my Honourable friend moved his amendment I believe he secured the support of himself alone. I hope, Sir, that the present amendment will secure the same measure of support.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I do not move my amendment No. 264, but I move No. 265:

"After clause 88 (v) insert the following sub-clause:

'(vi) to sub-section (7) after the word 'section' the words 'The composition of an offence under sub-section (1) if made out of Court may be allowed to be proved by any other evidence' shall be added'."

Sir, Honourable Members will notice that there are two ways of compounding an offence. The first clause provides for composition by the parties concerned without the intervention of the Court. The Court takes no part in the composition of an offence when it takes place under the first clause. Under the second clause the Court's permission has to be obtained. Now, a composition means, not a mere withdrawal, not a mere non-prosecution, but an agreement come between both parties, i.e., the complainant and the accused. They meet out of Court, come to terms as regards how they are going to compose the difference between them, and that forms the composition. So that, invariably it has to take place outside the Court. The complainant receives money or some other consideration for his agreeing not to prosecute the offender for the offence which he alleges the accused has committed. Now, it some times happens that the complainant after receiving consideration, whether it be in the shape of money or otherwise, wants to back out of it. It happens in civil cases; it happens in criminal cases. In civil cases, as Honourable Members know, compromise or adjustment of a suit can take place outside a Court and the Court is asked to record it under section 373. So also compositions are really allowed under the Criminal Procedure Code, because they are more or less quasi-criminal but partaking of a civil nature. That is why the law allows composition. Therefore there is nothing in the section as it stands to prevent the procedure which I have indicated in my amendment. In fact all the rulings recognise that the procedure which I have indicated in my explanation, or rather in my sub-clause, should be adopted. In a case in XXI Calcutta page 103, it was laid down that it is competent to the Court in which the charge is pending to take evidence as to whether there was in fact a composition outside the Court when one of the parties to it refuses to abide by it when the case comes on afterwards for hearing. That is in XXI Calcutta 103. That was followed in Madras in a case reported in XVIII Madras Law Times, page 602. It was also followed in the Patna High Court in I Patna 21. And I do not find any case to the contrary. In fact, almost every Court has followed that. And after all it is only natural that composition should take place outside the Court because the Court does not sit there as an arbitrator between the parties and say "Now come on, you complainant, you accused, what are your terms, how are you going to settle this business?" Composition then must take place, in the very nature of things, outside the Court. And human nature being what it is, sometimes these agents who are hovering round the criminal courts get hold of the parties, and the peace already effected is disturbed by these agents and they try to induce one party or the other to back out of the compromise already effected. And in such cases one party or the other, often times the complainant, after taking the money outside the court, comes forward and says "Very well, I will still insist on prosecuting the accused person." Honourable Members will agree with me that it is not right to permit him to adopt such a course. There must be some way out of it. In Civil cases there is no difficulty. One party or the other puts in a petition to the Court saying "we have adjusted our differences" and wants the Court to record it, and the Court makes an inquiry and records the adjustment if it is satisfied that it is a lawful adjustment. So also here. As the composition takes place outside the Court, one party or the other will inform the Court that we have adjusted our differences, and the procedure is the Magistrate puts a question to the complainant "Have you adjusted it?" When he admits it, the Magistrate records that the case has been compounded. I only want to make it clear in this section that a composition made outside the Court can be, may be allowed to be, proved by any other evidence—that is, the evidence may be in writing, the evidence may be that of a respectable pleader or a family friend, who might have intervened and effected a compromise. If one party backs out of it, then there will be evidence called. I think it is but right that we should allow this evidence to be given. It is the practice. I am only trying to introduce what is the practice to-day and what has been recognised to be the rightful practice.

The object of these changes which the Government have introduced in their various amendments is to introduce into the Code matters on which there have been judicial decisions; if there have been divergences of opinion the Legislature makes it clear what it intends. If the judicial decisions have made a certain position clear the amendments which have been introduced hitherto are to make it clear what the Legislature intends. So also, I am not here doing violence to existing practice; I am only seeking to introduce into the Code a practice which is recognised to be legal and regular. I therefore move the amendment as it stands in my name.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I rise to oppose the amendment. I think, Sir, that in these cases the position which we must take is that normally unless the complainant or the person who has power to compound the offence appears in Court and admits that he has received compensation, composition should not be permitted. We do not wish, Sir, to increase by any means the number of cases in which Courts have to inquire as to whether a composition has been effected outside the Court. As regards the rulings which my Honourable friend referred to, I notice that the leading case was to the effect that when an accused person alleges that an offence with which he has been charged has been compounded, so as to take away the jurisdiction of the Criminal Court to try it, the onus is on him to show that there was a composition valid in law. Well, Sir, I am not at all clear that if the amendment proposed by my Honourable friend is accepted we shall be in fact giving effect to that ruling. My Honourable friend says that this is the present practice. Well, Sir, if it is the present practice, we would prefer to leave it at that without adding these words to the section.

Mr. Pyari Lal (Meerut Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I oppose this amendment and my reason is this: we would not only be turning a Criminal Court into a Civil Court for the purpose of deciding as to whether a composition has taken place or not, but we would be introducing any amount of delay in the disposal of criminal work. What is after all the object of allowing these offences to be compounded? The object is that the dispute or enmity between the parties which has arisen thereby may for the future be put an end to. But if it has to be proved whether composition has taken place, the same state of things which existed before will continue for ever. So by allowing this amendment, that is, by allowing proof of composition, we will be simply defeating the object of this section. My learned friend, Mr. Rangachariar, says this is the practice usually followed. With all respect for his wide experience and learning I must join issue with him on this point. I have never yet come across a case where a Criminal Court has gone into the evidence as to whether a real composition between the parties has taken place or not. From the mere fact of the section being silent on that point, the Patna High Court or the Madras High Court or the Bombay High Court might have put that interpretation on it. Otherwise to me this state of things, at least as far as my province is concerned—and I am aware of the practice that prevails there—this state of things does not exist; and I therefore think that it will be simply delaying proceedings ad infinitum to allow an amendment of this kind.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I also rise to oppose the amendment, and I wish to supplement what has fallen from my Honourable friend, Mr. Tonkinson, and my Honourable friend who has just spoken. Taking into account the comprehensive character of the amendment proposed, I shall presently proceed to consider its effect. The amendment as it is worded says in its first portion "the composition of an offence under sub-section (1), if made out of court, may be allowed to be proved." What my Honourable friend, the Mover of the amendment, evidently means is that the composition must be such as may be lawfully effected. But as it is, it includes all possible cases of composition, lawful and unlawful.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Under sub-section (1).

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: Quite so. Composition of course is doubtful under sub-section (1). But as the amendment is worded it may be taken to suggest all possible cases of composition, lawfully or unlawfully made.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Under sub-section (1).

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: Quite so. But the words "composition of an offence under sub-section (1)" may be taken to throw some doubt as to whether the amendment proposed contemplates even such compositions as those which although mentioned in sub-section (1) are, however, unlawfully made.

Now, Sir, the question that arises in the case of money-payments, referred to by the Honourable Mover of the amendment, comes to this. In all such cases, it must be supposed that it is the accused who pays the money to the complainant as an inducement for the composition; and it may be taken in some cases, that the complainant is made to accept the sum by hook or by crook. Here the accused cannot be a poor man, but he is able to pay, in order to be out of the scrape, and it may often happen that the complainant is not given any locus penitentia as it were. The matter may have been simply rushed in such case or a trick may have been played upon the complainant. If the composition was a voluntary one brought about without any undue influence being brought to bear upon the situation, why is it that such a composition, it may be asked, could not last for a short space of time? One would find an element of suspicion in that. It might not be a case of denial after deliberate cheating, after all. Therefore, I submit, Sir, that if the inquiry is to be made following a positive direction of the law, and the composition is enjoined to be proved in all cases of denial, in the way suggested, there is no doubt litigation will considerably increase. There is every chance, in such event, of a crop of cases arising, under the circumstances, which will be extremely undesirable to have. Again, where a monied man happens to be the accused and the complainant is poor, the monied man can always be expected to devise means, by the employment of his money or influence, to make the complainant agree, at least temporarily, to a proposal of settlement and in that way the accused can always have a side-issue as to composition raised in course of a trial in a Criminal Court, and have it decided, one way or another. I think, Sir, that is not desirable. The trial of the case itself being protracted in this way will exhaust the complainant and will ultimately defeat the ends of justice. Apart from other points, it must be remembered that the ratio decidendi of a judgment is always surrounded by facts which govern the conclusion arrived at, in every case, and the conclusion if it be detached from and be shorn of the circumstances of the case, and then be put in an abstract form for purposes of general application, a source of danger of error is likely to creep in by the very process itself of generalization from concrete to abstract. I submit that if it is the meaning of the case law on the point that the Court can consider and decide upon any question of disputed composition, upon the interpretation of the law as it now stands, it can always do so, in a proper case. But it is undesirable to have such cases adjudicated upon in a criminal trial as a rider to the criminal case that is before the Court. This will be the result if the amendment in question be made part of the Statute.

As regards the last part of the amendment proposed, namely, the part which says: "If made out of Court may be allowed to be proved by any other evidence," it is difficult to understand what this "other evidence" is. These are verbal matters no doubt, but the amendment, as it is, apart from the question of drafting is open to objection, as I have submitted, on the ground of the principle underlying it. I therefore, Sir, oppose the amendment.

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, only a couple of hours back, I was of opinion that this amendment was of no use and that it was futile, but after my deep study of the whole question I now stand converted. I have given my serious thought to it, and I think that this is a very useful amendment. Now the ground which has been taken in opposition to this amendment is simply this, that it will prolong the proceedings in the Criminal Court, and that the Criminal Court shall have to determine whether there was any composition outside the Court, and if so, whether it is lawful or unlawful. Now, Sir, supposing the argument of the opposition holds good and the composition is not accepted. The case proceeds on, the complaint or the chalan as the case may be is proceeded on with, and then naturally it will take greater time.

But, if the composition is accepted, if it is held by the Court that in reality there was composition and the complainant had backed out on account of some dishonest motive, naturally, Sir, you will agree with me that it will nip the whole proceedings in the bud and time will be saved, and, at the same time, the promise which was held out, the contract which was effected outside the Court between the complainant and the accused will be substantiated and will be held as true. It may happen in a good many cases. There is some sort of valid agreement between the accused and the complainant, Sir, outside the Court, and a clear understanding has been arrived at that, when the complainant appears before the Court, he will make a statement that the case has been compounded, but, on account of some dishonest intervention or on account of the inducement held out to him, he backs out. When he appears before the Magistrate, the accused says: Sir, the case was compounded. The complainant says: No. Then, naturally, Sir, it would be better if evidence be recorded in order to determine whether really there was compromise or not. The case is compoundable. It has been allowed by the new provision that certain offences, in regard to which this amendment is moved, are compoundable. So far as the composition goes, it is lawful. Then the question which is the crucial question of the whole case would be whether that composition has been brought about or not. That point could easily be determined. So, therefore, the ground which has been advanced that there will be delay in the criminal proceedings I may respectfully submit, with due deference, has got no force.

The other point which has been urged by the other speakers on this amendment is this. That, as a matter of fact, it will give rise to a number of points which could naturally arise in a Civil Court and that a Criminal Court should not be called upon to determine those points. In reply to that, my submission is, why not. We have got in any case an analogy. That in civil cases, if the case is compromised and one of the parties says that the compromise was not effected, then there is a clear Statutory law that the Court will take evidence and, if it finds on the ground or on the strength of that evidence that in reality there was a compromise between the parties, then the adjustment of the claim, as it is technically called, will be recorded. So it ought to be in the criminal case which is compoundable. I cannot find in what way it will hamper the work of the Criminal Courts. One of the arguments which was advanced by the Honourable Mr. Mukherjee was that most probably it will give rise to animosity between the parties, that the underlying spirit, which has actuated the Government to incorporate this provision, is that the parties may become friends, and that if the decision is given by the Court again on the same point, then there will be no room for friendship. I say this argument does not hold good. Rather, if this composition is accepted as it has been urged by the accused in the Court before the Magistrate, then there will be friendship again, namely, friendship will be revived. Dishonesty should never be countenanced—we should never set a premium on dishonesty. If the complainant has given an undertaking to the accused outside the Court why should he not be asked to adhere to it? In the interests of honesty, I very strongly support this amendment which will be of great utility both to the Government and to the public.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, Dr. Nand Lal devoted most of his arguments to showing that there would not be any delay or any prolongation of proceedings if this amendment were accepted. But, Sir, for the most part he confined himself to the one case in which the parties come up and the accused is able to prove that there has been a composition and the Court holds that there has been a composition and therefore acquits the accused. He did not explain, Sir, how delay would be avoided or the proceedings would be expedited in the converse case, which would probably be quite 50 per cent. of the cases, in which the accused was not able to prove that there had been a composition. I wish to put it to the House in another way. Should we not, by introducing this new provision into the Code, be supplying the accused with what in effect would be an additional false defence? The accused person sees the case is going against him. He goes into the Court and says: You cannot go on with the case: we have compounded it. The Court asks the complainant if that is so and the complainant denies it. However, we are going to compel the Court to inquire into it and to give the accused an opportunity of proving his statement. Up comes the accused with all his friends and tries to prove that he did pay the complainant Rs. 5 or Rs. 10 and that the complainant agreed to withdraw the case. Sir, there is a very very grave danger of this resulting in further prolongation of proceedings in this respect. You are giving the accused an opportunity of providing himself with an additional defence which I venture to suggest in 90 per cent. of the cases will be a false one.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, with your permission, I wish to move a verbal amendment to the amendment moved by Mr. Rangachariar, namely, to omit the words "by any other evidence." These words are unnecessary and I ask that they should be omitted.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I accept the amendment, Sir.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: I wish to say a few words with regard to the arguments which have been put forward. I am sorry I was not here when the discussion went on, but I have been able to understand enough of the gist of the arguments against this amendment to speak on it. Sir, Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith just now told the House that the acceptance of the amendment would result in the prolongation of criminal proceedings, and that it is the essence of these trials that they should be expedited. Sir, there is an equally important consideration in regard to criminal trials. We should not give room to a person to blackmail or to behave dishonestly. If a complainant and an accused compose their difference outside the court and if as a result the complainant receives some money but he does not want to report it to the court, what is the position of the accused? The complainant, after receiving money on the understanding that he would not press the prosecution, would persist on prosecuting. Does it not encourage him to blackmail? Does it not encourage him to behave dishonestly? And is it in the interests of justice that we should give room for such a state of affairs? If a man after having agreed to abandon the prosecution and after having received consideration for the abandonment, still goes on pressing the prosecution, in the hope that he may be able to induce the poor accused to pay more money, is it in the interests of justice that he should be encouraged to do so? Sir, I understand it was said that this is unnecessary because there have been some decisions upon the matter. If I understand the position aright, I believe the Lowndes Committee were trying to introduce amendments into the Code with a view to embodying decisions of courts. No doubt there are two decisions of two courts. The matter had to go to the High Court and two High Courts accepted the principle underlying the amendment. Some lower court in other provinces may take it into its head not to follow the decision of the two High Courts. Is it in the interests of justice that we should embody in the section language which would make it unnecessary to parties to resort to the higher court? I think having regard to the two decisions and having regard to the object of the Lowndes Committee, it is desirable to make the position clear, so that there may be no doubt in the minds of the Magistrates who have to try these cases. Under these circumstances, I think this amendment ought to be accepted. Having regard also to the analogy of civil courts, where, if a composition is entered into outside the court, the court allows proof to be given of such composition, I think that we should provide a similar remedy in criminal cases if only to prevent persons behaving dishonestly and blackmailing others.

Mr. P. E. Percival (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, I rise to oppose the amendment. I wish to support the statement of my friend Mr. Pyari Lal, as I have never come across a case in which an accused person has come to Court and has said that he has compounded the case, although the complainant is not there or denies having compounded the case.

I have never known a case in which the Courts have approved of the compounding of a case in such circumstances, and I do not think they would do so. I find in a Bombay case that:

"When the parties to an offence compoundable without permission of Court produce before the Court a writing signed by them: the Court is bound to act upon it and is not at liberty to call upon the parties to adduce further evidence that the case has been compounded."

This is a decision in favour of the accused. If the accused produces a document signed by both parties, or approved of by both parties, saying that the case has been compounded, the Court does not go behind that. It is not right on the one hand that the accused should be allowed to come forward and say that the case has been compounded, and at the same time that the complainant should not be allowed to come forward and say that the case has not been compounded. The fact is there is no analogy between the civil procedure and the criminal procedure in connection with these proceedings. You cannot expect the Court to go into inquiries entirely outside the criminal proceedings, and say, "I shall inquire into the question whether A paid B Rs. 10 or Rs. 15, or whether they came to an agreement at all." Besides this the Court does not go into the question whether a proper or full amount has been paid for compounding the case or not. All that it considers is that the complainant says in Court "I have compounded the case;" and the Court need not trouble any more about the matter. For these reasons, I suggest there is no reason to make the amendment proposed.

Mr. President: Amendment moved to the original amendment:

"To omit the words 'by any other evidence'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: Original amendment moved:

"To insert the following sub-clause at the end of clause 88:

'(vi) to sub-section (7) after the word 'section' the words 'The composition of an offence under sub-section (1) if made out of Court may be allowed to be proved by any other evidence' shall be added'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 88, as amended, clauses 89, 90, 91, 92 and 92A were added to the Bill.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I move:

"In clause 93, in the proposed new sub-section (2-A) of section 356, after the word 'and' insert the words 'or cause it to be taken down in that language in his presence and hearing and under his personal direction and superintendence.'"

I move this amendment to meet the case of a Magistrate or Judge who does not know the languages in which the evidence is given. In such cases, it will be necessary for the Magistrate or Judge to have the statement recorded in the language in which the evidence is given. I trust the amendment will commend itself to the House.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: I accept that amendment.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I move:

"In clause 93 for the words 'following sub-section' substitute the words 'following sub-sections' and at the end of the clause insert the following, namely:

'(2-B) In trials before the High Court the evidence of each witness shall be recorded under the direction of the presiding Judge.'

Sir, it is desirable that the presiding Judge should see that the evidence is recorded. Otherwise, it is very, very difficult for the Court of revision or a higher Court, for instance, a Full Bench, to come to a decision and see whether a case has been made out or whether it is a fit case for the Full Bench to interfere with the decision of the Lower Court. In the absence of that, it is very very difficult for any Judge or any court of law to decide a case because the particulars of that case are not before the court.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I think it will save the time of the House if I am allowed to make one brief remark. I think my Honourable friend has overlooked section 365 of the Code. That section, as amended by the present Bill, lays down that every High Court shall make rules prescribing the manner in which evidence is to be taken and will also lay down that the evidence shall be taken down in accordance with those rules. I think, Sir, that will surely meet the point of my Honourable friend.

Mr. K. Ahmed: That argument is only for amendment No. 277, to clause 96, on the top of page 38 . . .

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I move that the question be now put.

Mr. President: The question is that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 93, as amended, do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I move:

"In clause 94 (iii) for the words from 'it shall not be necessary' to the word 'charge' the words 'the Magistrate shall record the evidence briefly' be substituted."

Honourable Members will see that in section 362 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, item No. 4, I want the words put in, namely, "the Magistrate shall record the evidence briefly." May I read the section with your permission? "In cases other than those specified in sub-section (1) it shall not be necessary for a Presidency Magistrate to record the evidence or frame a charge." My amendment is that the Magistrate shall record the evidence briefly. This House has got the representatives of the people and they will see the difficulty. The matter is entirely at the discretion of the Magistrate to take down the evidence if he likes or not to take it down if it does not suit him. He could convict a man then and there on the substance of the evidence he may have taken down and the higher court cannot decide a case properly as it has no other evidence except that material on which the man has been convicted. It is the rule of nature, Sir, and no doubt any Magistrate convicting a man must apply that theory and if that theory is applied, then you can appreciate the position of the unlucky accused who is tried and convicted on that portion only of the evidence, the evidence the important part of which has been missed. My amendment is a very important one suggested by able grey-haired lawyers and experienced men of the world and that you must not give discretion to the Magistrate to make note of a portion of the evidence only because it is not safe at all (in this country). Unless you get this down, unless the Magistrate takes it down, records it, word for word, and if the Magistrate records it only briefly, if the more important parts are not taken down, it is for the Revisional Court to see those most important parts, and if these important parts are missed, the poor man is wrongly convicted, and therefore it is for the higher Courts to see that justice is done to him, and under the circumstances, Sir, it is the duty of the Revisional Court under section 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, or probably under section 15 of the Charter Act or under the Government of India Act, 1907 and so on, we should make the High Court, revisional side, satisfy itself as to the correctness or propriety of the order. Sir, if there are provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code that appeals should be heard, and cases should be revised, and in the hearing, under those sections, Sir, if the full material is not placed before the Court, is there any purpose which will be served by simply getting a Bill, which has been passed by the Council of State, passed here, if the important portions are missed in the Bill. I ask that this House will see its way, I ask each and every Honourable Member of this House to consider the point, that whether it is a sound theory, a sound principle of law, that it must provide sufficiently that if a man is going to be tried, he must be tried properly. Possibly the Government Member in charge will find that it will be a miscarriage of justice if a Magistrate is given that discretion, if the law does not provide for the safety and protection of the people in the administration of justice, a fair and impartial trial should be held according to the soundest principle of law, that the offence adduced against the accused by the prosecution should be taken down, and it is for the revisional Court to see whether this man has been convicted according to law, rightly or wrongly, properly or improperly. If that is so, Sir, I do not find any difficulty for my Honourable friend to accept it, because that will certainly make the law more reasonable than it is by leaving it to the discretion of the Magistrate, to the sweet will of the Magistrate, and that he should only take down the substance of it and not the real part of the evidence upon which this man is convicted: and it is no use getting a number of Judges, getting a number of appeals and revisions, when you have not got the materials before them, and therefore, you are really doing injustice, because you are supposed to provide everything and all for those higher Courts to revise the cases under revision, but they have not the full material before them, and still you come and say, 'here is your appellate Court, the Judge says that your conviction is right or that your conviction is wrong'—but you have not given that opportunity of a fair trial that was expected. I suppose, Sir, it will be wanting,—in the Bill, it will affect the administration of justice in this country as far as the Criminal Procedure Code is concerned. I ask, Sir, most humbly that the Government will find themselves able to accept it, because, Sir, there is not so much difficulty in it. I would not saddle, Sir, the Government Bench with important rulings of the High Courts, but, Sir, it is commonsense. But, Sir, it is a commonsense that if the Government of this country convict a man of an offence and the taking down of the evidence is left to the discretion of the Magistrate, then if the man goes in appeal to the High Court and to the Privy Council, and they will say, "We are sorry; the learned Magistrate did not take down the real essence of the evidence, the important words that you rely on for the defence of this man." Is that, Sir, a sound principle, leaving so much discretion and liberty with the Magistrate? I leave it entirely, Sir. I move the amendment.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I do not intend to go into the merits of the motion that Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed has put forward, and for a simple reason. The law regulating the procedure of our Presidency Magistrate has remained unaltered for many years, but it has come under a good deal of criticism. There are many who have expressed the view that the procedure now applicable to Presidency Magistrates is not suitable in view of the present composition of the Presidency Magistrate's Courts and their modern developments. We have been invited at different times to go into the whole of this question; and for myself I think that it would be better if we had an opportunity of investigating it as a whole, and consulting both Local Governments and the High Courts concerned, before we proceed to make any change at all in the law regulating procedure. If changes in procedure are required, they would come better as the result of such an investigation into the whole question, and I would deprecate making small modifications at present in the procedure applicable to the Courts. For this reason, Sir, I hope Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed will see his way to withdrawing the amendment before the House.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I beg to withdraw the amendment.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Clauses 94, 94-A and 95 were added to the Bill.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I suppose, Sir, that this amendment is not included in the promise given by the Honourable the Home Member in which he is going to bring these matters into conformity with the laws. This refers not to Presidency Magistrates' Courts but to a Court called the Honourable the High Court. Sir, I move:

"After sub-clause (ii) of clause 96, insert the following sub-clause:

'(ii) (a) To the proviso to sub-section (5) the following shall be added, namely:

'In trials before the High Court the heads of the charge shall be recorded under the direction of the presiding judge and shall be signed by him.'

Members will kindly see that if a case (called a Sessions case) is tried by the Quarter Sessions of the Honourable High Court of Calcutta, Sir, that case is tried like this: 9 jurors sit to try that case, and then the case is put before the gentlemen of the jury and the case is made out by the Public Prosecutor. It is heard no doubt at great length, but the difficulty that we come across when we go against the order of the learned Judge, against sometimes the verdict of the gentlemen of the jury, and file an appeal before the Full Bench composed of sometimes five of the learned Judges of the High Court or three of them at least if not more. Then, Sir, the learned Judges who preside over the Session no doubt hear our appeal, but they generally find it very difficult to follow the case, because the evidence is not before them, because the most important portions of the documents are not before them, the heads of the charges are not even signed by the learned Judge, nor recorded at all by him, and the result is that many of them are censured, and even the Advocate General is censured, because the Advocate General has given his sanction or fiat which can only apply to that sort of trial. We approach the Advocate General for the sake of getting this fiat, and we move the full Bench with this result. In a case reported in XXIII Calcutta Weekly Notes at page 426 (my Honourable friend, Mr. Chaudhuri, is the proprietor of this Report), five learned Judges of the Honourable High Court in 1919 comprising the Chief Justice, Sir Lancelot Sanderson, Sir John Woodroffe, Sir John Chitty, Mr. Justice Fletcher and Mr. Justice Teunon, made the following remarks. I shall read an extract of the actual words that fell on that occasion from the mouth of the Honourable Chief Justice we have got at present. The learned Chief Justice says:

"Before I conclude my judgment I desire to refer again to the fact that there were no notes of the learned Judges summing up taken by the learned jury and Counsel for the prosecution. In my judgment it is most desirable that in these cases, specially in an important case like this, the learned Counsel for the Prosecution should take a note of the summing up of the learned Judge. It is impossible for the learned Judge himself in his summing up to take a note. What has happened in this case is an instance of how desirable it is that these notes should be given. It may be that if in this case adequate and reasonable notes of the learned Judge's summing up had been taken a great deal of time and expense might have been saved. At all events, I hope that in future regard will be had to what has been said, and that proper notes of the learned Judge's summing up will be taken."

Now, Sir, it is not a Court or Bench where we get a certified copy of the order that you are moving there against the order of another Court or a Judge or a Magistrate or certified copies of deposition that you had applied for and have taken from and enclosed in a memorandum of appeal or have got a certified copy to show to the Full Bench that this is the evidence adduced in the case against you. Nothing of the kind. I hope the majority of the Honourable Members will understand and that this is an extraordinary kind of trial that you have in Calcutta where you do not get a copy of the evidence upon which a man is sent to jail. This is a procedure by which the Court will not take down under what section you are charged, the offence you are charged with and of which you are convicted for so many years. It is a curious part of the law, as the learned Chief Justice has found—as I read out just now. I hope that we will also see, Sir, that this extraordinary procedure should no longer be allowed to continue. Six years have gone when the matter was under contemplation since 1916 and to-day, Sir, in 1923 on the 7th of February we shall have something which is reasonable and which is a sound provision of law; it is high time that we should not be tried under any law which is wrong and in which there is no sound principle laid down. Here we have the assistance of lawyers from all parts of the country and the benefit of all these opinions, and here are amendments brought forward by the representatives of the people, and I ask, Sir, that this amendment, which I shall repeat again, should be accepted, viz., that in trials before the High Court the heads of the charge shall be recorded under the direction of the presiding Judge and shall be signed by him. Thereby we shall be able to get a signed copy and we shall get copies of the deposition and we shall get thereby what Honourable Members will see, is obtained in other parts of the country. Justice is nearer perhaps in the rural districts than in the town of Calcutta. In that place everything can be had, we have got a High Court and a number of Judges; but justice is not accessible to us. I hope this is the high time—when the Government Bench will probably accept my amendment. I therefore move my amendment and hope it will be accepted.

[Mr. K. Ahmed.]

The motion was negatived.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, it has been suggested to me that this amendment* will be coming up under section 497. So, I do not move it now.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We shall be glad to discuss it then.

Clause 96 was added to the Bill.

Mr. President: Clause 97. The amendment† standing in the name of Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed is beyond the scope of this clause.

Clauses 97 and 98 were added to the Bill.

* "In clause 95 (iii) for the words 'following sub-section' substitute the words 'following sub-sections' and at the end after the word 'judgment' insert the following:

'(7) Nothing in this section or section 366 shall be deemed to prevent the Court from setting the accused at liberty after the conclusion of the trial and before the judgment of acquittal is pronounced'."

† "After clause 97 insert the following clause:

'97-A. In sub-section (1) of section 371 of the said Code after the word 'judgment' the words 'of the trial and appellate courts' shall be inserted'."

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, the amendment I propose :

"In clause 99, in proposed section 386 (1) (b), omit the words 'or immoveable' and the words 'or both'."

raises a very important question of law. Honourable Members will see that under the existing Code of Criminal Procedure, section 386, fine is only recoverable by distress and sale of moveable property. Under the amendment proposed by Government it is intended to extend the recovery of a fine by sale of both moveable and immoveable property. Now Honourable Members will find that the object of levying fines is not to supplement the State revenues but to punish the offender. Consequently, fine must be levied not with reference to the property which the accused possesses but with reference to the gravity of the offence and due regard being had to the fact that the fine would act as a deterrent sentence. The law up to now has worked, so far as I can see, satisfactorily. I do not know why the Government now wish to take the power of recovering fine both from moveable and immoveable property. Honourable Members will see that recently the Government introduced a measure abolishing the sentence of forfeiture of property as a substantive punishment. Under the Indian Penal Code the forfeiture of property could be ordered only in a very few cases. Offences against the State, like waging war against the King, and extreme cases of murder and a few other cases of that character. When the amendment of the Indian Penal Code was before this House, I pointed out that the punishment by way of forfeiture of property had been abolished in England. It had a peculiar history. Honourable Members will remember, I pointed out that in the feudal law a person who had committed high treason was regarded as having corrupted his blood and that in consequence all property in England which was held in fee simple, or as a tenant from the Crown, he was held no longer entitled to hold. But the law of property in this country is quite different. The subject in England is at best a tenant. The ownership vests in the Crown and consequently he has a peculiar relation to the Crown. In India, the right of absolute ownership has been conferred upon the people of this country, and therefore, the owner of immoveable property is under no peculiar obligations as he is in England. But, even as it is, in England the sentence of forfeiture as a substantive punishment has been abolished and it has been abolished now in this country. It was suggested in the Select Committee on the Indian Penal Code abolishing the sentence of forfeiture, that the abolition of forfeiture as a substantive sentence might be sanctioned if fine could be levied both from moveable and immoveable property, and I presume that this amendment is the outcome of that recommendation. But Honourable Members will not accept this amendment because it has been recommended by any Select Committee. They will examine and consider it upon its own merits. Now, let me turn to a very short question that arises in this connection. Take, for instance, the case of a Hindu joint family and assume a case that one member of that joint family has been sentenced to pay a certain fine. Honourable Members know that a member of a coparcenary has no specific property of his own. He has a certain interest in the joint immoveable property. As a matter of fact, if the family is joint and undivided, he is not likely to have any moveable property of his own. In a case like this what will be the procedure? The procedure would be to attach and sell his share, because that would be regarded as immoveable property, and consequently the courts would hold that it is liable to seizure and sale. Now, if this is the view of the law, it will make an inroad upon an ancient and well-established doctrine which the courts in this country and the Privy Council have enunciated for the last hundred years. Let me refresh the memory of the Honourable Members in this connection. The existing law on this subject is this. Leaving out of account the High Courts of Bombay, Madras, Central Provinces and Berar where a coparcener can alienate his undivided share for valuable consideration, take the case of those who follow the orthodox Mitakshara law—the High Courts of Bihar, United Provinces, part of Bengal and the Punjab. What is the position there? An individual member has merely an interest in immoveable property. He cannot predicate that any portion of the joint property belongs to him. That property cannot be sold as such. If there is a decree, if the member sells that property and makes an express representation and the alienee takes it without notice then the High Courts lay down that equity comes into force in favour of the alienee which gives him certain rights, namely, to ask the court that in a partition, the specific share of the estate sold to the alienee may be allotted to his alienor which may be ultimately transferred to the alienee and he may obtain a declaration of his right as an alienee, and if a partition takes place, he can then enforce that equity. I do not wish to take this House through the extremely complicated question of law which surrounds the Courts in this connection. I will rest content with saying that in the case of an undivided Mitakshara coparcener, no alienation of immoveable property can take place. But if the coparcener has the misfortune to be convicted of an offence and to be fined, the Code now provides for the sale of his immoveable property. That must of necessity lead to a forced partition or it must of necessity lead to the sale of right, title and interest of the delinquent, in which case his share will be sold for a mere song and in which case the rights of his sons and grandsons will be destroyed, though the Mitakshara lays down that every son and grandson has, upon his birth, a vested interest in coparcenary property. I can picture to the Honourable Members far more complicated cases than I have given by way of illustration. I have no doubt my Honourable friend, Munshi Iswar Saran, who has practised and is practising in the Allahabad High Court, will be able to enlighten you upon the numerous difficulties which this clause, if passed into law, will give rise to. I therefore submit that this clause should not be inserted, because it is vicious in principle, it is unprecedented, it did not exist in the previous Codes of Criminal Procedure, and no case has been made out why a departure should be made from the existing law, because the burden is on the Government to show if there have been any cases, in which fines levied by the Court have not been recovered. Lastly, I submit it would lead to the imposition of fines which would be out of all proportion to the nature and gravity of the offence committed. If it is the intention of the Treasury Benches to make a bargain with this part of the House by suggesting that because Government will lose some money as the punishment of forfeiture has been punished it must be now compensated by being empowered to recover fines out of immoveable property, then I have no doubt, Sir, that Honourable Members here will prefer the lesser evil of forfeiture to the greater evil of having fines recovered out of immoveable property. (Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: "Has that been suggested?") That evil affected an infinitesimally small number of people. It was a practice which was almost abolished and the abolition of forfeiture has merely followed the existing practice which obtained in this country where they did not order forfeiture because they considered the sentence as obsolete. I therefore dismiss that question out of consideration.

The question that because forfeiture was abolished this sentence has been allowed in substitution therefor is wide of the mark. Let us, therefore, examine the question upon its own individual merits. What is there to suggest, what is there to reinforce the arguments of the Government that fines must henceforth be levied both out of moveable and immoveable property? I ask Honourable Members to reflect. I have not given here cases of wives and children. Take the case of Muhammadans. Take the case of even Christians. The fact that the father commits an offence and his property is all sold, will deprive his wife, his children and other dependants of the only means of livelihood. Members must also remember how tenaciously the people in this country cling to their ancestral soil. Let them remember there is land to lose, not because of any wrong they have committed but because some members of the family may go astray and may be convicted and fined and thereupon the whole property may be brought to the hammer. Let them also remember that joint family property may be disrupted. The whole property may be sold for a song. If the intention of the Legislature is, as indeed it must be, of selling the right title and interest of the offender, there are weighty practical considerations which stand in the way of this amendment and I hope Members will pause and reflect upon the great injury that they will do to themselves and to the public at large by voting against this amendment. Sir, I move my amendment.

Mr. President: Mr. Tonkinson.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: This is a rather important question. May I move that the discussion be taken up later?

Mr. President: I was assuming that this was an important question on which Honourable Members might wish to speak, but nobody rose except Mr. Tonkinson. We had better take up the discussion on the next day on which this Bill is set down.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Thursday, the 8th February, 1923

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Thursday, 8th February, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock.
Mr. President was in the Chair.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

INDIANS IN RAILWAY COMPARTMENTS RESERVED FOR EUROPEANS.

334. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: With reference to the reply given by Mr. Hindley to my starred question No. 141, during this Session, will the Government be pleased to obtain the informations from different railways on the subject and place them on the table?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The Railway Board believe that in practice no objection is offered to Indians who have adopted European dress travelling in compartments reserved for Europeans on the different railways. Government do not propose to call for further information on this point from Railway Administrations at present.

RAISINA CHUMMERIES.

335. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: With reference to reply given by Sir Sydney Crookshank to my question No. 137, during this Session, will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a copy of the circular, if any, issued inviting the non-orthodox Indian clerks to occupy the bachelors' chummeries already built at Raisina?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: No such circular has been issued for the bachelor chummeries or for any other quarters in Raisina. The Government quarters in Delhi have now been classed as "orthodox" and "unorthodox," and may be applied for as such by Europeans and Indians alike.

UNSTARRED QUESTION AND ANSWER.

SAFEGUARDING OF TITLES OF NAWAB, RAJA, ETC.

153. Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: What safeguard if any is provided in India for protection of the position, prestige, dignity and paraphernalia of persons created or recognised as Rajas, Nawabs, etc., whether as personal distinction or hereditary, in the past or in future corresponding to the Peers in England with irreducible minimum income or ancient nobility of India with impartible estates?

Mr. Denys Bray: Government safeguard the higher titles of Nawab, Raja, etc., by ensuring that recommendations for such titles are only made in the case of persons of considerable position in their own provinces and possessed of sufficient landed property to enable them to support the title. The Honourable Member is perhaps unaware that in certain provinces steps have been taken to provide for the descent of jagirs by primogeniture and for the descent of estates to a single heir. He appears also to be under a misapprehension as regards the practice in respect of peerages in England.

THE CODE OF CIVIL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I beg leave to move that Sir Campbell Rhodes be nominated to serve on the Select Committee to consider and report on the Bill further to amend the Code of Civil Procedure. Honourable Members will remember that on the last occasion I moved for the appointment of a Select Committee to amend certain sections of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that that Committee consisted of the Honourable the Law Member and certain other Members of this House. The Honourable the Law Member has ceased to be a Member of this Assembly, and it is necessary to obtain one of the panel of Chairmen in his place. I therefore move that Sir Campbell Rhodes be appointed a Member of this Committee.

Mr. President: I presume the Honourable Member from Bengal consents to his name appearing in this motion.

Sir Campbell Rhodes (Bengal: European): Yes, Sir.

Mr. President: The question is that Sir Campbell Rhodes be nominated to serve on the Select Committee on the Bill further to amend the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908.

The motion was adopted.

THE MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I beg to present the Report of the Select Committee on the Bill to amend the Married Women's Property Act. The Report contains one or two changes which the Select Committee has made. The first is to omit Buddhists from the operation of the amending Bill on the ground that there are very few Buddhists in India, and secondly, the Local Government of Burma propose to introduce legislation to amend the Married Women's Property Act, if necessary, in their local Legislative Council. The second change introduced by the Select Committee is with reference to the original proposal to give retrospective effect to this Bill. The Select Committee thinks that it would be a hardship to give retrospective effect in the matter of insurance policies already effected. These are the only two principal changes. I beg to present the Report to the House.

RESOLUTION RE STATE MANAGEMENT OF RAILWAYS IN INDIA.

Mr. President: The Assembly will now resume consideration of the Resolution moved by Maulvi Miyan Asjad-ul-lah on the 7th September, 1922, in the Simla Session, in the following terms:

"That this Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that the Indian Railways Act of 1890 be so revised as to give India the full benefit of State ownership of Indian Railways as is done in other countries where the Railways are owned and managed by the State."

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member): Sir, before the House proceeds to the business of the day, I have a statement to make which I fear may cause a considerable disappointment.

This House last September agreed at my request that the debate on this Resolution should be postponed in order that the Government might have time to formulate their views on the question, what form of management should be adopted on the expiry of the existing contracts with the East Indian and Great Indian Peninsula Railways. The Government of India have formulated their views, though perhaps they might have formulated them earlier. I am afraid that the delay is due to my fault and I can only plead that during the last two months I have been rather heavily pre-occupied with work. Our views were wired Home to the Secretary of State at once, but in the time allowed to him the Secretary of State has not yet been able to form his conclusions. Our latest advice received only last night is that he will require another eight or ten days. The position therefore is that if Mr. Samarth's amendment comes on for discussion it will be quite impossible for me to explain our view as to the right solution of this important question. It seems to me therefore that the debate will be an unsatisfactory one, for if it does come on the Government will be unable to take any effective part in it. If therefore Mr. Samarth's amendment does come on, I shall be compelled to move for an adjournment of the debate on that amendment. I have thought it right, Sir, to give the very earliest possible notice of the position. I may say that if the debate on the amendment is adjourned the Honourable the Leader of the House undertakes to give a Government day for the adjourned debate before the end of this month and before the debate on the separation of the Budgets. I quite recognize, Sir, that this statement of mine may cause justifiable disappointment to this House and I can only express on behalf of the Government of India and myself our very great regret. I think it only fair to say that we did not give the Secretary of State very much time for consideration of what is after all a very important question, and for that also the Government of India in general and myself in particular must accept responsibility.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, the Honourable the Commerce Member is right in saying that there will be a feeling of disappointment in the House owing to the suggestion made by him. The Secretary of State has had ample time since the Ackworth Committee's report was presented to make up his mind upon this matter, and it is to be regretted that he should not have come to a conclusion upon this important matter earlier. The country has been agitated upon this question for a considerable time and it is not desirable that the decision should be put off any longer. However, Sir, having regard to the statement made by the Honourable the Commerce Member I do not think that my friends in this part of the House would object to the adjournment which he seeks, but on the understanding that before the end of February there must be a Government day on which this matter could be fully discussed. On that condition, Sir, we agree to the adjournment.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhiary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I regretfully subscribe to the sentiments to which expression has just been given. If anything, it illustrates the difficulty of our position; but we must recognize it. Mr. Innes has our complete sympathy in the troublous times that he has had. He has done admirable work and it is not his fault but his misfortune that he was not able to cope with the question earlier. We do feel, Sir, that it would be serving no useful purpose to have only a partial debate. Those of my friends whom I have been able to consult, agree with me that it would be an advantage to let the whole question stand over till the end of the month, when we may be able to get all the materials that Government might think fit to place before us. I myself had an intuition that this debate was not coming on to-day and I am glad to be confirmed in my intuition.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I have no doubt everybody will sympathise with Mr. Innes's misfortunes, but I should like to know if the Honourable Member had instructions from the Secretary of State on the substantive motion which was moved during the September Session of this House and upon which surely the Government must have received instructions from the Secretary of State regarding the attitude they should adopt. The Honourable the Member for Commerce and Industry could not be unaware of the fact that that is a wide and sweeping Resolution and that both Mr. Samarth's and my own amendments are merely specific recommendations not confined to the general question but limited to the future management of the two Indian Railways. In discussing these specific questions raised by Mr. Samarth and myself, I have no doubt the Government of India must have adverted to them in connection with the general Resolution which was under discussion during the Simla Session and the postponed discussion of which is set down on the agenda paper to-day.

Another question I should like to address to the Honourable Member for Commerce and Industry is, when did he send up his recommendations to the Secretary of State? (Cries of "No, no.") It may be that delay in sending up these recommendations long after

Mr. President: I think it my duty to warn the Honourable Member that if he continues on this line he will forfeit his right of speech on the main Resolution on the adjourned occasion.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I am only asking, Sir, for information to guide me as to the action the Government of India will take in future not only in connection with this Resolution of Mr. Asjad-ul-lah, but with reference to my own amendment to that Resolution. It is for that purpose, Sir, that I should like some further information upon the subjects I have adverted to.

Mr. N. M. Samarth (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, without making any of those remarks or endorsing them which have fallen from Dr. Gour, I fully recognize the difficulty under which the Honourable Mr. Innes labours at the present moment. Dr. Gour along with myself is a member of the Central Advisory Committee on Railways

Mr. President: I must issue the same warning. There is no motion for the postponement of this debate before the House and therefore I must warn Honourable Members that they will exhaust their right to take part in the main debate on this Resolution if they continue to deliver speeches on the question which is not yet before the House, namely, the question that the debate be now adjourned.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: That is the question upon which I am addressing the House.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member has not moved that motion.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley (Home Member): As I am not afraid of exhausting any right of speech on this subject, perhaps you will permit me now, taking what I think is the obvious sense of the House, to move formally that this debate be adjourned.

I would only wish to add, in reply to an observation which fell from Dr. Gour that we have received no specific instructions—that was I think the word he used—from the Secretary of State on the general question raised in the debate of September last. I may also perhaps be permitted to add that I and my colleagues feel that though Mr. Innes has very handsomely taken on his own shoulders the blame, if I may use the word, for the disappointment which has been caused to the House, we all feel that we must share that amply and fully with him. The fact is, that for some months the Government of India has been working at very high pressure on a large number of questions of great importance; and it was for that reason and that reason alone, not from any desire to delay this important question, that we were forced into postponing our recommendations to the Secretary of State on the question of State versus Company management. We have as a matter of fact—I feel it also due to the Secretary of State to say this—allowed very little time indeed for consideration of a question which, I need not say, does vitally concern him also. That is, I think, enough to say on this particular question. If my motion is carried, it will, I hope, meet with the sense of the House if we proceed to business which is by this time somewhat familiar to the House, I mean the Criminal Procedure Code.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

“ That the further consideration of the Resolution be adjourned.”

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, the question, in connection with the State management of railways, is of the greatest and most vital importance, and I think sufficient time was not given to the Secretary of State. I share the view which has been put forward by the Honourable Mr. Innes and the Honourable Mover of this motion for adjournment; and I, therefore, am in favour of it and support it.

Mr. President: The question is that the further consideration of the Resolution be adjourned.

The motion was adopted.

STATEMENT OF BUSINESS.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley (Home Member): It will perhaps be convenient to the House if I give some indication of the future course of business beginning with to-day. We have found it useful to meet with Members of the Assembly who have proposed various amendments and discuss with them some of these amendments in advance. This has led to great expedition in debate and I would ask you, if you would give us to-day, before we resume the formal consideration of this Bill, some further time to go through these amendments. I would suggest that if we could continue this process amongst ourselves this morning the House might meet somewhat early this afternoon and continue the formal discussion of the measure.

[Sir Malcolm Hailey.]

With regard to future business, there will be no meeting of the Assembly to-morrow. The list of business for Saturday will be in the hands of Honourable Members in the course of the day. The Malabar Completion of Trials Bill, the Paper Currency Consolidation Bill and the Indian Stamp Amendment Bill will be introduced and the Indian Factories Amendment Bill will be taken into consideration and passed if the Assembly agrees. After that we shall take Mr. Hullah's two Resolutions on Emigration. On Monday, the 12th of February, we propose to continue the consideration of the Code of Criminal Procedure. On Tuesday, the 13th, we propose further to consider the Code of Criminal Procedure, and I hope to finish it. That will, I am sure, be a source of regret to the whole of the Assembly. To me it will be a source of additional regret, as I am beginning to learn a good deal about the Code of Criminal Procedure. After that on Tuesday we shall take up the Official Secrets Bill which has of course passed through the stage of Select Committee. Wednesday is a public holiday. Thursday, the 15th, is a non-official day for Bills. On Friday and Saturday we propose to take up the Fiscal Commission's recommendations (beginning on Friday and continuing on Saturday), and if time is left on Saturday to continue the discussion on Mr. Yamin Khan's Resolution regarding the Indianization of the Army which would otherwise come up on the 22nd. On Monday, the 19th, we propose to put before the House the Racial Distinctions Bill. I may explain, that I have had many conversations with my friends here regarding the proper way in which this Bill should be put to the House; I found that some Honourable Members were in favour of putting it for a Select Committee; others thought that it should come before the whole House. Of course I cannot anticipate the decision of the House when I finally bring the matter up; but, for my own part, I have decided to put before the House on the 19th instant a motion that the Bill be taken into consideration. On Tuesday, the 20th of February, we have a non-official day for Bills. On Wednesday the 21st, we propose to continue the discussion of the Racial Distinctions Bill. Thursday, the 22nd, is a non-official day for Resolutions. On Friday, the 23rd, or Saturday, the 24th—we have not yet decided on which of these two days it is more suitable to sit—we shall continue, and I hope to conclude, the consideration of the Racial Distinctions Bill. On Monday, the 26th of February, we have put down the Indian Penal Code Amendment Bill, known as the White Slave Traffic Bill, for consideration. That, I hope, will not take us long, and it will then be possible to proceed with the consideration of the Resolution which we have postponed to-day and to continue that on the 28th, if necessary, leaving time before the end of the month for the consideration of the further matter in which the House is interested, namely, the separation of the Railway and the ordinary Budget.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban):

With your permission, Sir, may I ask the Honourable the Leader of the House if he is in a position to give information as to what Resolution will be taken on the recommendations of the Fiscal Commission? Will it be one of those non-official Resolutions of which notices have been given by myself and by my Honourable friend, Mr. Manmohandas Ramji?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I have consulted my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, on the subject and he proposes to take up the discussion on a Resolution put forward by Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas running as follows :

" This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that a policy of protection be adopted as the one best suited to the interests of India, its application being regulated from time to time by such discrimination as may be considered necessary by the Government of India with the consent and approval of the Indian Legislature."

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: With your permission, Sir, I should like to hear further on the question. This is only the first of a series of Resolutions that I have given in on the recommendations of the Fiscal Commission. Will not all of them be taken up or will the question be discussed piecemeal? I thought all might be taken up together as was done in the case of the Esher Committee's report.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Mr. Jamnadas, Sir, must not, I think, take up too much the attitude of Oliver Twist. We are doing our best for him by putting forward his own particular Resolution, and we think that this itself, as a matter of fact, will open up the whole question for discussion.

Mr. President: In order to meet the proposal made by the Home Member, I propose to adjourn the House now and meet again at 15 minutes past 2 this afternoon.

The Assembly then adjourned till Fifteen Minutes Past Two of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Fifteen Minutes Past Two of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

THE INDIAN PENAL CODE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): I beg to present the Report of the Select Committee on the Bill to amend the Indian Penal Code in order to give effect to certain articles of the International Convention for the suppression of the white slave traffic.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. President: The House will now resume further consideration of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Court-fees Act, 1870, as passed by the Council of State. The amendment under consideration is that moved by Dr. Gour:

" That in clause 99, in proposed section 386 (1) (b) omit the words ' or immoveable ' and the words ' or both '."

Mr. H. Tonkinson: (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, when my Honourable and learned friend moved this amendment in his well-known stentorian tones he referred to the proposal in the Bill as vicious and unpredicented. I regret, Sir, that I was unable to get down any more of the adjectives which he used, but I propose to show that the provisions in the Bill are essential and that they are not accompanied by any possibility of abuse. I want in the first place to refer to the position in England. I suppose, Sir, that all Honourable Members will agree that if I can show that exactly corresponding provisions exist in the English criminal law after all the efforts which have been made by the legislators of the Victorian era and later, then there can be no possibility of these provisions being abuses or that they are unprecedented as suggested by my Honourable and learned friend. Rather, Sir, I would suggest that if such provisions do prevail in England then that is a reason why we should introduce such provisions in India. Well, Sir, as regards the position in England: at common law a fine was rarely if ever imposed on a conviction for treason or felony; fines were imposed on a conviction for misdemeanour, and except for provisions in Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights there was no general restriction upon the maximum amount of fine. For felony the provisions usually resorted to were the provisions relating to forfeiture. It is interesting to observe that as my Honourable friend in his speech when moving his amendment yesterday referred to the history of the abolition of the forfeiture provisions in the Indian Penal Code, so the corresponding history in England is also relevant to this point. I should like to read to the Assembly section 4 of the English Act by which the forfeiture provisions were abolished in England. Section 4 runs:

"It shall be lawful for any such court as aforesaid, if it shall think fit, upon the application of any person aggrieved, and immediately after the conviction of any person for felony to award any sum of money not exceeding one hundred pounds, by way of satisfaction or compensation for any loss of property suffered by the applicant through or by means of the said felony, and the amount awarded for such satisfaction or compensation shall be deemed to be a judgment-debt, due to the person entitled to receive the same from the person so convicted, and the order for payment of such amount may be enforced in such and the same manner as in the case of any costs ordered by the Court to be paid under the last preceding section of this Act."

That last preceding section, Sir, was repealed by the Costs in Criminal Cases Act, to which I will refer later, but I will invite the attention of the House to the words "judgment debt" in that provision. Honourable Members may suggest that these are provisions relating to fines imposed with the object of awarding compensation to the persons aggrieved, but, Sir, in this matter we are in an exactly similar position in India. When serious crimes are committed, it is surely reasonable, and I think many Magistrates do as a matter of course follow that procedure, if they have any reason to think that the fine will be recovered, to impose a fine with the idea of compensating the person who has suffered under the provisions of section 545. Now, Sir, how are these costs recovered in England? They are recovered, under the provisions of sub-section (5) of section 6 of the Costs in Criminal Cases Act, 1908. That sub-section runs as follows:

"Any order under this section may be enforced, as to any costs primarily paid out of local funds, by the council of the country or borough out of the funds of which they have been so paid, and, as to any other costs, by the person to whom the costs are ordered to be paid, in the same manner as an order for the payment of costs made by the High Court in civil proceedings, or as a civil debt in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, and, in the case of costs which a person convicted is ordered to pay, out of any money taken on his apprehension from the person convicted, so far as the Court so directs."

Honourable Members will see that that contains a very similar provision to the proposal in the Bill. We are dealing up to the present with fines inflicted with the object of paying compensation to the person who has suffered from the misdeeds. I will turn now, Sir, to the cases of fines imposed with the idea that the proceeds will go to the Crown. I will merely read a part of a writ of fieri facias for a fine which may be issued in such a case :

" Edward the Seventh, by the Grace of God, etc., to the Sheriff of..., greeting :

We command you that of the goods and chattels, lands and tenements of A. B., you cause to be levied — pounds, imposed upon him in the King's Bench Division of our High Court of Justice before him for his fine..."

That, Sir, is a much more stringent provision than anything that has been put into this Bill.

Well, let us turn now to the position in India. I would like first to refer to the history as regards the abolition of sentences of forfeiture under the Indian Penal Code. It will be remembered that Government made proposals for a limited abolition of such sentences. Well, the Bill in that case, Sir, was referred to a Select Committee of this Assembly. I should like to read the recommendation contained in the Report of the Select Committee. They said :

" We consider that it is better to proceed against the property of an offender under these sections by the imposition of a fine rather than by forfeiture. At present the law does not provide for this, as section 386 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, does not permit of fines being levied on immoveable property. We, therefore, recommend that fines imposed as a result of a conviction under sections 121, 121A or 122 of the Indian Penal Code shall be recoverable from the immoveable property of the offender if they cannot be recovered from the moveable property, and that this be provided for in the Bill for the comprehensive amendment of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, which is at present under consideration."

I admit, Sir, that that is only a limited recommendation. But, Sir, amongst the signatories to that recommendation was the Honourable Member who moved the amendment. When he was moving the amendment yesterday, he said, that provisions as regards forfeiture only applied in a few exceptional cases. It is better to have those back rather than to be able to recover the fine from immoveable property. But he recommended in an exactly contrary sense when he signed this Report of the Select Committee, and in addition, it is not really true to say that the provisions as regards forfeiture only applied in a few exceptional cases. They applied, Sir, to all those cases which come within the purview of section 62 of the Indian Penal Code which we then repealed, that is, to all cases of persons transported or sentenced to imprisonment for a term of seven years or upwards.

Now, let us turn to the merits of the proposal. Why, Sir, if a man has invested his income in jewellery or other moveable property, should that property be subject to attachment for a sentence of fine when, if he had invested his income in a house, that house would not be so liable to be proceeded against on a warrant for the attachment of property in execution of a fine. There is no reason whatsoever why there should be this difference. My Honourable friend, Sir, suggested that there was no reason for believing that the present provision had been ineffective in any way. That, I submit, is a statement made under an entire misapprehension of the existing difficulties. Any person who has had any experience as a Magistrate will know the difficulty—the enormous difficulty—in recovering a fine under the present provisions, and they will know that some further provision is essential. This was realised in the Bill of 1914. Sir George Lowndes' Committee decided that some provisions were required, but they introduced a large number of safeguards and said in these cases a Civil Court ought to take action. Those are practically, Sir, the provisions in the Bill. In this connection perhaps I should now refer to the red-herring of the Hindu joint family to which my Honourable friend referred. Let us see what are the proposed provisions of section 386.

" Under sub-section (3):

" Where the Courts issue a warrant to the Collector under sub-section (1), clause (b), such warrant shall be deemed to be a decree, and the Collector to be the decree-holder, within the meaning of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, and the nearest Civil Court, by which any decree for a like amount could be executed shall, for the purposes of the said Code, be deemed to be the Court which passed the decree, and all the provisions of that Code as to the execution of decrees shall apply accordingly."

Well, Sir, as regards the Hindu joint family, we have introduced all the precautions contained in the Civil Procedure Code. There is absolutely nothing at all in the danger to the property of the members of a joint Hindu family which was suggested by my Honourable friend. I would like, Sir, just to recapitulate my arguments very briefly. The proposal in the Bill was found to be necessary and was embodied in the Bill of 1914. It was continued in the Bill of Sir George Lowndes' Committee and they introduced provisions so as to secure that all questions as to title should be determined by a Civil Court. That is the present form of the proposal. There is no fear as to the property of a Hindu joint family as it is secured exactly to the same extent as it is secured in the case of the execution of a decree under the Civil Procedure Code. The rules regarding exemption from attachment in section 60 of the Code of Civil Procedure apply also to the execution of such a fine. There are similar provisions in the English law. A Select Committee of this Assembly definitely recommended that we should make such a provision although their recommendation was, I admit, only as regards a few sections. But, Sir, those few sections do not cover the whole scope of the old forfeiture provisions in the Indian Penal Code. Under these circumstances, Sir, I hope that my Honourable friend will not press his amendment.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, my first impression on hearing Dr. Gour was to support him. But on further reflection I find there is really no substance in the amendment proposed by my Honourable friend. I was under the impression that the new section proposed a new liability on immoveable property which did not exist already. If that is the idea under which this amendment was moved, then I find it is a mistaken impression. Under section 70 of the Indian Penal Code all the property of the person against whom a sentence of fine has been imposed is liable for the payment of that fine. It does not make a distinction between moveable property and immoveable property. In fact, the liability lasts for a period of six years and even the death of the offender does not discharge from the liability any property which would after his death be legally liable for his debts. So that, a mere amendment of the procedure section will not remove the substantive law which is enacted in section 70 of the Penal Code. The only difference which is sought to be made by the proposed amendment by Government is this. Hitherto there was no process by which this liability could be enforced under the Criminal Procedure Code. Probably—I must speak with caution on this matter—the Crown would have to file a suit and get a decree in order to enforce this liability on immoveable property. As regards moveable property, under the Criminal Procedure Code as it was, it could be seized and sold. That was the procedure hitherto applied. As regards the liability of the immoveable property, the Crown would have to figure as plaintiff in a suit and get a decree and then get the decree executed, under the ordinary process of a Civil Court. No doubt, that would lead to delay and if that would save the property from attachment, if that procedure would in any way benefit the accused, I can understand our standing up for omission of this proposed new section. I do not see what defence the accused is going to have when he is put up as a defendant in the Civil Court when the Crown sues him for a fine lawfully imposed by a Court under the law. So it would be a mere formality altogether. The Crown is bound to get a decree. After all, the Crown will have to pay the stamp duty and the defendant will have to engage a pleader and the decree would be a matter of course. I could not understand what defence he could have when such a suit is instituted. So that it will be a meaningless procedure for the man to adopt, it is a purposeless procedure for the accused. After all, the procedure prescribed is only to enforce this liability of treating this order for fine as a decree as it were of a Civil Court and the Civil Court proceeds to execute the decree by attaching and selling the immoveable property of the defaulter. There is a great deal of force in the argument which Mr. Tonkinson has given to-day. Why should persons who invest their savings in moveable property be any more liable than persons who invest their savings in immoveable property? For instance, a business man who believes in stocks and shares may invest his savings in shares and stocks which can be easily seized and sold for non-payment of fine, whereas the other man who invests his savings in immoveable property would escape this liability. It seems to be a meaningless distinction, an unnecessary distinction. After all, it is a debt. He has to pay the debt and his property will be liable for that debt, and this only indicates the procedure for enforcement of the payment of that debt, and I do not know anything harsh in the procedure proposed. The Civil Court will still have power to enquire into any claims with reference to immoveable property. No doubt, it is a complicated procedure. Hitherto the Code of Criminal Procedure did not contemplate such a procedure on account of the attachment, claim sections and further other proceedings which arise out of those claim proceedings. But all those things have to be gone through in case this man has no moveable property from which the fine could be recovered. I wish the Government amendment had provided as in the English Act that if the fine could not be recovered from the moveable property then only the immoveable property should be proceeded against. I mean, if it had been left like that, there would be no objection, that is to say, if the words "issue a warrant to the Collector of the District authorising him to realise the amount by execution according to civil process against the moveable or immoveable property, or both, of the defaulter," could be slightly modified in this way, "against the moveable, and on failure to recover the same, thereout the immoveable property of the defaulter." As it is, the option is left to the Magistrate to proceed either against the moveable property or against the immoveable property or both. Immoveable property should be the last resort. It is only in case the fine could not be recovered from the moveable property of the accused person, then only the immoveable property should be resorted to. If some such amendment could be made, then perhaps the amendment of the Government would not be open to objection. I merely throw it out as a suggestion. I am sorry I have not given notice of that, but I hope the Government would bring their amendment in conformity with the English procedure which my Honourable friend, Mr. Tonkinson, referred to just now. I therefore see no substance in the amendment proposed by Dr. Gour.

Mr. H. E. Holme (United Provinces: Nominated Official): With due respect to the opinion of the Honourable and learned Mover of the amendment I am bound to say that my own experience at any rate suggests that the present system of realising fines in criminal trials does not work in a satisfactory manner at all. The realisation of such fines even from wealthy offenders is often a most tedious and most difficult process. Many such offenders seem to make it a point of honour not to pay their fines, if they can evade doing so in any possible manner. They are often able to conceal or remove their moveable property or to make it over to their friends or relatives or to persuade the agency deputed to realise the fine to make a false report that no such property is forthcoming. So much so that personally I have had practically to give up the imposing of fines as being a useless waste of public time and money. I have hardly ever taken over charge of a judgeship without having to write off a large amount on account of irrecoverable fines imposed by my predecessors and I understand that the same is the case in Magistrates' courts. This state of things would be entirely altered by the simple expedient of making immoveable property also liable for the payment of fines. I cannot see any reason whatever why criminal fines should not be a source of legitimate revenue to the State. On the contrary, it seems to me eminently desirable that criminals should not only make some compensation to the State for the expense caused by their misbehaviour but should assist in relieving the burden of taxation which so heavily presses on law-abiding citizens. A money-lender who may perhaps be extortionate and grasping is allowed to realise his demands by the sale of the immoveable property of a person whose only crime may be his improvidence, and I fail to see why the State should not realise fines imposed by criminal courts as some inadequate compensation for the misdeeds of criminals. I accordingly oppose this amendment.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I am not one of those, who are opposed to the realisation of fines from immoveable property, but there are certain features in the proposed amendment which to my mind demand careful consideration of this House and of the Treasury Benches specially. I quite see that an offender should not escape payment of fine by investing his money in immoveable property but at the same time the difficulties which were pointed out by my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, are not entirely obviated by considerations such as those which were referred to by the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson in explaining the situation. What I mean to say is this. Has the Government amendment provided for the exclusion of all moveable properties which are not liable to attachment under the Code of Criminal Procedure, but which may have been attached in execution of a decree for the realisation of fine? To my mind, Sir, there are certain difficulties in the Government proposal for amendment and the difficulty lies in clause (2). The Local Government may make rules regulating the manner in which warrants under sub-section (1), clause (a) are to be executed and for the summary determination of any claims made by any person other than the offender in respect of any property attached in execution of such warrants.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: May I explain, Sir, that my Honourable friend seems to be under a misapprehension. Clause (a) relates only to moveable property and it has nothing to do with the amendment under discussion.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: Yes, of course, strictly speaking, I am not correct. I should have put my reference to this point, last of all. But as regards the words 'other than the offender,' the House will notice that there are, under the Civil Procedure Code, certain moveable properties which are not liable to attachment, and if those words are to be retained in the clause certain moveable properties belonging to the offender as judgment-debtor—a list of such properties is given in section 60 of the Code of Civil Procedure which are not liable to attachment and sale—will be sold. Is it intended that articles such as implements of husbandry, and other means of subsistence of an agriculturist, are to be attached and sold under the Criminal Procedure Code? If the man was simply fined, is it proper that he should be turned into a criminal by being deprived of all his means of livelihood by the sale of such articles of primary necessity? I would ask the Honourable Members on the Treasury Benches to consider whether the words 'other than the offender' should remain where they are or should be dropped. These words go to exclude all objections that may be preferred by the judgment-debtor himself on the ground that the property attached is not liable to attachment and sale, when he does so as the man on whom the fine has been imposed.

Then as regards immoveable property, there can be no doubt that provision has been made in the clause in question by which the nearest Civil Court, by which any decree for the amount of the fine could be executed, shall be in a position to realize the fine by executing the suit as a decree, and such court shall be deemed to be the Court which passed the decree, and all the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure as to execution of decrees shall apply. So, my submission on this matter is not so very pointed as that of my learned friend, the Mover of the amendment. I think all the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code relating to the execution of decrees have been made applicable to cases where immoveable property has been attached for the realization of fine. The judgment-debtor under section 47 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in case of a joint property, or any co-parcener in such property under some other appropriate section of that Code can come forward and say that such property is not liable to attachment, on the ground that according to the law prevalent in any part of India, joint property or any interest in such property is not liable to attachment. From that point of view my submission is that the learned Mover of the amendment would not be justified in pressing it. But there is that other aspect of the question to be considered to which I have invited the attention of the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson.

Mr. Pyari Lal (Meerut Division: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, I agree with the Honourable Dr. Gour that the introduction of this new provision, that a man's immoveable property is also liable to attachment, is not a proper one. It would lead to endless complications, considering the state of society in this country. Things in England may be different, but here we are living under a society where the joint family system prevails, where among Muhammadans the system of dower prevails, where, when a criminal Court would impose a fine, in nine cases out of ten it would naturally follow that the matter would have to be taken to the Civil Court to decide as to whether there are any other owners of the property which is sought to be attached. The Criminal Court is not competent to go into the question, the matter will have to be gone into by the Civil Court. When the Civil Court considers that point, there will be any number of hearings, and the case will drag on its slow length and it will be very inconvenient, and in every district the work of the Criminal Courts and of the Civil Courts on this account will be very greatly increased.

[Mr. Pyari Lal.]

Every criminal file will be kept alive till the fine is realized and the case relating to the fine is decided. You will require a special Civil Court to always try such cases. It will of course represent a gain for the legal practitioners working on behalf of Government and those retained by the accused; but the ends of justice will not be very much furthered. The learned gentleman who spoke last said that these fines might be a source of revenue to Government. I am sorry, Sir, to say that the idea of making the imposition of fines a source of Government revenue is peculiar to himself. I do not think this Government or any other civilized Government can take such a suggestion seriously. It is within my experience that the imposition of fines is not a real punishment to the accused but it is so to the members of his family. This punishment is not visited on him but on his wife and children and those immediately dependent on him. I have known cases where after a man has been fined, his wife has been divested of all her ornaments, jewellery and cooking utensils and the poor little homestead that she occupied. What happens is that you inflict any amount of misery on these persons. There may be in cities persons, of whom Mr. Rangachariar spoke, who possess stocks and shares and inmoveable property. But in the district a poor man owns perhaps a share in a single little house in a village, in which not only he but his brothers and children and all his collaterals live. If the Government attaches and sells his share of the house what will it amount to? Only a fraction of the house is his and by selling it Government practically gains nothing and the whole family is disturbed by the introduction of a stranger into it, namely, the purchaser of the share. In fact I think that it is a mistake to impose fines in a criminal case; because no sooner is a fine imposed in a criminal case the police pounce upon the house of the accused and cause any amount of inconvenience and trouble and harassment to the inmates of the house. The result is that not only that man but the whole neighbourhood suffers. Then again, if the Civil Court goes into the question there are always any number of claimants, his brothers and collaterals and, in the case of Muhammadans, the whole thing may be charged with the dower debt of his wife. To decide such a question will not be an easy thing.

With these observations, Sir, I support the amendment moved by my Honourable friend.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): Sir, in case the House should have been misled by any remarks from my friend, Mr. Mukherjee, I would merely emphasise what Mr. Tonkinson pointed out when he interrupted my friend, namely, that so far as clause (a) of the Bill is concerned, which deals with the attachment of moveable property, we are making no change whatever in the law, nor indeed has Dr. Gour's amendment anything whatever to do with it. As regards clause (b)—immoveable property—Mr. Mukherjee himself pointed out that the Bill lays down that all the provisions of the Code as to the execution of decrees shall apply. Therefore, if the Code exempts any property from sale and attachment in execution of a Civil Court decree, that same property will not be attachable or saleable in execution of a warrant for the levy of a fine. Sir, Mr. Pyari Lal has revived what I thought was a very dead red-herring, viz., that complications will be dragged in in connection with the Hindu undivided joint family. Mr. Tonkinson's arguments on that point were, I think, quite conclusive.

We are introducing nothing new. The Code of Civil Procedure has to deal with these matters in exactly the same way as it will in its application for the levy of fines under the Code of Criminal Procedure. Mr. Pyari Lal thought it a most improper thing that Government should make any revenue out of the imposition of fines. Sir, I do not know whether Mr. Pyari Lal is a Municipal Commissioner in Meerut, but very probably he is. But whether he is or he is not, he is probably aware that all Municipalities make a very large income out of fines imposed in their Municipalities. He has even suggested that we should go so far as to abolish fines altogether—a most iniquitous form of punishment. He has not suggested what we should substitute for it. The only substitute of course is imprisonment; that is the next minor punishment. Sir, if he is not prepared to go as far as that, the only solution of the difficulty so far as I can see is that we should first make a start by abolishing crime.

Mr. B. N. Mishra: (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I am sorry I have to differ from the learned Dr. Gour as regards his amendment that attachment of immoveable property should be omitted. Sir, the object of the Criminal Procedure Code will be frustrated if immoveable property is not reached in order to realise fines. (Dr. H. S. Gour: "What is the present law?") Of course, immoveable property is reached now. A man may cheat me Rs. 10,000, may commit breach of trust of Rs. 20,000 and invest it in immoveable property, and then the law will have no hand to touch such property. If that be the sense of this Honourable House, I think, then, Dr. Gour's amendment may prevail, but I do not think that any Honourable Member of this House will consent to such criminal robbing of a man and investing money in immoveable property so that the Court cannot attach the same. I submit, Sir, that generally in India, as Mr. Pyari Lal has said, people possess more immoveable property and only in a few cases have got enough of moveable property. In case immoveable property is absolutely excluded from the scope of the criminal courts, really it will be difficult to realise any fine. In some cases landlords rather feel it much beneath their dignity to go to jail; they would sometimes court a sentence of fine. I think they consider it to be a lenient sentence if they are let off with a fine. In such a case if they cannot pay money, the only course left to the Court is to realise the fine by attaching immoveable property. Sir, it has been said that there will be complications in the case of members of joint Mitakshara family. No doubt there may be difficulties but that will not justify the abolition altogether of the attachment of immoveable property. I think that would strictly speaking come under the amendment which I have proposed as an explanation and I think Honourable Members would do well to support my amendment, that is, to attach only the interest of the offender or of the criminal. Sir, I think it has been already supported by Honourable Members and the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson has already explained fully the position. I oppose the amendment of Dr. Gour.

3 P.M.

(An Honourable Member: "I move that the question be now put.")

The motion was adopted.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, may I move an amendment with regard to what my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has suggested with regard to this clause if I am in order? The practice has always been to . . .

Mr. President: Order, order.

Rai Sahib Lakshmi Narayan Lal (Bihar and Orissa: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, the amendment that I am going to move is:

"That in clause 99 in the proviso to proposed section 386 (1) (b) for the words 'undergone the whole of such imprisonment' substitute the following: 'been sent to prison'."

Clause 99 runs as follows:

"For section 386 of the said Code, the following section shall be substituted, namely:

'386 (1) Whenever an offender has been sentenced to pay a fine, the Court passing the sentence may take action for the recovery of the fine in either or both of the following ways,'

Mr. President: I think it is unnecessary to read the whole section.

Rai Sahib Lakshmi Narayan Lal: Sir, in the proviso it is said that:

"If the sentence directs that in default of payment of the fine the offender shall be imprisoned, and if such offender has undergone the whole of such imprisonment in default, no court shall issue such warrant unless for special reasons to be recorded in writing it considers it necessary to do so."

The present law is that even if the man who has been sent to imprisonment in lieu of fine, has undergone the whole period of imprisonment which he was ordered to undergo, he is not exonerated from his liability to pay the fine. This is very hard, and in many cases it may mean double punishment. There are many to whom an imprisonment in lieu of fine even for a day or even for a few hours means degradation for life in some shape or other, and this degradation is caused from the fact of the imprisonment itself apart from the period for which he underwent imprisonment. The effect of my amendment is that no sooner a man is sent to prison in lieu of fine, he is exonerated from his liability to pay the fine. This change is not likely to create any difficulty in the administration of justice, if steps are taken for the realisation of the fine from the moveable and immoveable properties before the man is sent to prison, especially when new provisions are now being introduced for creating facilities for the realisation of the fine from immoveable properties also. With these few remarks I commend this amendment to the House.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I beg to move:

"In clause 99, in the proviso to sub-section (1) of proposed section 386, omit all words after the word 'warrant'."

The effect of my amendment will be, Sir, that the proviso will read as follows:

"Provided that, if the sentence directs that in default of payment of the fine the offender shall be imprisoned, and if such offender has undergone the whole of such imprisonment in default, no Court shall issue such warrant."

Sir, under this law, we provide that in case a fine is imposed on an offender, the Court may direct that in default of payment of fine, an offender may be sentenced to imprisonment for a particular period and that period has also been limited to one-fourth of imprisonment given or some such period. The period also diminishes proportionately to the amount paid or recovered. Well, the Court has already ordered and directed that he is to be imprisoned in default of payment of the fine and now under the new clause 886 we also provide that the fine could also be realised as a decree. In that case, Sir, this provision of directing the realisation of fines by sentencing the man to imprisonment will become superfluous. This addition itself shows that it is only in rare cases that the imprisonment might be inflicted on the offender in case he fails to pay the fine. If this is the case, then why should that offender be held liable for an extra punishment after he had undergone the extra imprisonment which he had been ordered to undergo in default of payment of the fine. I, therefore, propose that when once a man has undergone the sentence in default of a fine, he should not be made to pay that amount subsequently. With these words, Sir, I commend my amendment to the House.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras ceded Districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, this section has to be read with the sections of the Penal Code which provide the substantive punishment of fine and under the Penal Code, if a portion of the fine had been paid after the man had been sent to jail for not having paid the fine, a pro rata reduction of the term of imprisonment in default shall be made and if no part of the fine is paid it is also laid down that if he suffers the imprisonment which is provided in default (sections 67, 68, 69 and 70), then again the six years' liability to pay the fine remains. So, it seems to me doubtful how we can here in this clause say that the suffering of imprisonment in default of payment of a fine should absolve the man from being liable to the fine, if the fine could be recovered by other means than by sending him to jail. And, therefore, I think this amendment which my learned friend proposes cannot stand together with the sections of the Penal Code. And it must also be recognised that the fine may be evaded—assuming that the man must pay the fine—then a fine might be evaded by a contumacious person and he may suffer the imprisonment and yet, having the means to pay the fine, not pay the fine. Is that an advantage? Will it work justly? That is another point which has to be taken into consideration. I, therefore, think that this amendment that serving the period of imprisonment provided in default of payment of the fine should absolve the person from being liable to pay the fine—I do not think I can support this amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, Mr. Subrahmanayam has quite rightly pointed out here that we must be consistent with our Penal Code. It is no good moving an amendment here unless we look to the Penal Code. The chief point against the amendment has already been made. If the fine is realised, or a portion of the fine is realised after the man goes to jail, then there is a proportionate reduction in the term of the imprisonment and we get rid of the man. I ask the House whether it is reasonable that a man should be allowed to be a burden upon the State when he has property from which the fine can be realised. As long as there is property and the Court thinks that the amount of the fine can be realised, I see no reason why in the law of this country, at all events, we should allow the accused to go to jail to lead a comfortable life there, very possibly a life which he enjoys, and to call upon the taxpayer to maintain him there when he has property out of which the fine might be realised.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. B. N. Misra: Sir, I am rather encouraged to move my amendment* which is an explanation, seeing the attitude of many Honourable Members who do not want property to be attached at all. Sir, what I propose is an explanation, and it relates to the section which provides that the property belonging to the offender is liable for the fine. Sir, these words are liable to be interpreted differently by Magistrates and that is why I have proposed this explanation. I had originally put in the words "specific interest in the property," but, Sir, there may be some difficulty in using the word "specific." So, with your permission, Sir, I propose that the explanation should be:

"When the defaulter is a member of a joint family, property of the defaulter means the interest in the property."

I wish to cut out the word "specific," as was suggested by the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar. Sir, many Honourable Members have already described the difficulties of attaching moveable property when they happen to be members of a joint family, and the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson pointed out the safeguards in the case of members of joint Mitakshara Hindu families. But I do not think the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson has met the case of the members who live in Bengal under the Dayabhaga family, or the Muhammadan members or the Sikhs or Parsees or other communities who live jointly in India and also the case of partnership property. There may be some partners having property in common and one man may commit some offence and he may be punished. Of course the property belonging to the firm also belongs to any one of the partners and the Courts will be justified in issuing a warrant and attaching such property. There will thus be several difficulties and I do not think I need add to what I said on the last occasion. I shall only point out, Sir, that instead of the whole property being attached, it will be safeguarding everybody if the interest of the offender alone is attached. This will meet the objection not only of members of Mitakshara Hindu families but also other members such as Muhammadans, Parsees or Indian Christians who are living jointly. With these words, Sir, I propose my amendment which runs as follows:

"In clause 99, to sub-section (1) of proposed section 386 add the following:

Explanation.—When the defaulter is a member of a joint family, property of the defaulter means the specific interest in the property."

The motion was negatived.

Bhai Man Singh (East Punjab: Sikh): My amendment is:

"In clause 99 in the proviso to sub-section (3) of section 386 omit all the words after the word 'offender'."

The proviso in which I want this amendment to be made reads like this:

"Provided that no such warrant shall be executed by the arrest or detention in prison of the offender in any case in which the Court passing sentence upon him has directed his imprisonment in default of payment of the fine."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We are prepared to accept that.

The motion was adopted.

* "In clause 99, to sub-section (1) of proposed section 386 add the following:

Explanation.—When the defaulter is a member of a joint family, property of the defaulter means the specific interest in the property."

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: I ask the permission of the Chair in respect of an amendment I propose, which unfortunately I overlooked before, and which is to the effect that the words in the new sub-section 386 (2) "other than the offender" may be omitted.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I am afraid I must object to this amendment. The Bill has been under the consideration of this Assembly for over three weeks, and it is rather hard on the Government that when the consideration of the clause is practically complete they should be asked to consider the effect of an amendment sprung upon them without notice.

Mr. President: I must uphold the objection on the ground of notice. The amendment was only handed to me three minutes ago.

Clauses 99 to 103 were added to the Bill.

Bhai Man Singh: My amendment is:

"Omit sub-clause (v) of clause 104."

Sub-clause (v) of clause 104 says

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We are prepared to accept the amendment.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 104, as amended, and clause 105 were added to the Bill.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, the amendment which I shall move presently is another important amendment and I would ask this Honourable House to indulge me for a few moments when I explain its provisions. The object of my amendment is that in all cases where the District Magistrate or the Presidency Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class has passed an order for keeping the peace or giving security for good behaviour, the appeal should lie to the Court of Session and not to the Court of the District Magistrate. Honourable Members will find that under the present constitution the District Magistrate is the head of the district police, the District Superintendent of Police being regarded as his police assistant. All cases in the district relating to the breach of the peace and good behaviour are therefore cases in which the District Magistrate is interested officially and it is only fair that any order passed by a Magistrate including himself should be revisable on appeal by an independent tribunal, such as the Sessions Judge. I am only arming the superior court with appellate authority in a matter in which there are obvious objections to the hearing of an appeal by a person interested in the maintenance of peace and order in the district. On a priori grounds I do not think there would be any objection. The only objection which is likely to be raised from the Government side would be that you will be crowding the Court of Sessions with additional work and thereby increasing the cost of criminal litigation. That is no doubt an argument which requires consideration, but on the other hand, I would ask Honourable Members to observe that if any justice is to be done to an offender or an applicant against whom an order has been passed for keeping peace or being of good behaviour, is he likely to get fair and even-handed justice at the hands of the District Magistrate or is it not likely that the District Magistrate who peruses case diaries and police reports and hears a good many things which undoubtedly he is bound to hear about the badmashes of his district and about people who are disturbers of public peace, is it not likely that justice will suffer and has suffered in the past by such cases being finally disposed of by him rather than by an independent tribunal such as the Sessions Judge is, who will hear these cases and dispose them off in accordance with law. If there is therefore the question of cost on the one side and the question of justice on the other, I have no doubt that this House will vote for justice and after all how much would be the additional cost. I do not think it would be considerable and even if it were considerable, we are now living in times when the nation demands more and more of justice, and justice which is not open to the objections to which I have adverted. On these grounds, Sir, I move my amendment which runs as follows:

"In clause 106 (1) after the words 'said Code' insert the following:

'the words 'other than the District Magistrate or a Presidency Magistrate' shall be omitted, for the words 'District Magistrate' the words 'Sessions Judge' shall be substituted and '."

Mr. P. B. Haigh (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, I desire to oppose this amendment. In the first place I must draw attention to a remark made by the Honourable and learned Member who moved the amendment in which he said that, if any justice is to be done, there should be an appeal in all cases from the sentence of a Magistrate to an independent tribunal and not to the Court of the Magistrate who is the head of the district police and who is interested in the maintenance of peace and order. Well, if this is really the opinion of the Honourable Member, I should like to ask him why he has not moved a far more sweeping amendment. How can he tolerate the provisions in the Code which lay down that appeals from Magistrates of the second and third classes should lie to the District Magistrate. It seems to me, Sir, that there is a fault in his logic: and that if he is really of opinion that in all cases there should be an appeal to what he calls an independent tribunal which has no interest in the maintenance of peace and order, then he ought to move a further amendment and provide for all appeals from all Magistrates of whatever grade to lie to the Court of the Sessions Judge.

It seems to me, Sir, that he has selected the weakest possible case in proposing that appeals under this section should go to the Sessions Judge and not to the District Magistrate, because he has overlooked the fact that proceedings under this Chapter VIII are only quasi-judicial,—they are of the nature of executive proceedings with the object of preventing breaches of the peace and for maintaining order. Now that is not a matter with which the Sessions Judge should be directly connected. The responsibility of seeing that breaches of the peace of the kind provided for in Chapter VIII do not occur lies upon the District Magistrate. Even if he is not primarily interested in the case, the ultimate responsibility in all these matters lies upon him, and it is therefore proper that an order made by subordinate Magistrates under this section should be referred to him in appeal, and that, I submit, is the logical basis on which this section rests. I trust, therefore, Sir, that the House will not support this amendment.

Dr. Wand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I support this amendment. The Honourable Mr. Haigh endeavoured to correct Dr. Gour, saying that since he has not moved another amendment and that since appeals from sentences passed by second or third class Magistrates lie in the Court of the District Magistrates and not in that of the Sessions Judge, and that since he has moved no amendment as to those, therefore, this amendment should not be appreciated. That is the main argument which he has advanced, namely, because he has made an omission in one direction, therefore, he may not be allowed to correct a provision of law, which is defective on the very face of it. I may tell my learned friend that a District Magistrate is considered to be responsible for the peace and order of the district. As a matter of fact, in some cases, suggestions, as to security under section 110 emanate, in a way, from him, and consequently, on the information given by the Police in some cases, or on the receipt of information given by some other persons, criminal proceedings, under section 110, are commenced. Now, Sir, I place this point before the House. The very District Magistrate whose desire is that all badmashes who do not behave properly, may be bound over, that is may be called upon to give security, should be allowed to hear appeals against such order. Should a man, who has been dragged to the Court and has been bound down, file an appeal against the same order before the District Magistrate, when we see that one of the first class Magistrates, subordinate to him, has passed that order. Is there any logic in it? May I ask this of the Honourable Mr. Haig? There is no logic in it I may say; it is iniquitous. For all intents and purposes the object of the law of appeal will lose its force. Therefore, on that ground, I support this amendment.

There is another ground. The Honourable Mr. Haigh failed to see that an appeal to the District Magistrate is competent only from the sentence passed or conviction ordered by a third-class or second-class Magistrate, and not by a first class and besides that an appeal will be instituted in the court of the District Magistrate only in case of a conviction or sentence; but when an order is made by a first class Magistrate under section 118 that is not a sentence or a conviction. He will agree with me that the sentence is quite different from an order passed under section 118 of the Criminal Procedure Code. All these proceedings started under sections 110 are considered preventive measures. They are not part of the substantive law. Substantive law is incorporated and embodied in the Indian Penal Code. If a person commits an offence and he is prosecuted and convicted only by a third class or a second class Magistrate then and then alone, namely, only in those cases, appeals, as I have already submitted, from such sentences or convictions, will lie in the court of the District Magistrate. But here there is no question of a sentence or conviction, or third or second class Magistrates. Here is an order, which only a first class Magistrate can pass, enjoining upon a person, who has been brought before the court, to give security for a certain period, and the person who has been called upon to do so, files an appeal from that order. The recommendation, put forward by this amendment, is that it does not look proper that the same officer, who is in charge of law and order, should be entrusted with the power of adjudicating upon the fitness, or impropriety of the same order. Suppose, Sir, that A is in charge of a certain Department and A offers a suggestion that in a certain village or a certain ilaga all badmashes may be called upon to give security, so that crime may be reduced. Now A passes an order like that, and then A's subordinate first class Magistrate, after having gone into the evidence which has been produced in that behalf, passes an order appeals against which lie before the same A. Can there be any guarantee that A, though he may be very honest and his intentions may be very good, will not be influenced by the fact that it was he himself who, in a way who was the author of these proceedings upon which the orders for taking security were eventually passed. Is he barring some exceptional cases, likely to set aside those orders? On this ground also I support this amendment, which speaks for itself and deserves the sympathy of the whole House.

The third ground is that on the occasion of framing laws or devising rules we must bear two important points in mind. One is, how will the public take it? Our District Magistrates are honest officers no doubt. Dr. Gour has not attacked their honesty or impartiality. His suggestion is that the public will look down upon this provision with contempt, they will misconstrue it. The attempt which has been made through the medium of this very commendable amendment is that we should not leave any room for avoidable criticism. That is the honest desire and the intention of the Honourable Mover of this amendment. I trust that the Treasury Benches will kindly appreciate this amendment and accept it. I may repeat my suggestion that there is no insinuation against any District Magistrate. They are very capable and able men; but the desire is that they should not be entrusted with the decision of appeals against the very orders which in a way, and in some cases, may be traceable to their honest suggestion as executive officers of the District.

With these remarks I support this amendment.

Mr. C. A. H. Townsend (Punjab: Nominated Official): Sir, the last speaker said that all proceedings under section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code are ordered by District Magistrates directly.

Dr. Nand Lal: I did not say that; I said that in some cases the suggestions in a way emanate from the District Magistrates or executive officers.

Mr. President: If the Honourable Member wishes to correct a statement he must at least have the courtesy to do it standing.

Mr. C. A. H. Townsend: I leave it at that as Dr. Nand Lal apparently does not adhere to what I thought he said. But in this connection I wish to bring one point before the House which bears, I consider, not only on this amendment but on many others that have been moved in this debate by my friends on the left. Years ago, Sir, I was a Settlement Officer (without any Magisterial powers) in a Punjab district not very far from Delhi. As such it was my duty to investigate the affairs of every individual village. It was a district in which, as is common in the Punjab generally, cattle stealing was a very popular form of crime. In one village, Sir,—the same indeed happened at many other villages, but I remember this one village particularly,—the outcry on the matter was very insistent, the assembled grey-beards of the village all said that they had a very strong complaint against the administration. I asked them what that was. They said: "We cannot keep our cattle, they are all stolen away from us at night and the thieves are never punished, and if any persons are by chance sent to prison, they are let out at once." I pointed out to them that nobody could possibly object to innocent men not being sent to prison. They said: "We are not talking of innocent men: we are talking of men who are known to be guilty in the village of these offences. You should lock them up, and what is more you ought to be able to send them to prison on suspicion." There are, Sir, two sides to every story. I fully admit that much discontent can be caused by innocent men being sent wrongfully to prison. But I do ask this House to realise that discontent which might in the long run be equally dangerous to the administration can be also caused by men who are really guilty not being sent to prison, and before this amendment or other similar amendments are finally disposed of, I would ask my friends on the left to carefully consider this point. I oppose the amendment, Sir.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, many of the remarks made by my Honourable friend who just now spoke are irrelevant to the present question we are considering. We are not now concerned with the order imposing security. That is already passed. We are not concerned with sending a man to prison in case he fails to give security, because the law takes its course after the order, if he fails to give security. I do not see what all these remarks which my Honourable friend just now made have got to do with this amendment. We are now concerned with an appeal against the order which has been passed. There are two questions involved in this amendment. Only one question has been dealt with hitherto. The first question is to whom should an appeal go in a case of this sort. The section provides that an appeal shall lie only in the case of orders by certain Magistrates. The section as it stands provides an appeal in the case of orders by certain Magistrates to the District Magistrates. In the case of the Presidency Magistrate and the District Magistrate the Code as it stands provides no appeal. It is rather a curious lapse. If Honourable Members will compare section 406A as now proposed by the Government with section 406, the Code provides an appeal in the case of a District Magistrate and a Presidency Magistrate where he refuses to accept a surety. If he passes an order for security either for peace or for good behaviour, there is no appeal provided. That is the more substantive order, the more essential order and no appeal is provided in the case of an order by the District Magistrate or Presidency Magistrate. In a purely small matter just as refusing to accept a surety, an appeal is provided. I take it it is an unintentional omission in the Code that no appeal should be provided in such serious orders, when the orders are passed by a District Magistrate or a Presidency Magistrate. Look at the consequence of an order passed by a District Magistrate or a Presidency Magistrate either for keeping the peace or for good behaviour. The man has to go to jail for one year or for three years as the case may be. Now, can such an order remain without an appeal? If a first class sub-divisional Magistrate passes an order, that order is open to appeal. But if it is passed by a District Magistrate it is not open to appeal at all. I do not think, Sir, it is right. Therefore one of the objects of this amendment is a very good and necessary object. As Honourable Members will see you should provide for an appeal in such cases also.

To whom should the appeal go is the next point. Should it go to the executive head of the district or should it go to a judicial officer? The proposal is that it should go to the judicial head of the district. What is the harm in that amendment? An appeal lies; why should not the appeal go to a judicial officer? You have passed an order; the urgency is all gone; an order has been passed; there is no question of any stay or any thing of that sort; peace is not threatened; the vagabond is already bound over; you only give him the chance of an appeal. Give him a fair hearing. What is the good of giving a right of appeal with the one hand and taking away with the other hand? What is this fear of Sessions Judges, I want to know? Here we are accused of distrust of the police; we are accused of distrusting our Magistrates. May I in turn accuse those who oppose these amendments that they distrust the Sessions Judges? They have no confidence in their Sessions Judges. I return that compliment to those who attack us. I say, Sir, that the Sessions Judge is the proper authority to deal with this matter and he will bring a judicial mind to bear upon the case.

Sir, there is an omission in the amendment proposed by my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, which with your permission, Sir, I propose to make up. Sir, I wish to add the words "in the case of an order by a Presidency Magistrate to the High Court;" because if the amendment proposed by my Honourable friend is left as it is, it would read that in the case of a Presidency Magistrate also the appeal should go to the Sessions Judge. Of course the obvious answer which the Honourable the Treasury Bench would at once come forward with is "Where is the Sessions Judge in a Presidency town?" It is a very legitimate question to put, no doubt; but it is an oversight on the part of my learned friend, Dr. Gour, and I therefore, Sir, say that the words "in the case of an order by a Presidency Magistrate to the High Court" should be inserted. It is admitted these are appealable orders, and therefore I say let us give a fair appeal; no party suffers. I support the amendment and I move this amendment to add the words "in the case of an order by a Presidency Magistrate to the High Court," at the end.

Dr. Gour: I accept the amendment suggested by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, Dr. Gour, with his usual optimism and foresight prophesied that we had only one possible argument against his amendment, and that was that it would add to the work of the Sessions Courts and therefore add to the expense. Sir, that is a very strong argument. I think the House has perhaps overlooked the fact that this House is not going to be called upon to provide money for this additional work that will be cast upon the Sessions Courts. This House is proposing to throw a very heavy burden on the already overburdened Local Governments' finances. But, Sir, that might have been the end of our argument

Dr. Nand Lal: With the permission of the Chair, I submit there are if I mistake not very few cases.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: They may be few, but this House is proposing to make them very many. Dr. Gour went on, and like other Members in this House, proceeded to level an attack against the impartiality of the District Magistrate. I do not think the Government of India can sit down and listen to these remarks without some protest. It is quite true that my friend, Dr. Nand Lal, has said that he intended nothing. He may have intended nothing, but he said a great deal. Dr. Gour, said, justice has got to be done in these cases and is the offender likely to get fair and even-handed treatment from the District Magistrate? Dr. Nand Lal said, that it is the District Magistrate who is responsible for the peace and order of the district and therefore you cannot expect him to be impartial in these matters

Dr. Nand Lal: I did not say so, Sir.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I have not got a short-hand report. I have got down as much as I could.

Dr. Nand Lal: On a point of personal explanation, Sir. What I said so far as I can recollect was that our District Magistrates are competent, impartial and experienced, but at the same time we ought to be very careful to see that the appeal is not instituted in the Court of the District Magistrate, because it will be more desirable. This is what I had submitted.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, it is by no means the case that the District Magistrate always institutes the proceedings in these cases. Far from it. I have been a Magistrate myself for years, and I know it is, as a matter of fact, in most cases the Superintendent of Police who eggs on his Sub-Inspectors to help to preserve the peace of the district by using the powers that they have got to bring offenders of this kind before the Courts. I would suggest, Sir, with reference to this point that a District Magistrate can barely be trusted because he is likely to listen to everything that the police say to him. I would suggest to the House that the District Magistrate who sits at his headquarters and swallows everything that is put before him by the police would find something very different from peace and good Government in his district; he will find most hopeless confusion and unrest in his district in a very short time. The District Magistrate, Sir, I think, must be trusted to keep the reins in his own hands and not to allow himself to be used as a tool by the police.

Mr. Rangachariar, Sir, has introduced his new amendment about the Presidency Magistrates. Mr. Rangachariar has given notice of an amendment himself, No. 208, and since he drafted that amendment he has apparently changed his mind, because if Mr. Rangachariar's amendment No. 208 is applied to the Bill it will have the result of providing no appeal whatever against any order of a Presidency Magistrate. Mr. Rangachariar now is proceeding to assist Dr. Gour to correct his mistake and at the same time to get out of his own. Sir, it has been suggested by Dr. Gour that you must not leave the final word in this matter with the District Magistrate, and Mr. Rangachariar would no doubt add now 'with the Presidency Magistrate.' But there is no question—let not the House be deceived by this argument—there is no question of the final word being with either of these Magistrates. There is revision in these cases. My Honourable friend says: "Ah! revision." I hope he remembers that, Sir, when he comes to move some of his later amendments. Revision, Sir, is regarded by many Members of this House as a most essential safeguard. They are pressing for it here, there and everywhere. But when I point out that this safeguard does exist in this particular case, Dr. Gour says "Ah! revision." There is the safeguard, Sir, and I consider that that is quite enough in the case of the Presidency Magistrate and the District Magistrate. There is a good deal of loose talk in regard to this amendment. It has been assumed that first and second class Magistrates are in the habit of passing orders to secure good behaviour and keep the peace. If Honourable Members will look at sections 107, 108, 109 and 110, they will find that it is only a very limited class of Magistrates who have power to pass orders at all.

Mr. J. E. Percival (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, I only wish to point out one additional fact, not mentioned by my Honourable friend, with reference to section 125. Section 125 runs:

"The Chief Presidency or District Magistrate may at any time, for sufficient reasons to be recorded in writing, cancel any bond for keeping the peace or for good behaviour executed under this Chapter, etc."

[Mr. P. E. Percival.]

Now, Sir, if we transfer the appellate power from District Magistrates to Sessions Judges, it seems to me that we shall be putting in a provision contradictory to section 125; for you give the power in one section to the District Magistrate to cancel the bond, and in the other section to the Sessions Judge. If the Sessions Judge rejects the appeal, all the same the District Magistrate can cancel the bond under section 125. The District Magistrate is the sole Appellate Authority dealing with security cases (Dr. H. S. Gour: 'Prestige'); and that is the reason of the provision in section 125, Chapter VIII, to that effect.

There is one other point. With reference to my Honourable friend, Dr. Nand Lal's remarks regarding the orders given by the District Magistrate, it has been laid down that:

"Where a District Magistrate is executive head of a District and is actively concerned in the institution of proceedings against a person under Chapter VIII, he is debarred from hearing an appeal under section 406 without the permission of the Sessions Judge."

So that the case of the District Magistrate himself being concerned in the case has already been met.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I move, Sir, that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Before I put the question I want to ask the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar whether the amendment he proposes should not be inserted after the words 'Sessions Judge' rather than at the end of the amendment.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Yes, Sir, after the words "Sessions Judge."

Mr. President: The original amendment was:

'In clause 106 (1) after the words 'said Code' insert the following:

'the words 'other than the District Magistrate or a Presidency Magistrate' shall be omitted, for the words 'District Magistrate' the words 'Sessions Judge' shall be substituted and."

Since which a further amendment has been moved:

"To insert after the word 'Judge' the words 'and in the case of an order by the Presidency Magistrate to the High Court'."

The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that the amendment, as amended, be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 106, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar : I move :

" In clause 107, in proposed section 406-A substitute the following as clause (b) in the places of clauses (b) and (c) :

" (b) If made by any other Magistrate to the Court of Sessions."

The clause is :

" Any person aggrieved by an order refusing to accept or rejecting a security under section 122 may appeal against such order :

(a) if made by a Presidency Magistrate, to the High Court;

(b) if made by the District Magistrate, to the Court of Session; or

(c) if made by a Magistrate other than the District Magistrate, to the District Magistrate."

My proposal is that in place of clauses (b) and (c) we should have the following :

" If made by any other Magistrate, to the Court of Session ",

[Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar.]

that is to say, that if it is made by any other Magistrate than a Presidency Magistrate it will go to the Court of Session. It follows the previous section and I hope there will be no difficulty in accepting it.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: I oppose the amendment. My Honourable friend perhaps consider that his present proposal is consequential upon the previous proposal. I submit that it is nothing of the kind. In section 406A we are providing for an appeal in cases in which there has been no appeal before and I submit that we provide quite sufficiently when we allow these appeals to the District Magistrate, if the order is passed by a Magistrate other than the District Magistrate. In fact, there is not the least doubt that the last amendment that was carried against us and the present amendment are entirely inconsistent with Chapter VIII of the Code. Chapter VIII of the Code gives the full control in these proceedings to the District Magistrate and there is no doubt whatsoever that he should be the person . . .

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I do not press my amendment.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Dr. H. S. Gour: This amendment which I move is consequential. It runs as follows:

"In clause 107 for clause (b) of proposed section 406A, substitute the following:

'(b) if made by the District Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class to the Court of Session; or .'"

I shall explain to the Honourable Members why it is consequential. In the proposed section 406A it is provided:

"Any person aggrieved by an order refusing to accept or rejecting a surety under section 122 may appeal against such order,—

- (a) if made by a Presidency Magistrate, to the High Court;
- (b) if made by the District Magistrate, to the Court of Session; or
- (c) if made by a Magistrate other than the District Magistrate, to the District Magistrate."

Honourable Members will see that such an order may be passed by a first class Magistrate, as Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith has pointed out that first class Magistrates are empowered to deal with these cases of security. Now, Honourable Members know that in ordinary cases the District Magistrate has no jurisdiction whatever over a sentence or conviction of a first class Magistrate and the only Court which is empowered to hear appeals from a conviction by a first class Magistrate is the Court of Sessions. I see no distinction in principle between a conviction and an order refusing to take security and I do not see why if in the one case the Sessions Court is the right Court, in the other case the Sessions Court is the wrong Court and why an appeal should lie to the Court of the District Magistrate. That is, I submit, an anomaly which my amendment seeks to remove. I do not think that the Government should oppose this amendment. It will make the Code more logical and more consistent. It will show that the Sessions Court being the ordinary appellate tribunal for dealing with cases disposed of by a first class Magistrate that Court will also hear all cases in which the first class Magistrate passes an order under the preventive sections and, Sir, the objections which I have raised and which the House has just now endorsed by their vote apply equally to this amendment and I trust that the House will support me.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I must protest against Dr. Gour's assertion to the House that if the Sessions Judge is the right person to hear appeals against orders requiring security, he is therefore obviously the right person to hear appeals against an order refusing to accept a surety because that surety is not a fit person. The two matters are on an entirely different footing. In the one case you are passing an order definitely that may have the effect of interfering with a man's liberty for a long time. It is quite true that by refusing to accept a surety you may thereby interfere with a man's liberty for a short time. But all he has to do is to find another surety. The man whom he has put up in the first instance has been definitely found after a magisterial inquiry on oath not to be a fit person to stand surety—and I would ask the House to remember that this magisterial inquiry on oath is quite a new thing in the Code. We have provided a safeguard here against improper rejection of sureties and in this inquiry on oath, the Magistrate has to find on definite grounds, which the High Courts have laid down for the guidance of subordinate Courts, that the person offered is not a fit person. He has no money. He lives at a distance or he is a bad character himself. Sir, in that case, does Dr. Gour require the Sessions Judge to decide whether the Magistrate's order was a proper one or not. That is a matter that is well within the competence of the District Magistrate. Dr. Gour has not reminded us again this time of our argument regarding expense. But here again the question of expense comes in very seriously. It is not a laughing matter at all. Local Governments will probably find themselves in the position of having to increase the number of Sessions Courts very considerably. They are always having to put on additional Sessions Judges simply because arrears accumulate and the arrears will accumulate to a far greater extent, if it provides, as the House has already done, that all appeals in security proceedings are to go to the Sessions Judge, and also now by this amendment that further appeals are to go to him when a Magistrate passes a preliminary and unimportant order declaring a surety to be unfit to stand security for a person who has already been found to be either a person likely to create a breach of the peace or likely to be of bad behaviour.

Mr. Pyari Lal: Sir, the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith has not met Dr. Gour's arguments. What Dr. Gour says is that you must be consistent. When you provide that all appeals from first class Magistrates should go to the Sessions Judge and not to the District Magistrate, why should you make an exception in this particular case? We must be consistent. That is the first thing that we must preserve and in that view I think he is perfectly right. As to the matter of costs, I do not know how the Honourable the last speaker has run away with the idea that the work of the Sessions Judge will be over-burdened because a few more appeals under these preventive sections will go to his Court. I know it for a fact that security cases for bad behaviour you can count on your finger's ends in the whole year. As regards security cases for keeping the peace, their number may be a little more, but they are not half so important as the security cases for bad behaviour. There might be a dozen cases in a year, and these dozen cases surely will not make any difference in the amount of work the Sessions Judges have to do.

Mr. H. Tomkinson: Sir, I would just like to make one remark as regards a question of fact. The Honourable Member who has just sat down stated that there were only half a dozen cases a year of proceedings under this Chapter. I take the statistics for Madras for the year 1921. There were 1,221 persons ordered to give security to keep the peace—I give the figures for persons convicted, Sir,—and as regards “ security for good behaviour ” 1,781, in the same year.

(Voices: “ They were non-co-operation cases.”)

Dr. H. S. Gour: May I ask how many cases were there in which a first class Magistrate has refused a surety? That is the only point we are now discussing.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: We have no record, Sir, of these separate cases; I only got up to refer to a point of fact, as my Honourable friend said that there are only half a dozen cases for security under this Chapter in the year.

Mr. President: The question is that the following amendment be made.

“ In clause 107 for clause (b) of proposed section 406-A, substitute the following :

‘ (b) if made by the District Magistrate or a Magistrate of the first class to the Court of Session; or ’.”

The motion was negatived.

Clause 107 was added to the Bill.

Mr. President: The amendment* standing in the name of Bhai Man Singh is outside the scope of the Bill.

Bhai Man Singh: I should like to draw the attention of the Chair to the question whether this amendment is relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill or not. There are some 3 or 4 sections wherein after orders are passed I want the right of appeal. One section is 188. We have, Sir, practically remodelled section 188 in the Bill. If Honourable Members will look at clause 24, they will see that we have practically remodelled the whole section 188 of the Code. The other sections are 187 and 189; they are consequential. If we provide any appeal in section 188, we shall have to provide for appeals in sections 187 and 189 also. Then, my case about 144 is still stronger, because if you look at clause 26 of the Bill, you will find that we provide in sub-section (iii) a new sub-section (5) as follows :

"Where such an application is received, the Magistrate shall afford to the applicant an early opportunity of appearing before him either in person or by pleader and shewing cause against the order; and if the Magistrate rejects the application wholly or in part, he shall record in writing his reasons for so doing."

Mr. President: The Honourable Member has not shown me in the least how his amendment is in order in this place. This clause refers to acceptance of, or objection to, surety under section 122, and as far as I am able to read, it refers to nothing else. The Honourable Member proposes to make it refer to a great many other matters which are not in the clause at all.

Bhai Man Singh: We are now discussing section 406 which refers to appeals from Magistrates to the District Magistrate. Clause 406 refers to appeals. 406-A also refers to appeals. Whether I put my amendment as 406A or B it would not make any difference. We have only to see whether it is relevant to the question of appeal we are now discussing. When we have made important changes in section 144 by providing the right to a man to go and put in his objections and when we have also required the Magistrate to record his reasons in writing for rejecting his application and

Mr. President: Order, order. That is quite good reason for arguing on the merits of the clause itself, but it does not help me to see that it is in order. I think I must rule the Honourable Member out of order.

Clauses 108, 109 and 110 were added to the Bill.

Mr. President: The two new clauses standing in the name of Mr. K. Ahmed (Amendment† No. 813) are also outside the scope of the Bill.

* "After clause 107 insert the following new clause :

'107-A. After section 406-A, the following section shall be inserted, namely :

'406-B. Any person aggrieved by an order passed by a Magistrate other than a District Magistrate or a Presidency Magistrate under section 137, section 138, section 141, section 143, section 144 (7) or section 145 may appeal to a District Magistrate."

† "After clause 110 insert the following clauses :

'110-A. To section 411 of the said Code the following proviso shall be added, namely :

'Provided that any person so convicted by a Presidency Magistrate, other than the Chief Presidency Magistrate may appeal to the latter if he has been sentenced to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months or to fine not exceeding two hundred rupees."

'110-B. In section 413 of the said code the words 'or of whipping only' shall be omitted."

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, the amendment which stands in my name wants to make this provision in the Code, namely, that where there are two or three persons jointly tried, and against one of them there is an appealable sentence and against the others non-appealable sentences, every one who has been jointly tried should have the right of appeal. I worded my amendment in a particular manner; the Government would like to have it in some other manner; and I am willing, Sir, to move it as it is worded by the Government. It is in these terms:

"In clause 111 in the proposed new section 415-A, for the words 'any of such persons in respect of whom an appealable judgment or order has been passed appeals' the following be substituted, namely:

'an appealable judgment or order has been passed in respect of any of such persons'; and all words after the words 'shall have a right of appeal' be omitted."

Sir, I move the amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

Clause 111, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Clauses 112 and 113 were added to the Bill.

Rai Sahib Lakshmi Narayan Lal: Sir, the amendment which I move is:

"That in clause 114 after the words 'said Code' insert the following:

"In sub-section (1) the words 'empowered by the Local Government in this behalf' shall be omitted."

Under section 435 of the Code only such Sub-divisional Magistrates as are empowered by the Local Government in this behalf have got the power to call for the record of the lower Court. It is only Honorary Magistrates and sometimes Sub-Deputy Magistrates who are subordinate to Sub-divisional Officers, and it is very inconvenient and expensive for people of a sub-division to go to the district headquarters to have a relief like this. It is only Magistrates of mature experience who are placed in charge of sub-divisions and it will be rather lightening the work of the superior officers to empower the Sub-divisional Officers to call for the record of their subordinate Courts. I move this amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, the intention of this amendment* is to preserve to the High Courts revisional jurisdiction in cases disposed of under sections 144 and 145. Honourable Members will remember that incidentally this question was raised at the earlier part of the debate and the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson pointed out that not only the chartered High Courts but all the non-chartered High Courts, such as the Chief Courts and the Courts of the Judicial Commissioner do, under various local Acts, possess a Statutory power of revision in such cases. It was then pointed out by the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson that those cases were not properly argued. That may be a question of opinion. It may be that those cases were not properly decided. Now, Sir, I ask the House a simple question. If it is a fact, as we have been assured by the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson, that all the High Courts, chartered and non-chartered, possess this power, then I say this clause is superfluous, nay misleading. If it is a fact that they do not possess the power, in that case I ask this House to endorse my opinion that this power is both salutary and necessary. It will not be denied, it has not been denied, by the occupants of the Treasury Benches that this power has in fact been exercised under section 107 of the Government of India Act and other local Acts. If so, so far as this clause is concerned, it conflicts with the express provisions of section 107 of the Government of India Act. It creates utter confusion. If the High Courts have power under section 107 of the Government of India Act to exercise the general power of superintendence over the subordinate Courts, what object is served by inserting this clause that orders under these Chapters 143, 144 and 145 shall not be open to revision under section 435? It might be said that though under the Code of Criminal Procedure the High Courts have not been given that power, still that power is exercised otherwise by the High Courts. I have already replied to this argument. I have, therefore, Sir, confidence that this House will vote for my amendment and place the powers of all the High Courts beyond any shadow of doubt, and I hope, as one Honourable Member suggests, that the Government, out of sheer consistency and due regard being had to what they said on the last occasion, will accept my amendment. I move it.

* "For sub-clause (iii) of clause 114 substitute the following:

"(iii) Sub-section (3) shall be omitted."

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I rise to oppose the amendment. My Honourable friend has referred to the powers exercised by Chartered High Courts in connection with the orders dealt with in this section. I submit, Sir, that all the rulings of the High Courts go to show that if a Magistrate has exercised jurisdiction or purports to have exercised jurisdiction under these Chapters or sections which he did not possess then the High Court may interfere. That, Sir, is quite a different thing from giving a general power of revision as the Mover of the amendment proposes to give. He, Sir, is confusing the general power of superintendence under section 15 of the old Charter Act (section 107 of the Government of India Act at present) with powers of revision. It is an entirely different question. These proceedings under section 144, Sir, are really of an executive order and the same applies to proceedings under Chapter XII. Take the case of section 176. I really do not understand why my Honourable friend suggests that there should be a revision of inquest proceedings. We have had similar provisions in the Code all along restricting the rights of revision in these cases, a revision going into the facts of the case and I therefore oppose the amendment.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"For sub-clause (iii) of clause 114 substitute the following:

"(iii) Sub-section (3) shall be omitted'."

The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clauses 114, as amended, and 115 stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move:

"To clause 116 add the following:

'In section 437 as re-numbered the words 'or District Magistrate' wherever they occur in the said section shall be omitted'."

Now, the present section 437 is the old section 436, and section 436 of the Code provides that in cases which are triable exclusively by the Sessions Judge, if there is a discharge, the Sessions Judge or the District Magistrate, on examining the record, may order a commitment. Sir, by my amendment I wish to take away the power of the District Magistrate in this matter and give this power only to the Sessions Judge. The Sessions Judge is the only competent authority to find out whether the case, after discharge, was such that it should have been committed to the Sessions Court, and my amendment will put this right. (An Honourable Member: "Old section 437 is now section 436.") Yes, the old section 437 which is now section 436. What I provide by my amendment is that such powers should only be vested in the Sessions Judge and not in the District Magistrate. With these few words, Sir, I move my amendment.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"To clause 116 add the following:

'In section 437, now section 436, the words 'or District Magistrate' wherever they occur in the said section shall be omitted'."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I see no reason why this power, which has been with the District Magistrate so long, should be taken away from him now. The District Magistrate has always had this power to cause the person to be arrested and to be committed for trial if in his opinion the person has been improperly discharged. There is this safeguard in the section that no person can be ordered to be committed for trial until he has been given an opportunity to show cause why such an order should not be made. This is only a preliminary matter. A Magistrate who may only be a second class Magistrate is specially empowered to decide whether a person ought to be discharged or not. Surely, if we allow a subordinate Magistrate to form an opinion on this matter, there is no reason why we should not allow the District Magistrate himself to do it.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: It is not merely the second class Magistrate that comes within the scope of the section. Under section 437—Honourable Members will remember I am speaking of the old section 437, now re-numbered 436—an inquiry is held by a competent Magistrate, may be a second class Magistrate, may be a Sub-divisional Magistrate, may be a Magistrate of the first class. These people after hearing the whole evidence come to the conclusion that no case is made out for the prosecution and discharge the accused. On the same evidence as held by the different High Courts the District Magistrate says:

"I will come to a different conclusion on the evidence. Not having seen a single witness in the box, on the same evidence I take a different view and I will order a further trial before a Magistrate subordinate to me."

Here the District Magistrate of the District on the same evidence comes to the conclusion saying "I differ from the Magistrate who tried the case. Now I order a further trial." What does it mean? It really means a direction to the subordinate Magistrate. "Now take a different view and come to a contrary conclusion." Therefore, it is not right that such a power should be with the District Magistrate. It should rest only with the Sessions Judge. The object of this amendment is that the Sessions Judge should direct a re-trial and not the District Magistrate. That is the object of this amendment and I support it.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: May I ask the Honourable Member (Mr. Rangachariar) whether he is arguing on the present section 436?

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Yes.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Mr. Agnihotri's amendment refers to clause 437.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: He corrected it, Sir.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Mr. Agnihotri's amendment cannot apply to the old section 437. Apparently he proposes to omit the words "or District Magistrate" wherever they occur. I do not find the words "or District Magistrate" in section 437.

Mr. President: May I draw the attention of the Honourable Member that the words "or District Magistrate" occur twice in the old section 436.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I should merely like to point out that Mr. Agnihotri was arguing definitely for the amendment of new section 437. He referred entirely to the power of ordering committal. My Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, comes forward with an entirely different argument, an argument applicable to an entirely different section, a section to which the amendment as moved cannot apply in actual words.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"To clause 116 add the following:

'In section 437 the words 'or District Magistrate' wherever they occur in the said section shall be omitted'."

Dr. H. S. Gour: May I suggest a verbal correction with the permission of the Honourable Mover of the amendment? What his intention was, was to take away the power of ordering further inquiry by the District Magistrate under the old section 437.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: It could not have been the Honourable Member's intention for he has moved for the deletion of the words "or District Magistrate" wherever they occur. The words "or District Magistrate" do not occur at all in the old section 437.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I am surprised that the Honourable Members, being deprived of good arguments have taken to quibbling. Everybody knows what the object of the Honourable Mover of the amendment was. In the old section 437, now section 436, the object, as he has explained, was to take away the power of revising an order of discharge or dismissal of a complaint under section 203 from the District Magistrate and transfer it to the Court of Sessions. That is the sole object.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: If that was his object, his speech was curiously silent on the point. If I am right, he referred to commitment, and I would appeal to him to tell us whether he was not arguing on a question of commitment. I refuse to accept Dr. Gour's version of what the Honourable Member said and I believe the Honourable Member himself will refuse it.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member has himself disappeared. The question is that that amendment be made.

Dr. H. S. Gour: There is a clerical mistake. That mistake has arisen owing to misapprehension and the Honourable Member just now asked me to correct that mistake. I am told he has gone to refer to some books.

Mr. President: As has been pointed out by Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith, the section, as re-numbered, will be 436 if you leave out the word 'or.'

Dr. H. S. Gour: We are prepared to drop out the word 'or.'

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Otherwise the whole section 437 become nonsense.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: There is no doubt that a confusion has been created and the word 'or' is confusing enough but my meaning was the old section 436, which is now 437, though it is not clear in the amendment as it is. There is no doubt about it.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: The words to be omitted will be "and the District Magistrate may himself make or direct any subordinate court to make."

Mr. President: That is a different amendment at all events in form. Will the Honourable Member tell us what his intention was. If the Honourable Member will take the Code as it stands, which clause does he wish to refer to.

(Mr. Agnihotri stood up but did not speak.)

Mr. President: If the Honourable Member does not know, I must rule the whole discussion out of order.

The question is that clause 116 do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 117 was added to the Bill.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I move the following amendment:

"To clause 117-A, add the following:

'and to sub-section (2) the following shall be added, namely: 'and the accused person shall be entitled to establish his innocence and ask for acquittal in showing cause against enhancement'."

What happens, Sir, is this. Under the Code as it stands the High Court have been given the power to enhance the sentence in the case of persons who have been convicted by lower Courts. Now, Sir, the accused person takes the conviction, and he does not care to appeal. Rather than undergo the expense of going to the High Court and appealing against the sentence, he rather suffers the sentence and keeps quiet. But the police are not satisfied with the sentence imposed by the Magistrate or Sessions Judge who tried the case. They say, he should have been given a longer sentence or a larger punishment, and therefore, they drag the poor man to the High Court. When he appears before the High Court, it stands to reason that he should be able to say, "Well, I have been wrongly convicted, but you want to impose a heavier penalty now. I was content to let things alone, but here the police won't leave me alone, they have dragged me to the High Court, now let me establish my innocence, the case is not proved against me, the evidence is false, I want to establish that." Sir, there are Judges and Judges. Here unfortunately the luck of the accused comes into play. It depends upon the particular Judge—as we all know, the High Court contains 5, 6, 8, 9, 12 or 15 Judges. It all depends upon the particular Judge who hears the particular case or the particular Bench which hears the case. If he is a Judge who is leniently disposed, who is merciful, combines justice with mercy in the discharge of his functions, he will say, "if you are not guilty, I am prepared to hear it", but there are other Judges—I have been frequently told, when I had to defend cases, I have been told, "no, no, the conviction stands, you have not appealed, or the time is up, you have got 30 or 60 days for you to appeal, you have allowed the conviction to stand, show cause why I should not inflict the heavier penalty which the police want. I have to ask you to show cause against enhancement." Sir, I have been told so dozens of times; it is an injustice to do that. We must not leave it to the sweet will and discretion of particular Judges to say, whether they will hear that point or not. If the man is able to satisfy the revising authority, if the man is entitled to acquittal it is only right that the High Court should do so. I understand the Government Benches might say, "who ever said no." As I stated, there are Judges who have said that, in my own experience. Therefore, the principle is accepted, and all that they say is that it is unnecessary to provide it. I say it is necessary not only in my experience but in the experience of other friends who have practised in the High Courts, and I therefore think, Sir, it is a just provision, it is a necessary provision, we should make, and I hope the Government will not oppose it. I move it.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"To clause 117-A, add the following:

'and to sub-section (2) the following shall be added, namely: 'and the accused person shall be entitled to establish his innocence and ask for acquittal in showing cause against enhancement'."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I must oppose this amendment, because I consider it to be entirely superfluous and an attempt to introduce an excrescence into the Code. Mr. Rangachariar spoke of accused persons, convicted persons, who themselves did not want to appeal being dragged before the High Court by the Police. I ask whether any Member of this House has known of an accused person being dragged before the High Court by the police.

[Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith.]

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I said so metaphorically.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: The police never go to the High Court and ask for enhancement of a sentence. Occasionally, very occasionally, the Local Government may move the High Court to enhance sentences, but what happens in 90 per cent of cases, or even more than that, is that the High Court, in examining the statements that come up from the Sessions Courts, see what they consider to be an inadequate sentence, and they send for the record themselves, and then they cause a notice to be issued. There is no question of the police in this matter whatever.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: It does not matter who does it.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Now, Sir, I say this amendment is quite unnecessary for the following reason. Under section 430, it is definitely laid down that the High Court may in its discretion exercise any of the powers conferred on a Court of Appeal by section 423—I only refer to section 423, that is the only one that is relevant here—and in section 423, sub-section (1), clause (b); you find that one of the powers the High Court can exercise on appeal—and therefore can exercise in any case of revision when it sends for the record itself—is the power to reverse the finding and the sentence and acquit or discharge the accused or order him to be re-arrested, and so on. When the High Courts have there got that power distinctly thrown at their heads in the Code, I do not see any necessity for the Legislature to throw it at their heads again.

Dr. Nand Lal: Sir, I support this amendment which commends itself. It happens in many cases, Sir, that the accused is a poor man who has been wrongly convicted. He has no money, in his pocket, to engage a good Counsel, who in some cases charge somewhat heavy fees. Therefore justice is denied to him on account of poverty. He does not go to the appellate court. To illustrate what I mean, let us take a hypothetical case. An accused is prosecuted and convicted under section 325 by a first-class Magistrate and is sentenced to three months imprisonment. He is sent to jail and undergoes the imprisonment. After that he returns to his village and accosts his accuser: "I was innocent indeed; you put me in jail; however I am out now." That opponent feels jealous of the poor man's freedom and is annoyed. He approaches the police or some executive officer and then a petition for revision is filed in the High Court and notice is issued calling upon the man to shew cause why the sentence should not be enhanced. The man is very much surprised when that notice is served upon him, and he regrets that he has not filed any appeal. He, however, in obedience to the notice, appears, and explains that there is no evidence against him at all, that the conviction is altogether illegal and that the very section 325 does not embrace the injury which he is alleged to have caused to the complainant. The High Court Judge is convinced of the force of his arguments and finds that a real injustice has been done. What should he do in such a case? Should the High Court Judge, custodian of the justice of the province, not interfere? That is the recommendation, Sir, which has been made in this amendment, a very wholesome amendment, in the interests of justice, namely, that where there has been a miscarriage of justice and an unfortunate man, on no evidence at all, has been convicted but has not appealed against his sentence, that man may be helped by the High Court. Of course only the High Court has got the power of enhancing a sentence, not the Sessions Judge or other court. I think Sir Henry knows that, I think moreover that the Mover of this amendment should be thanked for trying to assist Government in seeing that injustice may not be done. I very strongly support this amendment and I hope the Government Benches will accept it.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith has opined that the amendment of my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, is superfluous. There is no opposition to it on principle. I have only to dispel the doubt which lingers in the minds of the gentlemen on the Treasury Benches and if I can convince them that the amendment is not superfluous, I hope they will then see their way to support this amendment. This appeal against an acquittal is made under section 417 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and the High Court sits as an appellate Court and the sole question which arises is as to whether the sentence passed upon a person should not be enhanced or an acquittal for a graver offence should not be converted into a verdict of guilty and conviction. The provisions of section 439 to which Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith referred are provisions embodied in Chapter XXXII which relates to reference and revision, and section 439 to which my friend referred is a section relating to revision. His argument is that a Court under section 439 is empowered to acquit a person if it comes to its knowledge that the accused is not guilty. Now, let us examine this statement. I have no doubt that my Honourable friend will admit that it is the established practice of all the High Courts formulated in a series of cases that the High Court will not interfere on a question of fact. Consequently, acting under section 439 the High Court cannot revise a finding of fact, or rather it refuses to do so. Therefore, I submit, that when the Court is examining the proceedings under section 439 it will not go into a question of fact. Whereas, assume the case of an appeal against an acquittal or for the enhancement of a sentence already passed. There the Court exercises larger jurisdiction and examines the whole record and can revise both findings of fact and law. That is a distinction between my Honourable friend's amendment and the explanation given by the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith. His explanation, I submit, opens an extremely narrow door through which many an accused has failed to get through. It is for the purpose of giving a person who has been brought to the bar of the High Court to answer why a sentence passed upon him should not be enhanced the right of showing by arguments a fortiori not only that the sentence should not be enhanced but the whole conviction is wrong and should be set aside. Should he be prevented from doing so? My learned friend says that no Court will ever prevent an accused appearing before the bar of the Court from showing this. He has testified to his own experience; and I regret to say, Sir, that in my long practice at the bar I have known Judges who are blood-suckers and who will strain every point against the accused and who will say surely

Mr. President: Order, order. I do not think I can allow that phrase to pass.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I withdraw it, Sir. I have known judges who are of a convicting predisposition and who will not allow the accused to show that the conviction should be set aside unless they are expressly given the power under the Statute to interfere with a conviction. My friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has referred to the case of a person who did not appeal after his conviction. May I point out to the House that there are cases in which an appeal might have been dismissed against the conviction and the Judge concerned might have reported the case for the enhancement of sentence. And when that case comes up before the High Court the High Court may find that not only the enhancement is unjustifiable but the conviction is equally unjustifiable. In that case what is the High Court to do? There is a conviction, a wrong conviction; there is a motion for enhancement and that enhancement is under trial when the Court comes to the conclusion that both the enhancement and conviction are unjustifiable. Mr. Rangachariar's amendment enables the Court not only to refuse an enhancement but also to set aside a conviction. That, I submit, is a case which is not met by any express provision of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and I therefore submit that this House should support the amendment. One word more, Sir; the circuitous provisions to which Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith has drawn the attention of the House, may I point out, have not been usually used for the purpose of acquitting people in cases covered by Mr. Rangachariar's amendment; and in defining a criminal procedure I would rather err on the side of superfluity and make a matter clear upon which any doubt existed than let matters remain in doubt and suspense and trust the Judges to read section 439 more liberally and use these provisions for a purpose for which they are not normally used and intended to be used. I support the amendment.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I rise to offer a few remarks with reference to those words which have just fallen from my Honourable and learned friend, Dr. Gour. It is very difficult, Sir, to follow that portion of his argument which related to appeals from acquittals. That, Sir, has nothing to do with the present question. We are dealing with an application for revision for enhancement of sentence. My Honourable friend suggests that in such cases the High Courts hold that they should not go into questions of fact. That may be true, Sir, about general revision proceedings; but is it true, I ask my Honourable friend, as regards proceedings for enhancement of sentence?

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sometimes.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Most certainly not, as my Honourable friend knows.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I know the High Court much more than you do.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: When going into the question of enhancement of sentence you must clearly go into the facts.

Dr. Nand Lal: I think in some fit and deserving cases they go into the question of facts too.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: My Honourable friend, Sir, suggests that there is no express provision enabling the High Court to take this action. Well, Sir, he certainly cannot, I should imagine, have read section 439 with section 423. If he does so he will find that there is a definite express provision of the law enabling the High Court to take the action which is proposed by the amendment of my Honourable friend. I oppose the amendment.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Sir, you have very rightly called to order Dr. Gour for the very unparliamentary language he has used regarding High Court Judges. As one, Sir, who has been connected with the High Court, I think it my duty to resent the language which has been used; I believe, in the heat of the moment he allowed himself to be . . .

Dr. H. S. Gour: Is my Honourable friend in order in referring to an expression which I have already withdrawn? It is as good as if I never used it.

Mr. President: If an Honourable Member withdraws an expression and the Chair accepts his withdrawal, the incident is usually regarded as closed; but the Chair has no power to prevent any other Member from referring to it.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: I only wanted to say further as one who has been connected with the High Court, I am glad that you asked this expression to be withdrawn and I am glad that my Honourable friend has done so.

With regard to the matter which has just been referred to by Mr. Tonkinson, I would like to say a word. When a case comes up by way of revision before the High Court, the Judges consider that in disposing of that matter they are bound by what are called findings of fact. For example, a matter may have been before a second class Magistrate, then on appeal before a District Magistrate or a Sessions Judge; and it would come by way of revision to the High Court. What the High Court Judges do say often is that they will not interfere. But supposing on the findings of fact on examining the records the Judges think it necessary to call upon the accused to show cause why his sentence should not be enhanced; then the High Court Judges may very well say 'we are only giving you notice to show cause why the sentence should not be enhanced and we shall not allow the whole inquiry to be re-opened. That very often happens. I have argued cases, and I have been told by Judges that this is practically what is known as second appeal, that it is not open to the Court to go into questions of fact; and that they must take the findings as they are and pass a sentence which is adequate to the findings which have been recorded. That is what has been said very often, and it is against that Dr. Gour has raised his voice and it is against that the amendment of Mr. Rangachariar is directed. There is nothing wrong in the High Court Judges doing it, because the general power in regard to revision is after accepting the findings of fact to come to a decision on law or on the question of sentence; and very often Judges refuse to re-open the case. But where an accused is called upon to show cause why his sentence should not be enhanced, we want powers to be reserved to the High Courts to enable them to exercise powers of re-opening questions of fact and to find whether there has been a proper conviction or not. It is for that purpose this amendment has been brought in, and I think the Government ought to accept it.

Rai Bahadur D. C. Barua (Assam Valley: Non-Muhanumadan): Sir, I beg to support this amendment. I do so among other grounds on the question of economy also. Sir, if a person is really innocent, why should the tax-payer be compelled to pay his expense in the gaol? From the point of view of economy also, I should think that it should be open to an accused person called upon to say why his sentence should not be enhanced to show that he was innocent. Sir, I can imagine cases in which no appeals are allowed. Appeals are not allowed ordinarily in those cases in which a person is sentenced to a month's imprisonment by a Magistrate of the first class, or in the case of a person who is sentenced to undergo three months' imprisonment when he is tried summarily or six months by a Presidency Magistrate. Sir, if a person is really innocent why should the taxpayer be compelled to pay expenses for the maintenance of that person in the gaol? Of course, when the High Court or any Court whatsoever revises a case and attempts to find out whether the accused was guilty in a certain manner, it is certainly in a position to find out that he was not guilty also. If the Court really comes to this conclusion, that he was not guilty, then in all fairness he should be acquitted, although a subordinate Court came to the conclusion that he should be convicted. Sir, for these two reasons generally I beg to support the amendment, because in those cases in which the case is not appealable and the accused could not appeal and consequently suffered imprisonment, and if that case goes for revision before a higher tribunal, then it is clearly the duty of that higher tribunal to act in this way or that way—if he is really innocent to acquit him or if he is really guilty or deserves a severer sentence, then to enhance the sentence. Under these circumstances, Sir, I beg to support the motion.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"To clause 117-A, add the following:

'and to sub-section (2) the following shall be added, namely 'and the accused person shall be entitled to establish his innocence and ask for acquittal in showing cause against enhancement'."

The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 117-A, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Clauses 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124 and 125 were added to the Bill.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu (Godavari cum Kistna: Non-Muhammadar Rural): Sir, with your permission, I wish to move the following amendment in lieu of the one which stands in my name on the printed list:

"That in clause 126, in sub-section (1) of proposed new section 476, for the words 'order the offence to be inquired into' the words 'record a finding to that effect' be substituted."

This amendment is made in the interests of improved drafting and I leave it for the acceptance of the House.

The motion was adopted.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, in lieu of the printed amendment, in order to make the matter clear, I move, Sir, that:

"In clause 126, in sub-section (1) of proposed new section 476, for the words 'and may, if the alleged offence is non-bailable, send the accused in custody to or in any other case may take sufficient security for his appearance before such Magistrate' the following be substituted, namely:

'and may take sufficient security for the appearance of the accused before such Magistrate, or, if the alleged offence is non-bailable, may, if it thinks it necessary so to do, send the accused in custody to such Magistrate'."

(At this stage Mr. President vacated and Sir Campbell Rhodes took the Chair.)

The object of this is not to make it compulsory on the Magistrate to send the accused in custody even in non-bailable cases. I want to leave a discretion to the Magistrate to come to a conclusion that it is necessary for him to do so. Otherwise he may take security for his appearance. This is a section dealing with complaints made by Courts. With these words I move the amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move the following amendment:

"In clause 126, in sub-clause (3) of section 476, substitute 'shall' for 'may if he thinks fit'."

Under the clause as it has been provided in the Bill, if a civil, revenue or criminal court files a complaint under section 195, sub-section (1) clause (b) or clause (c), the Magistrate has been given discretion to proceed with the case even if the accused has filed an appeal against the decree or order of such Court. This by itself seems an anomalous procedure. If we refer to section 195 (1) (b) and (c) we find that the offences for which such complaints could be filed are such as giving false evidence, producing false or forged documents in evidence, or using false documents as genuine, or filing false complaints, or cases of perjury,—and these are the offences which come under section 195. If the man is to be prosecuted before the appeal in the original case is decided, there will be much injustice done to that man, as the appellate court may afterwards find the very documents to be true and genuine and which the lower Court found to be forged or false. The very evidence which the original Court found to be false or a perjury, the appellate Court may find to be true and genuine; and on that very evidence the appellate Court may set aside the order or the decree of the Lower Court. What will then be the position of such a person who on the basis of the original Court's order had been prosecuted under section 195 or against whom a complaint had been filed? What will be his fate? He would not suffer if the Court was reasonable enough to have adjourned the case when the appeal was filed and had not proceeded with it. At the same time if the Court had proceeded with the case and perchance convicted him, the result would be that the accused might have suffered the penalty before the decision of the appeal in the original case. There will be many cases of such injustice and hardship. It may be questioned that the appeal might take a year or two and should those cases be kept pending so long? I would say that there should be no objection even if the appeal were to take one or two years. Suppose a case is filed before a Magistrate and the Magistrate were to convict the accused and sentence him with imprisonment which may range from one or two to six months, and the appeal is decided after a year, and the appellate court finds that the alleged forged document on which the original complaint was based was a genuine one. What is the fate of this poor accused who was not only convicted but has also served the full sentence passed on him for that offence which subsequently has been found to be no offence at all. It is a very salutary rule that until the appeal is decided the Magistrates should not proceed with the trial of such persons against whom complaints have been filed. I may give a concrete instance. Under the old section 195, a document was found to be forged by the civil court and on that basis that court ordered the prosecution of a person under section 195. The case was prosecuted before a first class Magistrate. I happened to appear for the complainant in that case, who had obtained the sanction, from the Additional District Judge to prosecute that man. The accused put in an application in revision before the Judicial Commissioner's Court; and the accused applied for the postponement of that case, but the learned Magistrate was not pleased to postpone it. He proceeded with the trial of the case. Fortunately for the accused in the revision court the application was soon decided and the revision court, that is the Judicial Commissioner's Court held that the sanction was improper and that the document was not forged. Now, the House can realise what would the fate of the accused have been if the revision court had not passed an early order in that case. This Magistrate may have considered that a District Judge or Additional District Judge who has given such a sanction must have given it on proper and reasonable grounds and may have himself come to the same conclusion as that of the Additional District Judge and may have convicted that man before that revision petition was decided and the accused may even have suffered the punishment. Such a case would have been very hard for that poor accused. In order to safeguard such cases I submit that the amendment which I propose will be a salutary one. I do not mean to say that ordinarily the Magistrates do not allow time. They do allow time but as in the case I have mentioned there are also cases in which the postponement is not allowed. The Magistrates have to explain to the Sessions Judge and the District Magistrate in their calendar statements the reason of the delay in trial. They are anxious to avoid increase of the average duration of trial in their Courts. I submit that if my amendment is accepted it will not hamper justice in any way. I therefore put forward my amendment for the consideration of the House.

Mr. Chairman: The question is:

"That in clause 126, in sub-section (3) of section 476, substitute 'shall' for 'may if he thinks fit'."

Dr. H. S. Gour: The question may be put.

Mr. P. E. Percival: I do not know what the attitude of the Government will be in regard to this amendment, but I prefer Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's amendment. It is better worded.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 126 was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I propose, Sir, that this section 127 may be taken up later, because at the informal meeting which we had this morning I was told that the Government was prepared to accept the principle and would give us a redraft. The redraft has just been handed to me, but I am not in a position to go through it properly, therefore I request that the consideration of this clause may be taken later.

Dr. H. S. Gour: In view of the lateness of the hour, I move the adjournment of the House; I also have a motion, No. 342,* which will require discussion.

Mr. Chairman: Is it the decision of the House that Amendment* No. 339 should not be taken up but deferred? (Voices: "Yes".)

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, I was thinking that this section, amendment No. 341* covers one of those matters in which the racial distinctions question is involved in the Bill which was placed before us the other day and Government, I understand, is going to put it up again, and to see whether they can revise it. If so, I do not like, Sir, to press the amendment, but if that is not so, I suppose there will be a clear understanding from the Government Bench that the matter will come up; if not, Sir, I am afraid I shall have to move it in the ordinary course.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: It will come up in the course of the discussion on the Bill referred to.

Mr. K. Ahmed: On that understanding I do not move it, Sir, at present.

Mr. Chairman: The question is that the consideration of clauses 127A and 127B be deferred.

The motion was adopted.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I have already moved, Sir, for the adjournment of the House; I have said that this clause requires discussion, and perhaps it will take some time; I therefore move that the House be now adjourned.

Mr. Chairman: In the temporary absence of the President, I am not prepared to adjourn the House. The motion can be renewed on his return.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, I was given an assurance by the President that this clause would not be taken up to-day, but if you, Sir, insist upon my moving it, I shall do so.

* In the List of Amendments.

Mr. Chairman: If it is the wish of the House that it should be taken up later, I am willing to pass on to the next amendment.

(An Honourable Member: "It follows the other.")

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: I may mention, Sir, that the President told us that he would not take up any case after 5-30, that as far as possible he won't take up any case, that unless it was absolutely necessary to continue the discussion, he won't do so—that is what he told me.

Dr. H. S. Gour: If it is the desire of yourself, Sir, that we should continue the discussion, you must allow us to go home and take our supper, and we shall return.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I was not prepared to hear, that any Member of the House should give directions to you, Sir, as to what you should do or think proper. As far as the adjournment is concerned, we are entirely in your hands. If Honourable Members opposite think that they are not able to continue this discussion, and if you are persuaded that their case is reasonable we shall not oppose it. I prefer that these proposals should come entirely from the opposite side of the House. We do not get tired of the good work.

Mr. Chairman: Do I understand that Dr. Gour does not wish to go on with this amendment?

Dr. H. S. Gour: No, Sir. I wish to go on with the amendment but not at the present moment. But if it is the desire of the occupants of the Treasury Benches that the discussion should continue I only wanted a few minutes respite for the reason I have already given. The Honourable the Home Member thought that my suggestion was improper, but I have no doubt that he also occasionally indulges in that impropriety himself.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I said, Sir, that I left it entirely in your hands. The suggestion which I said was improper was that you would have to allow the House to go away to supper.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, only yesterday there was no reason why the House should be adjourned after four o'clock. It was neither left to the discretion of the Honourable the President of the Assembly nor to the discretion of the Honourable Members who wanted

Mr. Chairman: The Assembly now stands adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Saturday, the 10th February, 1928.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Saturday, 10th February, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

MESSAGES OF CONGRATULATION ON THE BIRTH OF H. R. H. PRINCESS MARY'S SON.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Before the regular business of the day begins, I ask your permission, Sir, to move a Resolution which I am quite sure will be carried with acclamation by the whole House. We saw an announcement in the papers the other day that Her Royal Highness Princess Mary had a son born to her. That makes the first grandson to His Imperial Majesty the King Emperor. Sir, according to Hindu ideas the very name of a king signifies that he gladdens the hearts of people and a true subject is he who rejoices in the success and happiness of the Royal household. Sir, we are very happy that His Imperial Majesty has the first grandson through his daughter, Princess Mary. We wish you, Sir, to convey to the Princess our hearty congratulations on the birth of a son and to His Imperial Majesty our felicitations on the birth of a grandson.

Mr. N. M. Samarth (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I associate myself with what has fallen from Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, and I have been asked by the National Party to request you to convey the same message to His Imperial Majesty the King Emperor.

Sir Campbell Rhodes (Bengal: European): Sir, on behalf of the non-official European community, I have much pleasure in endorsing the Resolution proposed in such eloquent terms by my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. The general rejoicing throughout the Empire at the birth of a son to the daughter of our beloved Emperor will be echoed widely throughout this land, where the advent of a son and heir is not only a happy social event but is also an event of deep religious significance. I heartily support the proposal.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I most heartily share the view which has been placed before this Assembly by my learned friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. The birth of a son is an indication of great happiness, and I think the whole Empire will rejoice in it. With these few remarks I support the motion.

Mr. President: The question is that the President be instructed to convey an expression of the profound pleasure and thankfulness of the Legislative Assembly at the birth of a son to Princess Mary; and that a dutiful and loyal message be conveyed to His Majesty the King Emperor of the pleasure of the Legislative Assembly at the birth of a grandson.

The motion was adopted.

THE MALABAR (COMPLETION OF TRIALS) SUPPLEMENTING BILL.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley (Home Member): Sir, I ask leave to introduce a Bill to supplement the Malabar (Completion of Trials) Act, 1922.

It may be as well perhaps that I should explain to the House the exact purport of this small Bill.

There have been a series of special Ordinances issued by the Governor General in connection with the Malabar Rebellion; I need deal only with that aspect of these Ordinances which provided for the special trial of prisoners. The original Martial Law Ordinance established courts under the authority of the Military Commander, and subsequently a special tribunal was instituted. That Ordinance expired in February last. At the time it lapsed there were still a very large number of pending cases with which the ordinary courts of the districts were not able to deal. A further Ordinance was thus necessary and under the Malabar (Restoration of Order) Ordinance, 25th February, 1922, the Local Government were given authority to appoint special courts, special Judges, special Magistrates and summary courts. That Ordinance, in its turn, expired in August last and on its expiry the Madras Government still found itself confronted with a considerable number of cases. In some instances trial had already begun, in others the accused were arrested and were awaiting trial, and in a large number of other cases the accused had not even been arrested. It was felt in regard to the part heard cases, and those in which the accused were already under arrest that delay must be avoided, and the Governor General in Council, at the instance of the Local Government, passed a still further Ordinance, the Malabar (Completion of Trials) Ordinance, 1922, of 19th August last. Under this special Magistrates and special Judges already appointed were enabled to continue the trial of these cases. Arrangements were thus made for the definite class of cases to which I have referred, namely, those in which trial had begun or accused had already been arrested. A large class of cases however still remained for disposal in which, though information had been lodged and inquiries completed, or were well on their way, the accused had not been arrested. There were limits to the capacity both of the investigating authority and of the courts, and these two causes combined to make it impossible to take steps against a large number of persons who were nevertheless believed to be guilty of crimes so serious that with every desire to arrive at a speedy end of the proceedings, the Local Government could not overlook them. The Madras Government therefore in December last placed before their Legislature and passed a Bill known as the Malabar (Completion of Trials) Bill, the principal effect of which was to extend section 30 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to special Magistrates in the district of Malabar, with power to try under the provisions of that section offences certified to be offences connected with the events which necessitated the enforcement or continuance of Martial Law in the district of Malabar. That Bill further provided a remedy for a technical difficulty arising from the Completion of Trials Ordinance which was passed in August last, and which will expire in a few days time. When it expires there will undoubtedly be some cases in which an appeal has not been finally decided or has not yet been lodged. There will then be left no successor to the courts which will have disappeared along with the Ordinance, and there will therefore be no court to which the appellant could apply for records or to which the appellate judgment could be notified. Section 4 of the Madras Act rectified this position by laying down the courts which should have authority for taking action in order to give effect to the sentences passed by the expiring special courts or by any court in appeal regarding the judgments or orders of such courts. Section 5 further provided that notwithstanding such expiration an appeal should lie in any case in which an appeal would have lain but for such expiration, and that such appeal should be heard and decided by the High Court in cases in which under the Ordinance an appeal would have lain to the High Court, and that in other cases appeal should lie to the Sessions or Additional Sessions Judge, South Malabar. Now comes in the purpose of our present Bill. Section 5 of the Madras Act, to which I have referred, so far as it purported to give appellate jurisdiction to the High Court, was ultra vires of the local Legislature, and it is therefore necessary that the central Legislature should pass an Act giving the required jurisdiction to the High Court. The purpose of our Bill is therefore to supplement the lack of statutory authority in the Madras Legislature and its effect will merely be to confirm the action of that Legislature in making a provision for appeals to the High Court in cases where but for such provision no appeal would legally lie.

In the circumstances I have explained I have no doubt the Assembly will not only agree to the introduction of this measure, but will have no objection to further consideration being treated as a matter of urgency. The effect of the Ordinance lapses on the 18th of this month, and I propose therefore, if leave is given to-day, to put the further consideration of the Bill down for Monday next.

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Sir, I introduce the Bill.

THE INDIAN STAMP (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member): Sir, I move for leave to introduce a Bill further to amend the Indian Stamp Act, 1899.

The facts of this case are clearly stated in the Statement of Objects and Reasons. Non-judicial stamps are at present a provincial source of revenue; but they are subject to all-India legislation. Last year the Bengal Government submitted proposals to us for the enhancement of the stamp duty on these instruments; but on looking through their proposals we saw that there were certain instruments on which the stamp duty must be uniform all over India. Accordingly we reserved those instruments—a list of them is given in the Statement of Objects and Reasons—for all-India legislation, provided that Local Governments, after they were consulted, agreed that such legislation was necessary.

We have now consulted all Local Governments, and as a result of that consultation we have decided that we do not desire to enhance the duty on certain of these instruments such as acknowledgments, bills of exchange, cheques, delivery orders, receipts and shipping orders; but we propose—that is the object of this Bill—we propose to enhance the duty on the remaining instruments—share certificates, letters of allotment of shares, letters of credit and proxies. We also propose to enhance the duty upon demand promissory notes and we also desire to make certain changes in regard to policies of insurance such as annual earthquake insurance. As the Act is now drafted they pay the same duty as live assurances, which is a heavy one. We want to bring that class of policy under the same head as fire insurance. The revenue which will accrue from these proposals, if they are accepted by the House, will of course go to the Local Governments.

I move for leave, Sir, to introduce the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I introduce the Bill.

THE INDIAN FACTORIES (AMENDMENT) BILL.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member): Sir, I beg to move that the Bill further to amend the Indian Factories Act, 1911, be taken into consideration. I explained very fully, Sir, the objects of this Bill when I introduced it last week, and at this stage I do not think it is necessary for me to say more. I move, Sir, that the Bill be taken into consideration.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 1 was added to the Bill.

Mr. N. M. Joshi (Nominated: Labour Interests): Sir, I beg to move the following amendment:

"For clause 2 of the Bill substitute the following:

'In clause (a) of sub-section (1) of section 22 of the Indian Factories Act, 1911, (hereinafter referred to as the said Act) the words 'has had or' shall be omitted, and for the words 'one of the three days immediately preceding or succeeding the Sunday' the following shall be substituted, namely:

'any other day in the week consistently with this Act'."

Sir, before I ask the House to accept my amendment, I should like the House to consider what were the intentions of the Legislature when the Factory Act was passed last year. The object, the apparent object, with which Government have introduced this Bill and this section is that they wanted to give effect to the intentions of the Legislature. Therefore, it is necessary for us to see what the real intentions of the Legislature were when they passed the Factories (Amendment) Bill last year. I would like the Members to refer to the wording of the section and see what it intends to do. What the section intends to do is that a particular Sunday belonging to a certain week should be transferred from that week into another week for the purpose of calculating the hours of work. In the first place, Sir, I consider this drafting to be not a proper drafting. The other day my friend Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith found fault with some Members for bringing into existence unmarried grandfathers. Now, Sir, I want to congratulate his department on bringing into existence a week of 8 days and a week containing 2 Sundays. That is what the expert draftsman of this Bill has done. Let the Members carefully read the words. I will draw their attention to the wording:

"For the purpose of calculating the weekly hours of work of such person the Sunday be deemed to be included in the preceding week."

That week should be deemed to have 8 days and that week should be deemed to have two Sundays. This is the drafting of the Bill, but, Sir, I do not mind the drafting at all. What I want the House to do is to give effect to the intentions of the Legislature. Now what were the intentions of the Legislature? Sir, not being a lawyer I cannot discuss with such great skill as some of my friends did discuss that question of the intention of the Legislature last year about the votable and non-votable items. A great deal of skill was exhibited by our friends; I do not propose to do that. Now how are the intentions of the Legislature to be judged? The original section in the Bill which deals with this subject is this:

"No person shall be employed in any factory on a Sunday unless he has had or will have a holiday for a whole day on one of the three days immediately preceding or succeeding the Sunday."

This is the wording of the original section. Now what is found in practice is this, that you cannot under certain circumstances, if you observe all the sections of the Factories Act, substitute the Sunday for every other day in the week, especially you cannot substitute a Sunday by a Thursday or Friday or Saturday. Now my Honourable friend Mr. Innes and his department will say that "if you observe all the rules of the Bill you cannot substitute a particular Sunday by a Thursday, Friday or Saturday; and therefore the intention of the Legislature was to break the other rule." My point is that what the Legislature intended was this, that this clause about the holiday should be followed as far as it could be followed by observing all the other sections of the Act. It did not mean that in each case the employer should be able to substitute for Sunday any one of the days in the week. That was not the intention of Legislature at all. The intention of the Legislature was that the employer should be able to substitute for a Sunday some other day if it was permitted by the other sections of the Act. I think, Sir, this is the ordinary interpretation which laymen like myself can put upon any section of any Bill.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): There are two holidays per week?

Mr. N. M. Joshi: It may be two holidays, sometimes three holidays. My friend Mr. Jamnadas is surprised to see . . .

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I am only asking. . .

Mr. N. M. Joshi: My friend, Mr. Jamnadas, is surprised to see that there should be two holidays in a week. I will draw his attention to the list of holidays which the Mill Owners' Association of Bombay have printed and circulated. In that list at least there are two occasions on which there are not only two holidays in a week but three consecutive holidays. So he need not be surprised. I have got the list. If he wants it I can supply him a copy.

Sir, that was the intention of the Act. The Legislature never intended that the other important sections of the Act should be contravened in order to enable the employer to substitute a holiday for a Sunday. If that had been the intention the Legislature would have made it quite clear. Sir, I admit that the wording of this section is not happy, and if the Legislature had been careful the wording would have been changed. But let the Legislature know how the wording came to be here. I want to explain to Members the circumstances under which this defective wording came into this Act. The original intention of the Government of India was to make Sunday compulsory. The wording was "that Sunday shall be a holiday," and there was no option given to the employer to substitute any other day for Sunday. That was the intention of the Government of India; that was the original Bill. The Joint Committee thought that the employer should be given option to substitute some other day for that Sunday. But I accept this that the Joint Committee intended that power should be given to the employer to substitute any other day for Sunday, but it was never the intention of the Joint Committee or of this Legislature that employers should be enabled to do this even by breaking the other rules. No mention was made either in the Joint Committee or in the Legislature that employers should be given the power to substitute any other holiday by even breaking the other rules. Now, Sir, the Objects and Reasons of the Bill make it clear which rule is contravened by the Bill. The rule contravened is that of 60 hours a week. This is not an ordinary small rule. This is one of the main principles of the Act that there should be no more than 60 hours a week. Now what Government tries to do is this. Whenever in such a case where the employer wants to substitute one particular day for a Sunday and where this rule of 60 hours a week is contravened, the Legislature gives him power to calculate this Sunday into the previous week. That is to say, the Legislature gives the power to the employer to give a go-by to the principle of 60 hours a week and introduces another principle, namely, of 120 hours in a fortnight. If, Sir, the employer is to be given the power of substituting another principle, namely, of 120 hours for a fortnight instead of 60 hours a week, the Government can go one step forward, and instead of making 120 hours for a fortnight, let Government say once for all that the employer should have the power of observing 3,120 hours in a year instead of 120 hours in a fortnight. But let the House know that when you substitute for 60 hours a week 120 hours a fortnight, you are making a change in the principle. Sir, moreover, when you make this change of principle of substituting 120 hours a fortnight for 60 hours a week, you are tampering with the International Obligations. They had ratified the convention for 60 hours a week, not 120 hours for a fortnight or 3,120 hours for a year. They had ratified a convention for 60 hours a week and in order to tamper with that convention and that ratification, Government proposes that that Sunday should be transferred into the previous week. I do not think, Sir, that this will be considered to be a very straightforward conduct in a very great Government. Now, Sir, I think the mistake of the Legislature or of the Joint Committee was that, when they changed the original Bill as drafted by the Government of India, instead of making their own draft they lifted up from the original Factories Bill the old clause and put it in the new Bill without knowing that that old clause would contravene the other amendments which are made to the Factories Act. That was the reason why the mistake was made. The draftsman or the Joint Committee, I do not know which, put in the Bill a clause which belonged to the old Act without considering whether that Act would break any other rule, and therefore the mistake was caused. Now, what the Government say is this: As the Legislature have passed these words, therefore the Legislature must have intended that the other rules should be broken in order that effect should be given to these words. What I say is this: That, as these words cannot be given effect to, the Legislature never intended to pass this rule as it is. The Legislature intended to put in some words which could be put in here consistently with the other provisions of this Bill. Now, Sir, I want to know from Government why they are making this change. Is it because they want only to make the Act consistent or because there is a demand from some people for this change? As far as I know, there is not much widespread demand from the country. I have not seen Calcutta Chambers of Commerce or any other Associations asking for this change. At least Government have not told us that. As far as I know, the Mill Owners' Association of Bombay did want this change in order that they should be able to cut down the holidays which the employees would get according to the present Act. According to the present Act, I think they will have to give about 62 holidays. They are prepared to give 55 or 56 or 57 holidays. The Act gives the employees a few more holidays. The Bombay Mill Owners' Association do not propose to do that. Therefore, they go to the Government of India and ask them to make this change. I want to know, Sir, whether the government of this country is to be conducted by the real Government of India or by the Mill Owners' Association or the Chambers of Commerce or the Landholders' Association. I do not think it was right for the Government of India to have yielded to this demand of the Mill Owners of Bombay in this fashion and introduced an absurd provision in the Act altogether, making the week consist of 8 days and of 2 Sundays. After all, what is the real substance involved in this change?—4 or 5 more holidays which will have to be given to the employees—if you keep the Act as it is or if you accept my amendment in order to regularise the whole Act. Now, is it really worth doing? Even if the Legislature considers that the intention of the Act was to do this. Suppose I do not admit for a moment that the Legislature intended to do what the Government is proposing to do—but suppose, by chance, it is done, is it right for you to take away the holidays from the employees in this fashion? Sir, I do not think the Legislature will accept that proposition, even if the Government of India has brought it forward.

There is one thing more, Sir. It may be said, when my friend Captain Sassoon begins to defend his position or the Government of India's position, that the piece-workers in the factories will suffer, that, if you give them two holidays, they will get less wages. That is an argument, Sir, which has been used always, not on this occasion only. When the Factories Act was amended and the hours of work were reduced from 12 to 10 or from any number of hours to 60 hours a week, the same argument was used. At any time, whenever there is going to be a change either in the hours of work or in the holidays, the same argument will be used that the piece-workers will suffer. But, Sir, no disaster has yet fallen upon the country on account of the several changes that we have made so far in our Factories Act. And by giving a few more holidays to the employees, no very great disaster will follow either. Therefore, Captain Sassoon or my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes need not very much worry themselves about the great loss which the working classes will suffer by enjoying 4 or 5 more holidays in the year. I, therefore, think that my amendment, which gives effect to the real intentions of the Legislature, namely, that the employer should be able to substitute 8 days in the week for the Sunday, should be accepted by the House.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I feel that I am somewhat protean in my incarnations in this Assembly. A fortnight ago, when the Mines Bill was being considered, I was held up to the Assembly by Mr. Joshi as a hardened reactionary. Last week, when I, with the assistance of this House, passed the Workmen's Compensation Bill, I am afraid that some of the employers were inclined to look upon me as a crack-brained idealist. Mr. Joshi for his part regarded me as a pilgrim on the path of progress but with frequent backslidings from which he endeavoured to dissuade me. Again, to-day, I stand before you as the henchman of the millowners of Bombay. Sir, I decline to accept that characterisation. If the House wishes to know why I introduced this Bill, it is because I take a different view of my responsibility from Mr. Joshi. Mr. Joshi stands before the House as a picker-up of unconsidered trifles; he stands before the House as a man who wishes to take advantage of an obscurity and defect in the Bill in order to get for labour a few more holidays which the House never intended to give them. I, Sir, stand before the House as a man who does his very best to hold the balance evenly on either side, to do justice both to the employer and to the workman. Now, Sir, let me read the Act. The Act as it stands at present says:

"No person shall be employed in any factory on Sunday unless he had or will have had a holiday for a whole day on one of the 3 days immediately preceding or succeeding the Sunday."

The intention of that section, whatever Mr. Joshi may say, was to enable the employer to substitute for a Sunday an important religious festival whether that religious festival preceded or succeeded the Sunday. And as I explained when I introduced this Bill, we have not been able to carry out that intention because, when we passed the Act, we did not realise what the cumulative effect would be of this clause, read together with the definition of week and read with section 27 which prescribes that no person shall be employed in a factory for more than 60 hours a week. Now, the result of the section as it stands at present is that, if an important religious festival occurs on Friday or Saturday and if the employer gives his workman that holiday instead of the following Sunday, then, if he works for 9 or 10 hours a day in the succeeding week, he will have infringed section 27 of the Act because then he will have worked more than 60 hours a week. That was the point which we had overlooked and that is the point which we now wish to correct by this simple expedient which I have placed before the House. Mr. Joshi has held that up to derision, but I defy Mr. Joshi or anybody else in this House to find a more simple or more convenient way of remedying what is an undoubted defect in the Act. I can speak with feeling on this point for my Honourable friend Mr. Clow and myself spent a whole morning in trying to find out the best way of dealing with that defect. Now, Mr. Joshi has attempted—or I will say he has laboured at the attempt—to prove that the intention of the Legislature was that section 22 (a) should be subject to section 27; that is to say, the employer might substitute a religious festival day for a Sunday provided that he did not exceed the sixty-hour week. Mr. Joshi, I think, has not looked at the proviso to section 22. The proviso to section 22 says.

"Provided that no such substitution shall be made as will result in any person working for more than ten consecutive days."

It is perfectly clear, therefore, that the Legislature did contemplate that a man should work for ten consecutive days and that in these circumstances the sixty-hour week should not be adhered to. Mr. Joshi has also said that my proposal involves an infringement of the International Convention. That is entirely a mistake. The International Convention provides a weekly rest day. Well, Sir, even under my proposal, we do give a weekly rest day. We do give a sixty-hour week. It is true that in certain cases we do not give a sixty-hour week if the week be taken as a week from Sunday to Saturday. But the effect of our proposal will be that in the seven days beginning with Thursday and ending in the following Wednesday the man will not work more than sixty hours. He will always get one holiday and so, though in a different way, we have entirely carried out our International Convention. The trouble has merely arisen from our definition of 'week.'

Now, let me take Mr. Joshi's amendment. Mr. Joshi says that 'no person shall be employed in any factory on a Sunday unless he will have a holiday on any other day in the week consistent with this Act. The effect of that amendment will be to make the Act even more restrictive than it is at present, for it will mean that an employer will not be able to substitute for a Sunday any but the first three days of the week. I should like the House to note this point. It means that the employer will not be able to substitute as a holiday for Sunday any but Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday, because, normally, the week begins on a Sunday. We will take it that the first Sunday is given as a holiday. Then the man works six days, then works again on Sunday and then works on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday. He will then have worked ten days consecutively. The House will therefore see that it will be quite impossible for the employer to substitute Thursday, Friday or Saturday in any circumstances for a Sunday, because he infringes against the ten days' rule. Now, the object of my amendment is to give that elasticity to the employer which is necessary in order to enable that employer to substitute religious festivals for the English Sunday. It suits the convenience of the workman and it suits the convenience of the employer. There is no reason at all why, if the workmen prefer to have a holiday on an important religious festival day, they should not do so. There is no reason why, against their own will and their own convenience, they should be tied down to the Sunday. Mr. Joshi says "Let them have these extra holidays." If that is Mr. Joshi's point, let him make a frontal attack. Let him propose to amend the Act so that they have not 52 holidays in the year but 60 or 62, whatever it may be. You need not take advantage of this hole in the Act in order to say that they ought to get these extra holidays. What will be the result of this? The result, I imagine, will be that the employers will refuse to substitute important religious festivals which fall on a Thursday, Friday or Saturday for the Sunday. They will say to the workmen, "No, we cannot give you this holiday. You must take it on the Sunday." What is going to be the result? Friction all round and strikes merely because Mr. Joshi wishes to get these men a few more holidays and merely because Mr. Joshi is not prepared to carry out what I say was always the intention of the Legislature, merely because Mr. Joshi is not prepared to play fair with the employers. I say, Sir, that this Assembly, this Legislature, has a very real responsibility in this matter. We are not here to be led away by Mr. Joshi's eloquence. We are here to try and do justice to both sides. We are here to try and correct the mistakes that we have made, and that, Sir, is the reason why I have introduced this Bill. Sir, I oppose Mr. Joshi's amendment.

Mr. Manmohandas Ramji (Indian Merchants' Chamber and Bureau: Indian Commerce): Sir, I have followed very closely Mr. Joshi's arguments and he has tried to put the case in a manner which is not fair to the employers and not fair to the workmen even. Mr. Joshi says "Give them 5 days more holidays. What does it matter?" He ought to have more information of what the practice in Calcutta is. I am told that in Calcutta the workmen get holidays on Sundays but they are not allowed a holiday on religious days. What will be the effect? As the Honourable Mr. Innes has rightly pointed out, there will be dissatisfaction. The millowners of Bombay do not wish to curtail even a single holiday. What they wish to do is to comply with the wishes of the workpeople and give them holidays on their festive occasions. Then again, there is this important point that the industry has to stand competition from other parts of the world. If workmen are given holidays after holidays as Mr. Joshi would have, it means greater cost of production. The workmen, as it is, get more than sixty holidays in a year. That means two full months of thirty days. But taking 25 or 26 working days for a month, it means more than two months. Further, some people are paid monthly wages and others are on piece work. Who will suffer? The workmen themselves; and if they draw less by this arrangement, they will ask for more wages, and more wages means more cost of production. In these circumstances, I think it is not wise on the part of this Legislature to accept Mr. Joshi's amendment.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, Mr. Manmohandas Ramji has referred to the practice in Calcutta. So far as I know, the mills and factories close on important festival days such as, for instance, the Id or the Dushera which is called the Durga Puja holidays, and other important festival days. The workmen do get holidays on these days. I also appreciate the objection that was raised by the Honourable Mr. Innes. If a holiday is to be substituted for a Sunday, sometimes I know that it may be a Muhammadan festival day, and they are let off on that day. But the Hindu workmen are not let off on that day and a Sunday is substituted for the day that is taken off from the week of the Muhammadan community. In this way sometimes it happens on a Friday you have to substitute a Sunday for the Friday. I would think that it would be better if we leave elastic the point for the employers to arrange with their workmen instead of putting in a hard-and-fast rule that if they are made to work on a particular Sunday this day is to be taken off during the next three days and it cannot be taken off the week on a later day. I think that will not be either to the advantage of the employers or of the workmen. Of course, I am not very familiar with the working of factories, but I know that in newspapers sometimes, when the paper is issued on Monday the workmen have to work on the Sunday, and then either an off day has to be given during the week or they have to be paid extra wages. In this particular newspaper business, many of the newspapers are issued on Mondays and some are issued on Sundays. Those newspapers which are issued on Sundays have to work on Saturday, but in the case of the paper which is issued on Monday, Sunday is practically a working day. So, I should not adopt any hard-and-fast rule with regard to this matter but I would make it elastic so that the matter may be arranged amicably between the employers and the workmen.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 2 stand part of Bill.

Mr. H. M. Joshi: I rise to oppose this section altogether. Sir, it was said by the Honourable Mr. Innes that I wanted to give a few more holidays to the employees by an underhand manner. As a matter of fact, I did not want to do that at all. I did not introduce the Bill. It was my Honourable friend who has introduced the Bill and he is responsible for this change, if there is any one, and not I. He brought forward the Bill to reduce the holidays and I want to prevent that. That is all. I do not want to increase the holidays by any underhand manner.

Sir, I do not think this section gives effect to the real intentions of the Legislature at all. The Legislature intended that the other sections of the Act must be observed if the holidays are to be substituted for Sundays. My Honourable friend Mr. Ramji said, "Why should not the holidays be substituted?" As a matter of fact, that is my amendment that the employer should be given the right to substitute any other day for a Sunday, but the intention of the Legislature should not be contravened, namely, that the other sections of the Act should not be broken at all.

The Honourable Mr. Innes in defending his section said that he was giving effect to the real intentions of the Act and he quoted a section in the Bill newly introduced that the workmen will not be allowed to work continuously for more than ten days. The existence of this clause is an argument in my favour. As a matter of fact, if the intention of the Legislature was to retain the old clause, namely, no person shall be employed in any factory unless he has had or shall have a holiday for a whole day on one of the three days immediately preceding or succeeding the Sunday, then there will be no necessity of having this clause at all, because according to the old Factory Act, automatically there was the necessity of a holiday at least once in 12 days; that was the ultimate effect of the old Act. My Honourable friend Mr. Ramji has got experience of the working of the old Factory Acts and he will tell you that even under the old Act it was not possible for any one to work for more than 12 days without being given a holiday. If the old section was to be retained and if that was the intention of the Legislature, then certainly this section was not necessary at all, because according to the old Act it was not possible to continue working a factory for more than 12 days without giving a holiday. It was on account of that, there was no provision in the old Act about continuous working for more than 12 days or 10 days or 15 days. Otherwise the old Act would have provided for this contingency. That was not put in the old Act because it prevented the working of a factory for more than 12 days automatically. It was on account of that there was no provision regarding continuous working for more than 10 days. When the Legislature intended to give this facility to the employer, namely, to substitute another holiday for a Sunday, they thought the employer may be able to go on working for more than 10 or 12 days and that section was put in. As a matter of fact, the argument which was used by the Honourable Mr. Innes is in my favour. The mere fact that a clause has been inserted in the Bill prohibiting working a factory for more than 10 days continuously shows that the Legislature never intended to put in the old clause about holiday in the old Act. Therefore, that argument is altogether in my favour.

Then, my Honourable friend Mr. Ramji said, why should there be two holidays, as if two holidays should never be given. (Mr. Manmohan-das Ramji: "Why"?). Then if you pass this Bill you shall have to give two holidays in certain weeks. I am sorry to have to discuss these details in the Assembly. But I shall give an example. Take a holiday on the 5th of any month, Thursday. Sunday will be working. Take a holiday on the 18th of the month, Wednesday. Wednesday will be substituted for Sunday. You cannot do it. You have to give two holidays. Even if you pass this Bill you are not preventing the giving of two holidays once in two weeks at all. If that had been your object I could have understood it. I also pointed out in answering my Honourable friend Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas that as a matter of fact—not of law or rule—here is a list of the holidays given by the Bombay Millowners' Association. There are these holidays—14th, 15th and 16th March, Tuesday, Wednesday 12 Noon. and Thursday—three consecutive holidays. Where was your consideration for the wages of the employees then? Did you object to this? Then, Sir, there is another instance—20th October, 21st October and 22nd October—three consecutive days. Did not the piece-workers suffer? Did you ever take that into consideration? You do not take that into consideration when it suits you and you are afraid of giving two holidays when it does not suit you. If the argument is to be considered that the workman should not have more than two days simply because their wages will suffer, you are not preventing that. I showed that even if you pass this Bill there will be several cases in which you will not be able to substitute that holiday for a Sunday. I have quoted one case. I can quote several. Again I do not think it is right for me to take up the time of the House by putting before them these conundrums and riddles. I therefore hope that this House in the interests of its own integrity as regards the intentions of the Legislature will not pass this. The Legislature never intended that the section about the 60 hours week should be broken or should be tampered with in the fashion in which Government has done.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee (Education Member): I had no desire to intervene in this debate though I feel that I had some responsibility both for the framing of the present Bill and in connection with the passing of the Indian Factories (Amendment) Act last year. I did not wish to take up the time of the House because the facts had been very lucidly explained by my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes. As Mr. Joshi has not been able to overcome his desire to get in a reply to the remarks of Mr. Innes on the amendment, I feel bound to say a few words. Mr. Joshi has referred to the intention of the Legislature. As I said, I had the privilege of conducting through this House the Bill which is now the subject of discussion. I remember perfectly well the discussions that took place in the Joint Select Committee on that occasion. My Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi, was present throughout those discussions. He was not present in the Assembly when the Act was passed. Therefore I think I have as much authority, perhaps a little better authority, than Mr. Joshi has with regard to our intentions when we passed the Bill. I confess it was my mistake as well as that of the draftsman of the Bill that when we changed the original phrasing of the Bill and introduced the present phrasing we overlooked the new provision with regard to the weekly limit of work. It was perfectly plain to everybody during the discussion in the Joint Committee on the motion of Sir Vithaldas Thackersey that we wanted to restore the old system that prevailed in Bombay and in some other parts of the country with regard to holidays. Mr. Joshi is perfectly well aware of that fact and I am very much surprised that he neither made a reference to it when the report of the Joint Select Committee was presented last year nor did he argue against it in the proceedings of that Committee.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I accepted the Act as it was.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: I therefore entirely repudiate Mr. Joshi's assertion that it was the intention of the Legislature at that time to give the 60 hours and that at the same time the holidays should be on the basis which Mr. Joshi now contends that they should be. Then again Mr. Joshi says that the present Bill does not provide that there should never be two holidays in the week. That is quite true. We do not intend that on no occasion at all should there be two holidays in the week. The proviso still exists and we are not proposing to make any alteration in the proviso. On no occasion whatever will a man be compelled to work for more than ten days continuously. That is the continued intention of Government. I therefore hope that Mr. Joshi's objection will not prevail.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 2 do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clauses 3, 4 and 5 do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that the Title of the Bill and the Preamble of the Bill do stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I move that the Bill be passed.

Mr. President: The question is that the Bill further to amend the Indian Factories Act, 1911, be passed.

The motion was adopted.

THE INDIAN PAPER CURRENCY BILL.

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett (Finance Member): Mr. President, I beg to move for leave to introduce a Bill to consolidate the law relating to the Government Paper Currency.

After the astronomical and mental gymnastics through which we have been passing, the House will, I am sure, turn with relief to so simple and lucid a subject as the paper currency in India. I feel that I am really doing a public benefaction. This is a purely consolidating measure and makes no change of any kind in the existing law. It is really a measure to give one day's holiday a week to the hard worked people who deal with Paper Currency Acts. As the House remembers, the Paper Currency Act now in force was passed in 1910. Since that date there have been various amendments—numerous amendments of provisions relating to the constitution of the Paper Currency Reserve passed mostly during the War or just after it. The last series of amendments was made by the Act No. XLV of 1920. I need not dilate on what the provisions of that Act were. It introduced certain permanent provisions and certain temporary provisions to last so long as the created securities, so called, in the Reserve remained created. These temporary provisions were not incorporated in the Act. They did not take the form of specific amendments to the Act and in consequence it is almost impossible to understand the existing Acts in the form in which they are printed. One of the first things that happened to me when I found myself in the Finance Department was that I asked for a copy of the Paper Currency Act in its present form and after a day's hard labour I gave it up. I was then told that I was expected to introduce a Paper

[Sir Basil Blackett.]

Currency Bill. As I knew how controversial a subject it was, naturally I was relieved to find that it was merely a Bill to consolidate the existing Paper Currency Acts in order that they may be printed in a consecutive and intelligible form. The present Bill is intended to bring all the existing provisions together in a clear form and as I have already explained it makes no kind of change in the existing law. I beg to move for leave.

Mr. President: The question is that leave be given to introduce a Bill to consolidate the law relating to the Government Paper Currency.

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: Sir, I introduce the Bill.

RESOLUTION RE EMIGRATION OF UNSKILLED LABOURERS TO CEYLON.

Mr. President: The House will now resume consideration of the Resolution moved by Mr. Hullah on the 1st February this Session in the following terms:

"This Assembly approves the draft notification which has been laid in draft before the Chamber specifying the terms and conditions on which emigration for the purpose of unskilled work shall be lawful to Ceylon, and recommends to the Governor General in Council that the notification be published in the Gazette of India."

Mr. J. Hullah (Revenue and Agriculture Secretary): I only wish, Sir, with your permission, to make a very brief statement regarding the papers that we have placed in the hands of Honourable Members. The arrangement of these papers, the bringing up to date of certain notes which were placed before the Standing Emigration Committee, and which we have now placed before the House, and the printing of these papers involved heavy and very rapid work. The Honourable Mr. Sarma promised to supply to Members all papers of a non-confidential character. We have gone much further, and have placed in Members' hands papers which have hitherto been regarded as confidential. It will be seen that among them are the full proceedings of the Standing Emigration Committee. These have hitherto been regarded as confidential; and since we informed the Deputations that came from Ceylon and Malaya that these proceedings were confidential, it was necessary for us, after the last debate, to telegraph to the Colonial Governments and ask whether they had any objection to our laying them before the House. We also asked them whether we might lay before the House the correspondence with them. They replied at once that they had no objection. I hope, then, that the House will feel satisfied that this is a set of papers sufficiently full to enable it to take cognizance of all the considerations that are relevant to the subject.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma (Revenue and Agriculture Member): Sir, Mr. Hullah in a very full, lucid and eloquent speech has clearly explained to the House the relations which have existed hitherto between Ceylon and India with regard to emigration and the history of the proposals which have led to the Notification being laid on the table of this House. If I rise to intervene in the debate at the present stage, it is because I have felt that, having regard to some of the observations made by Honourable Members when they asked for time to consider the question more fully, a further exposition of the policy of the Government, its position and attitude towards this question might help in a speedy termination of the Resolution before the House. The House may rest assured that it is not the desire of the Government to encourage, or encourage unduly, emigration from India either to British possessions or to other countries. The Government know and realize that it is their duty to make the conditions of life in India as easy and comfortable as possible. They realize that, in the interests of agricultural prosperity as well as economic and industrial development, it would be a short-sighted policy to denude the country of labour, and they have been taking and propose to take all steps that may be necessary to improve the conditions of labour prevailing in the various parts of India. But there is no use disguising from ourselves the fact that in certain parts there is an undue congestion, that labour conditions are unsatisfactory, and we have also to recognize the fact that it is the freedom of the individual that we have to respect, that a man should be able to go where he pleases to make the best of the conditions and opportunities which are possible to him. So subject to reasonable exceptions, the freedom of the individual has to be promoted and safeguarded. But the Government have recognized and do recognize that there are essential safeguards to be taken when they are dealing with an ignorant population who are unable to protect their own interests and may be seduced or rather may be induced to go abroad in search of a comfortable living without a full appreciation of the conditions. It is under those circumstances that the Government have passed the emigration law which has been placed on the Statute Book last year and propose to provide suitable safeguards to protect assisted emigrants to foreign countries. But in making rules and in imposing conditions, the House will remember that the relations between India and Ceylon are peculiar. Mr. Hullah has laid stress upon this aspect of the question, and I propose to add only a very few brief remarks. We may treat Ceylon as practically an annexure to or a district of India from the standpoint of proximity and facility of communication and, viewed geographically or ethnologically, we may say that the conditions are so similar that distinctions, such as can be drawn between the overseas possessions of His Majesty, the distant overseas possessions and India, cannot be drawn in the case of Ceylon and India. There is only a very narrow stretch of sea, 22 miles long, which separates the two. There is a large inflow, interchange, of labour between Ceylon—200 or 300 passing from Ceylon.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): There is no interchange of labour.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: There is no interchange of labour proper but interchange of population though on a small scale. The Government as far back as 1847 recognized that it was essential—and I lay particular stress upon it—that it was essential to secure the good will of Ceylon to render their emigration policy effective. They have also recognized that the apprehensions which may exist in the case of other Colonies need not be entertained in the case of Ceylon. Honourable Members will recognize also that 25 per cent. of the population, including the emigrant population, are closely allied by affinity to the South Indian Tamilian population, are Tamilians, and even with regard to the vast majority of the Singhalese, if tradition is to be relied on, they come from an Upper India stock which is said to have emigrated more than 2,000 years ago; so that, in substance, you can look upon Ceylon as practically a country peopled with Indian races. We shall also have to recognize that with the prosperity of Ceylon is intimately connected the prosperity of South India. The trade relations are very extensive and I would therefore ask the House to remember these peculiar conditions which subsist between Ceylon and Southern India. I am not going to minimise in the slightest degree the fact that there has been anxiety or that there is room for anxiety that ignorant villagers in Southern India may go to Ceylon to better their conditions under various inducements only to find that the conditions are no better there than those prevailing in Southern India. The Government propose in this connection to take effectual safeguards and the Committee has been of very great assistance in formulating proposals as to what may be necessary in this behalf. Now, Sir, if we treat Southern India and Ceylon as practically one country for general trade and labour purposes, if we remember that in the past Ceylon was governed from Madras and was part of Southern India—the Chola Kings ruled that tract for a long time—if you remember all these facts, I suggest that you should treat emigration to Ceylon on a somewhat different footing from emigration to other distant countries. The Government of Ceylon have pressed very seriously and very strongly upon the Emigration Committee their view that there should not be any obstacle whatsoever in the way of a free interchange of populations between Southern India and Ceylon. They have pointed out that no great evils had entered into the body politic of either country by reason of such free interchange in the past and that it would be hard to enforce any restrictions upon such emigration without seriously handicapping the skilled or free unskilled emigrant. Their views are supported by a certain section both in Southern India and in Ceylon, but the Government as well as the Emigration Committee have felt, and I think rightly, that it would be impossible, having regard to public feeling on the subject and the necessity for safeguarding the interests of the labour population emigrating to Ceylon, to accede to these demands, and we therefore propose not to except unskilled labour emigration from the purview of the Act. We have proceeded further and wish to ensure that whenever a labourer goes across this 22 mile stretch of sea to Ceylon and finds himself in uncongenial surroundings or finds that he has been induced to go there under unfulfilled promises or the conditions do not suit him, either by reason of the work he has to do being unsuitable or the wages he is paid being inadequate or for any other satisfactory reason is able to convince the Emigration Agent that it is fair he should be helped, he should be sent back to his home at the expense of the Colony; and the Government of Ceylon have agreed to it. The Government and the Committee have felt it incumbent upon them further to press upon the Ceylon Government to remove all penal restrictions, and whether willingly or unwillingly—let us be charitable and say willingly—the Ceylon Government have removed all such restrictions. But the Emigration Committee were not satisfied—and I do not blame them for it—with regard to the wages that are being paid in Ceylon. I am not going to trespass upon the ground to be covered by the amendments, but that was the one point upon which the Emigration Committee had grave doubts. It was not originally intended to press upon the Ceylon Government the fixing of a basic wage subject to a minimum. I shall have to briefly explain to the House the various stages through which this aspect of the problem presented itself to the Emigration Committee and the Government. In the beginning the idea was faintly hinted at but was set aside on the advice of Mr. Marjoribanks who was deputed by the Madras Government to assist us and who was one of those who went to study the conditions in Ceylon and the Straits Settlements. They were induced to drop this question on the ground that the labourer was a free labourer and entitled to repatriation when he found that the conditions were unsuitable, and the Tundu having been abolished the conditions of the labour market would adjust themselves and that it was not desirable to fix a minimum which might easily become a maximum. Rightly or wrongly, they at first hesitated to ask that any minimum wage should be fixed. We pressed certain other conditions upon the Ceylon Government which were partially accepted. Then a deputation waited upon us and the question was again raised in the Committee because the Committee has always felt unhappy about this wage question. It was then suggested to the deputation that this problem should be solved at an early date in order to ensure harmonious relations between the two countries. The deputation very strongly pressed upon Government and the Committee the practical difficulties in the way of concluding any investigation in a short space of time, and undertook to inquire into the subject to find a solution so that the position may be made easy for all parties concerned. Then the Committee sat specially to consider this point on the 21st September and resolved to ask the Government of India to negotiate with the Ceylon Government for the purpose of making this inquiry as speedily as possible and for improving meanwhile the conditions of labour; but they did not make it a condition precedent because they recognized that some time must elapse before the inquiry was concluded and its results made known. They further stipulated that any results which might be tentatively arrived at should be placed before them, so that with their suggestions before them the Government may be able to negotiate further before final conclusions are come to and the matter is placed before the Ceylon Legislative Council. Therefore in our last letter to the Ceylon Government we expressed the hope that they would at once take steps to see that the conditions of labour were improved. (A Voice: "When was that?") In October, I believe. The last meeting was on the 21st September and in October we wrote to Ceylon asking them to undertake an inquiry, and they wrote back at once saying that they would undertake an inquiry and pointing out the various stages through which that inquiry had to pass, and, having regard to the fact that there were 1,230 estates with varying wage conditions prevailing in different places, they said that some time was required but that they would conclude the matter as early as was practicable. That is where that question stands, and I hope that it will be settled speedily to the satisfaction of this House and to the satisfaction of the whole country. But I ask you, Sir, if we had waited from 1847 up to date without, I will not say any hardship, but if we had waited patiently for the amelioration of the position so long, would it be too much to ask the House to wait a little longer and allow the Government to negotiate with Ceylon wage? The Government has the interests of the labourer at heart. The Government recognises the difficulties in the way of the Ceylon Government. They recognise that the conditions in Southern India are not altogether dissimilar to those obtaining in Ceylon. The conditions of labour in Southern India have to be ascertained to a certain extent, because we have asked the Ceylon Government to fix the wage in such a way as to enable the labourer when he comes back to Southern India to live happily on his savings, which might serve as a pension for him; and, therefore, having regard to those limitations which we have imposed, I would ask the House to recognise that the Government and the Committee have placed as many reasonable conditions as conditions precedent to emigration being allowed as are practicable. I lay once more stress upon the fact that confidence begets confidence, and that if we allow this matter to lie at this stage for a little while longer, the Ceylon Government, recognising that we have placed implicit trust in their good faith, in their desire to improve the conditions of labour settled there, would co-operate with our Emigration Agent, if we are so fortunate as to find funds to appoint one there; with his co-operation and the co-operation of the Government of India, I hope that the Ceylon Government would be in a position to place this vexed question on such a satisfactory basis that they and we may be able to co-operate fully for the betterment of the conditions of Southern India as well as Ceylon. And, mark you, Sir, let us not expose ourselves to the charge that by enforcing unduly hard conditions in the desire, in the natural desire, in the just desire, to improve the conditions of our countrymen who may be going abroad, that we shall be unduly depressing the labour market in Southern India; because that outflow, be it on a small scale or on a large scale, is helpful, is good, in the interests of the labourers of Southern India, inasmuch as it naturally raises the position of the labourer and his value in the market. I, therefore, hope that the House would take a very generous view of the difficulties of the Ceylon Government—I am not trying to overdraw the picture, I am not trying in the slightest degree to minimise the difficulties to which labour is subject or the public opinion which faces us and I do not say that public opinion has been unduly exercised having regard to the stories which have been rightly or wrongly propagated with regard to the condition of labour in Ceylon—well, Sir, having regard to the peculiar relations subsisting between us and Ceylon, the fact that their prosperity and our prosperity are bound up together and that we cannot afford to see the planting industries in Ceylon rudely affected, let us trust them a little more; and we have got the power, we have got the will, to enforce and we shall be firm in enforcing a policy which would secure justice for the labourer who may be going to Ceylon from here. Section 13 of the Emigration Act fully empowers the Governor General in Council to stop emigration at any time he considers proper laying reasons therefor and the Resolution he has come to on the table of this House. If this House is dissatisfied with the conditions it is always open to them to recommend to the Government to take such steps, if the Government does not of its own accord take such steps, in that direction as may be necessary. We have got ample power in the Statute Book to enforce our will and we shall do so. Let us show that we trust the Ceylon Government, the Ceylon planters, and if they betray that trust, if they are not fully alive to their responsibilities, then it will be time for this House to ask the Government to lay down rigid conditions so that they may not make a mistake once again. So far Ceylon has fully complied with the conditions which we have asked them to comply with and we have no reason except in this one instance for any grounds for dissatisfaction, and I therefore ask the House to accept the Resolution as it stands.

Mr. K. Ahmed (Rajshahi Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, the Honourable Mr. Sarma has without bringing the real issue before the House given us a sidelight on the subject in question. I know, Sir, he has supported what the Honourable Mr. Hullah described so fully and moved so eloquently. The Honourable Mr. Sarma is a lawyer, as we know, and when he has got a very bad case it is the lawyer's business to argue that case. That is the real point of the whole matter.

Sir, before I move my amendment in this House I should like to point out that the subject of to-day concerns people who are going mostly from Southern India to Ceylon. They are generally recruited by a class of people called Kanganis, and they go to a land which is not very far across the sea. Probably a man could easily cross the 22 miles that lie between at a jump, as was suggested by the other side. Then, Sir, we have heard also that if labour does not like to stay there in that happy land, it can be repatriated by that beneficent arrangement which has been made by the Colonial Government in that country. Sir, it is very kind of them to have done so; but for those unhappy creatures who desire to be repatriated by any means to their motherland, the difficulties of the situation under which they are placed after they have been recruited by these Kanganis for that country are very great. Some information was supplied to us about two days ago by the Honourable Mr. Hullah. Let us see, Sir, from the perusal of it what the difficulties are of those poor unhappy people going to that country. I don't know whether Honourable Members have it with them, but at page 3—paragraph 11—of "Emigration to Ceylon" they will find the following remarks:

"There is no minimum wage fixed by law. Reliable statistics for all estates are not available. Calculations based on information supplied by particular estates show that actual wages varied in 1917 from Rs. 10 to Rs. 8 for men; from Rs. 6 to Rs. 4 for women, and from Rs. 3 to Rs. 5 for a child."

That is to begin with, and that is the average pay. Now this paper called "Emigration to Ceylon" has been kindly supplied to us by the Honourable Mr. Hullah, on page 7 of which you will find under the heading Appendix "Statistics of comparison between a Ceylon Estate cooly's cost of living and his earnings in cash." There are two headings. Rubber Estates and Tea Estates, and in the sixth column there is a heading "Total average of monthly earnings." The average is probably that which is given on page 3 of this paper per man, woman and child. This is the average for rubber estates. The average monthly salary is from Rs. 6 to Rs. 11; a man gets Rs. 11 in 30 days, a woman gets Rs. 8 and a child gets Rs. 6, and that is the accurate figure, and then the total is Rs. 15 per man, Rs. 10 per woman and Rs. 7 per child. That is the average monthly earning in 30 days.

Then we come to Tea Estates. The average monthly income is Rs. 9 per man, Rs. 6 per woman and Rs. 4 per child, and in the sixth column you will find the total average monthly earning is Rs. 12 per man, Rs. 8 per woman and Rs. 6 per child and for single adult Rs. 8.

Then from page 37 you will find that these people spend much more than they earn. There is a deficit in the family and the cost of living is much more than the amount of earning, and yet attempts are made to encourage emigration to Ceylon. It was pointed out by the Honourable Mr. Sarma that a friendly feeling is established between the Government of India and the Government of Ceylon. The Government of Ceylon, as we all know, is not for the benefit of the Indian. Their feeling towards Indians is like this. There are two brothers living side by side, or there is a partition of their whole ancestral estate; therefore it is probably much nearer than 22 miles distance from Southern India to go to that happy land of Ceylon, and there is a conflict of interest going on between the two brothers under the same paternal house. You know the feeling that generally exists between two brothers under these circumstances, one brother wants to eject the other and take complete possession of the property. That is the position between the Ceylon Government and the people of this country with regard to their treatment there. Sir, I keep aloof other subjects for the present. How are they taking an interest in the uplifting and safeguarding of our Indian interests generally? Sir, I do not think that the Honourable Mr. Sarma is justified at all in saying that a close relationship between India and Ceylon exists. It is not in the interests of the Government of India that we should allow recruitment to that country and a Kanganis is to take the major portion of the small salary which these people get, and what balance is left them to spend for their living. These debts are incurred through those blood-thirsty Kanganis. People lend money, Sir, at the highest rate of interest and the condition is that if you don't pay you know what the penalties are. I have got, Sir, certain telegrams in the name of my Honourable friend, Mr. Venkatapatiraju, who was probably a member of that Committee that went the other day to inquire into the condition and status and the method in which things are going on in that extraordinary land of Ceylon. I am told, Sir, that my friend submitted a report, which has been kindly forwarded to me by my Honourable friend, Mr. Hullah. In the Standing Emigration Committee, my Honourable friend, Mr. Sarma, said this:

"I think the less said about emigration the better and there is not much to be said either on this specific question. The Deputations to British Guiana and Fiji have not yet reported about the state of things there nor have they made any recommendations."

Well, Sir, I understand the Report has been submitted since.

Mr. W. S. J. Willson (Bengal: European): On a point of order, Sir. Are we discussing emigration to Fiji or to Ceylon?

Mr. K. Ahmed: My Honourable friend again jumps up, seeing things are going very badly against their interests I presume. Probably he has got a good heart and sympathy with the people of Ceylon, so many miles away from the Southern part of India. I congratulate him, but, Sir, when you are talking about the subject of emigration, when you talk about the labourers who are to be recruited in the other country, the labourer in India who is to go to Kenya, Fiji, or any other part of the world, they are all emigrants from India. Their condition is not in any way better than the condition of these poor people who are recruited to that happy land of Ceylon and therefore, Sir, I referred to them. My Honourable friend will have an opportunity to oppose my amendment, if he so wishes, and we shall be very happy to hear him if he has anything to say about Fiji not touching Ceylon.

That being so, I pass on to the telegram from Ceylon which my Honourable friend, Mr. Venkatapatiraju has received. This is a telegram to my Honourable friend, Mr. Venkatapatiraju. I have got it in my possession. My friend after giving me permission to read it does not probably want it to be read now. This is the telegram:

"Mr. Hullah's statement misleading. Excepting removal penal clauses Ceylon Government's concessions useless. Old debts remain. Several cases instituted against labourers in different Courts of Requests. Numbers can be quoted. Several cases transferred to India to attach Indian properties of labourers. Removal Tundu farce. Mr. J. P. Cotelingam (Nominated: Indian Christians): "proved".

Mr. K. Ahmed: "... proved from accounts. Education unsatisfactory. Not even 300 estates have schools. Wages very low. Kept so by means of discharge ticket. Indian opinion favour restriction for improvement wages. Will interest Assembly to know why Mysore insisted declaration before Magistrates for recruits. Ceylon Government intend appointing civilian represent labour. Fight for maximum"

Mr. J. P. Gotelingam: "minimum".

Mr. K. Ahmed: "wages eradication debts compulsory Education Committee's recommendations give no protection. Question of repatriation farce. Labourer who as planters said will be afraid of Magistrates in India will they apply to Ceylon official for repatriation. Natesi"

Mr. J. P. Gotelingam: Natesa Aiyar, sender of the telegram.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Natesa, Andival Street, or whatever it is.

This is what the telegram says. Now, Sir, a meeting was held only the other day in Madras. It appears from the Madras Mail, dated the 8th February, that the meeting was held only two days ago, and . . .

Mr. President: I must ask the Honourable Member to draw his remarks to a close.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I will just give the House the opinion of that part of India from which my Honourable friend, Mr. Sarma, comes, and I am sure he is familiar with them. The report in the Madras Mail says:

"A public meeting was held on last Wednesday evening at the Victoria Hall to concert measures for improving the conditions of Indians who had emigrated to Ceylon. The conditions of Indians in Ceylon were becoming serious and the Government of India were endeavouring—how, it is very difficult to say—to improve them. The Government of India and the Secretary of State, it was hoped, would come to the help of Indians abroad. Why should Indians go abroad as labourers and not stay in their own country? Zemindars, merchants and other rich people should persuade their countrymen not to leave India if they were sufficiently educated to carry on modern industries."

Now, Sir, at that meeting it was also resolved that they wanted an Indian Consulate if it was necessary. Mr. C. R. Reddy, a very able and moderate politician, in seconding the Resolution, said that the Government of India and their own leaders were responsible for the legal status of Indians in the Colonies. The Government had not taken sufficient care of the people and did not discharge their

Mr. President: The Honourable Member will resume his seat after moving his amendment.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I move:

"That after the word 'Ceylon' the words 'for one year only' be inserted and at the end of the Resolution the following words be added:

'and further recommends that a Committee of Inquiry consisting of three persons be sent to Ceylon to investigate the condition of the labour with a view to find out on what terms emigration should be permitted after the 5th of March, 1924'."

In 1924, on the 5th March, if this notification for emigration is continued

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"That after the word 'Ceylon' the words 'for one year only' be inserted and at the end of the Resolution the following words be added:

'and further recommends that a Committee of Inquiry consisting of three persons be sent to Ceylon to investigate the condition of the labour with a view to find out on what terms emigration should be permitted after the 5th of March, 1924'."

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: As one of those who has sat on the Emigration Committee I wish to give my views on the outstanding questions which remain with the Ceylon Government so that we may know how the further discussion on the amendments should proceed and also those who move these amendments may consider what amendment should be pressed to a division.

There are still only three outstanding questions which remain to be settled with the Ceylon Government so far as I am able to gather the difficulties of the situation. As Honourable Members are no doubt aware, the old tundu system arising on account of this indebtedness of the labourer to the kangany and the kangany to the estate has been abolished but the debts have not been abolished. The moral force of those debts and the slavish sentiment which hitherto had prevailed in the minds of these people still remain and that is a matter which will take some time for the Ceylon Government to adjust because it is a matter of lakhs and lakhs of rupees which have to be written off by the estates as against the kanganies, but as between the kanganies and the labourers there should be no difficulty and the Emigration Committee have pressed it home both on the Deputation and on the Ceylon Government that this indebtedness of the labourer to the kangany should disappear, for the kangany uses it as a moral force to retain the labourer on the estate to which the kangany is attached. The kangany profits by retaining the labour on the parti-

1 P.M. cular estate to which he is attached, for he gets so much per head of cooly which he retains on the estate from the planter and he uses this debt as a force, not as a legal force but as a moral force and these poor ignorant men, although the law gives them freedom of movement from estate to estate, are not able to get out of the clutches of these kanganies. So this debt will have to be abolished but however as I said already it is a matter in which the Committee felt considerable difficulty whether it should be made a condition in the Notification because the Ceylon Government themselves proposed such an Ordinance, only in the year 1921, after considerable agitation there. They themselves proposed some steps should be taken with reference to the abolition of this debt system and it is hoped that they will take those steps very soon and we were assured that such steps would be taken and that only it is a matter of time. The second outstanding question and the most important of all is this question of the wages. I want Honourable Members to understand the real situation as regards the wages. The figures supplied to Honourable Members both by Mr. Hullah in his opening remarks and in the papers circulated are somewhat likely to be misleading. We have to be guided by the wages which each man earns, not by the averages. We should be guided by the lowest figure which each man, woman or child earns. If you go by averages it is no good at all. If you make an average of the income of all the Members of this Assembly, we are not going to distribute it to all the Members. It depends on the lowest income and we have to find out whether it is a living wage. There is no use therefore taking the kanakupillai on the estate, the maistry on the estate and the kanganies who are also labourers and get their wages in addition to what they get so much per head of cooly who works under him. So you lump these things and strike an average. That is no good at all. And with reference to this matter I wish Honourable Members to realise what are the actual wages which are earned by these labourers when they go there. I mean the minimum, the lowest which they get. If Honourable Members will turn to page 7 of the Appendix, in the first place there is a misprint there, which I am surprised to see repeated from the final reprint of the Deputation print. We corrected it with the Deputation in the case of tea estates. As regards the daily minimum wage, Honourable Members will see 51 cents marked there. It is a misprint for 41 cents. It is not 51 cents at all. 41 cents is the average for tea estates and 47 cents is the average for men so far as the rubber estates are concerned. Now, Sir, the wages range from 36 to 50 cents in the case of tea estates. That is the lowest wage paid is 36 cents and the highest wage paid is 50 cents. The highest wage is paid in the case of the factory labourer, in the case of kanakupillais or these sillarai kangaries who actually labour. You may take it that 86 cents means 5 annas 9 pies per day. 5 annas 9 pies per day,—that is the wage which these people earn; and as regards the women, it ranges between 26 and 33 cents; that is, it is merely 4 annas 1 pie, and in the case of a child, he gets 2 annas 11 pies. Now it must be admitted at once that this wage is hardly a living wage. On their own admission, Honourable Members will see taking their own figures, the cost of living is given at page 3—for a man, woman and child, that is, a non-working child, the cost of living would work to, including clothing, Rs. 20 and annas 4. That does not provide for expenses, for festivals, such as Diwali or Pongal or such other festivals, or even for religious worship, or for offering worship, the usual worship: so that the actual, bare cost of living without providing for these things would come to Rs. 20 and annas 4. We have another estimate of that by a man who is well acquainted with the conditions of labour, one Mr. Natesa Aiyar who gave evidence before the Committee. He calculates the cost of living at Rs. 23 annas 8 for a family. We will take the lower figure of the Deputation, namely, Rs. 20 annas 4, and if we allow a few extras for these festivals, festive occasions, it cannot be less than Rs. 21 or Rs. 22 per mensem. What does this man earn? Even on the most favourable calculation you will find, taking 40 cents as the average, or 41 cents as they put it, on an average, or if you take any of these things, it comes to this,—unless the woman also works, the family cannot live; even with the woman working, it is less than the actual cost of living. The Committee were greatly impressed with the fact that the prevailing wages were inadequate even with a man and woman working together, that they were not able to earn the actual cost of living, the estimated cost of living. The Committee were impressed with that fact and they pressed upon the Government of India that they should immediately press upon the Government of Ceylon—as Honourable Members will see from the proceedings—for an immediate rise in the wages, in the existing wages. That was considered most essential. It is quite true the Honourable Mr. Sarma told us that before we had full information the Committee were doubtful about fixing a minimum wage. But after the next meeting in fact when Major Nicholson gave us interesting figures which Honourable Members will find at page 29, we realized the necessity. He is the gentleman who is in charge of the recruitment of this labour. Honourable Members will find the figures given by Major Nicholson as regards wages, which these people get when they go there, are,—a man, 6 annas 1 pie for rubber, and for tea, 5 annas 9 pies; a woman, 4 annas 2 pies, and for tea, 4 annas; children, 3 annas and 2 annas 11 pies. When we got those figures—in fact we got them by telegram during the sittings of the Committee—when we got those figures we thought that the matter required further examination, and therefore we insisted upon it. The Ceylon Government gave us figures which afterwards turned out to be exaggerated. The Ceylon Government gave us figures which Honourable Members will find in their letter of July.—Honourable Members will find them printed also here—in these papers they exaggerated the income of these labourers—in their July letter, that is printed at page 18—they wanted to make out that a man gets Rs. 16 to Rs. 20 in rubber and Rs. 12 to Rs. 16 in tea. It is hardly correct; for women, Rs. 10 to Rs. 12; for working children, Rs. 6 to Rs. 8. It is not borne out by the figures actually given to us by the Deputation themselves.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: That is, before they become efficient; there is a qualifying phrase there—on first joining before they become efficient.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Yes, that is so; they do not become efficient till one year. We are not concerned about their efficiency. When they go out of the country what is it they get? That is the point we have to consider. We are now asked to encourage emigration to Ceylon. I quite admit the necessity for it. Therefore I do not want to go into questions of policy; I want to look at it from the practical point of view so that we may come to a practical conclusion to-day. I am not opposed to emigration to Ceylon; I do not want to discourage it. In fact it will be difficult to prevent it having regard to the proximity of the place and the past habit of the people of those districts, especially the Tamil districts. I should like, however, to say just a word in regard to the alleged facility of the journey from these districts to Ceylon. Mr. Hullah has presented a rather exaggerated picture of the easiness of the passage from India to Ceylon. Take the district of Chittoor. It is 300 miles from Chittoor to Mandapam and although it may seem a very easy matter for these poor labourers to cross the intervening 22 miles of sea, I must inform the House that it actually takes them seven days to get across, for there in Mandapam they are kept in quarantine. That is a hardship which is greatly felt, as negotiations are going on between the Ceylon and Madras Governments with a view to removing this hardship, we have not therefore laid much stress upon it. But apart from that there are practical difficulties which have yet to be faced by the Madras Government and by the Indian Government before this emigration question can be satisfactorily settled.

As I was saying, with regard to the figures furnished to us by the Ceylon Government, in June Major Nicholson gave us some figures; in July the Ceylon Government furnished us with another set of figures; when the Deputation came in September they gave us a third set of figures; and we find them irreconcilable, and therefore it is a matter which has to be carefully inquired into. But taking them at their best, the wages are unduly low. It may be true that the wages earned by these people in their own districts are not much better, but I doubt if in any place the wages are so low. From my own experience of several Tamil districts I do not think the agricultural wages are so low as they are in Ceylon. It may be asked, why is it then that these people go at all? The real answer is that you have an army of kanganies. For the recruitment of about 39,000 people 14,000 kanganies are employed; each man recruits three or four labourers, and he gets five rupees for each labourer to begin with and five rupees afterwards; each labourer also gets an advance of five or ten rupees. And probably it is the pleasure of the escapade, the trip which he takes, and the freedom of social life away from his home—that is perhaps the secret of these people going away from their homes. I have investigated this matter, and I do not think there is much fraud going on. I visited the Trichinopoly camp where about 400 or 500 coolies were waiting; they understood what they were about, and I cannot say that there is much deception practised. I have therefore come to the conclusion that these people go out for such low wages because of their desire for social freedom, to go to a place where no question of Brahman and non-Brahman exists and where various other social restrictions do not exist. It is perhaps a matter which has to be investigated. But I do think, Sir, that in discussing this question we should not take into consideration whether these people are happy or not in their homes. We are bound to make them happy here and we are neglecting our duties if we do not make them happy here. But merely because they may not be happy here is no reason why we should allow them to be unhappy somewhere else. At least let us see that they are happy in other places. I quite agree with the sentiments expressed by the Honourable Mr. Sarma. You must encourage freedom of the individual. I am quite willing to concede that. It is not the question of freedom of the individual here. We are now concerned with assisted emigration of labour. So long as it is unassisted, you are not controlling it. But you give your measure of assistance to Kanganis to go about, to recruit, to advance money and take them over and it is that which we want to prevent. If individuals go there on their own account at their own expense seeking their livelihood on the face of the earth, nobody can have any objection. We have to control, therefore, assisted emigration. Therefore, Sir, I want to impress upon this House that the existing wages are unduly low; admittedly they cannot meet the living cost even on their own modest calculation. The cost is Rs. 21, and man and woman cannot earn Rs. 18. That is why the labourers owe to the Kanganis nearly Rs. 150 lakhs, or Rs. 1½ crores. There is indebtedness of Rs. 1½ crores for these poor people. It is quite true that these people have not got much on which you can realise these debts. But all the same you know that they are under obligation in debt. It is moral obligation and moral fear; moreover, decrees can be obtained here and the little property they may have in the villages can be attached. Another fact which strikes me is this. How is it that people are going there all these years, there has been free emigration to Ceylon all these years and yet not one of them has acquired property in Ceylon? Whereas I was quite satisfied to see the conditions in Mauritius, where, for instance, nearly more than 40 per cent. of the land is owned by these Indian labourers who emigrated there; in Ceylon not an inch of land is owned by these labourers. If Honourable Members will compare the inflow and outflow of figures, they will see that 39,000 people go there and 29,000 people return in the year. So, it is merely a short trip, as it were, which they make and they do not profit by it. This country does not profit by it. The only country which is profited by this labour is Ceylon. The planters on account of this large inflow of labour there are able to keep down the labour market. That is the reason for these low wages. There is too much competition and on account of too much competition the wages are low. If we restricted the number or rather if we compelled the planters to give a minimum wage, then perhaps these conditions would not exist; the conditions will much improve. I think it is our duty to do that. I strongly impress on the Government and on this House that we should take some steps. I do not think left to themselves the Ceylon Government will do it. How many months have they had now? This Emigration Act was a Bill before this House for nearly six months, and before the Select Committee, in fact, I pressed only for six months' time to be given under the Act. But, Sir, the House allowed one year. What has the Ceylon Government done? In September we gave them time. What have they done? Have they appointed the Committee which the Emigration Committee suggested to them in order to go into this basic wage? It is still under correspondence. What do they say in their reply of October which the Honourable Member referred to? That conditions in South India have to be investigated! Why should conditions in South India be investigated in order to fix what is the living cost there and what wage should be a good wage? All this is a mere attempt, a ruse, on their part to delay, to gain time; and, Honourable Members will also see that since July last the number of people taken to Ceylon, because the Act does not apply, has considerably increased. They have taken advantage of the fact that the Act does not apply. If Honourable Members will look at page 48, the large increase of numbers begins there. Whereas from January to April the number is only, 1,000, 2,000, 3,000, etc., after May, it is, 7,000, 10,000, 10,000. I rather suspect that taking advantage of the delay in coming into force of this Act, there is more effort put forth by the Commission in order to take more labour, so that they may have a large number of labourers on hand, so that when the Act comes into force the labour market there may be overflowed and they may be able to keep down the wage.

I drew the attention of the deputation to that and they say it is due to normal conditions. I do not believe it. For my part I do not believe this statement. I pressed upon Government to get the publication that the Ceylon Planters' issue every month or two months. I do not know whether they have done so yet. That would give them the clue as to why this large inflow of labour is going on. I have not heard whether the Government are going to get this monthly publication which shows the activities of the Ceylon planters. I am satisfied that the Ceylon Government and the Ceylon Labour Commission are one. The deputation was not a Government deputation. Unlike the other deputations which waited upon us from Mauritius and from the Malay States, the Ceylon deputation was really a planters' deputation. There was no Government servant on that deputation. Therefore, Sir, I do not think we should leave it to the Ceylon Government to do the needful. We have left it too long. I insist that this question of wage should immediately be attended to. Otherwise we should put a minimum on the number that should go. I attach the greatest importance to this. I am very sorry I have to do it, but I do not expect much from the Ceylon Government unless we put pressure upon it. Sir, these are some of the remarks I wish to make on this subject.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, we really feel much indebted to the Honourable Mr. Sarma and to Mr. Hullah for supplying us with the printed record in connection with the proceedings and relating to the rules and regulations which are obtaining in Ceylon. I quite recognise the honest efforts, which have been set forth by the Government of India, to ameliorate the condition of Indian emigrants in Ceylon; but one thing is not clear to me, Sir,—it is a puzzle to me; and that is this—whether this Resolution, on behalf of the Government, is being moved for the benefit of Indian labourers or for that of the planters in Ceylon. I should like to be enlightened with a very precise and concise answer to this question. The Honourable Mr. Sarma tells us, and we thank him for that expression, that the Government, to a certain extent, is reluctant to allow free emigration, but there are certain conditions, subsisting in Madras, which induce Government to allow emigration. What are those conditions? He says that in some quarters and in some months of the year there is congestion—that is, the number of labourers there becomes much more than the work that could be secured to them in that Province. That is the explanation which has been put forward by the Honourable Mr. Sarma. Very good, Sir. If it is out of sympathy with the labourers that they may be given work and that they may not idle away their time, then what about the educated unemployed men of India? Will they be able to secure employment in Ceylon? Will the Government of Ceylon recognise them? Will they be able to hold posts there? Well, if the answer to that is a negation, then I am forced to this conclusion, that our countrymen are sent away simply as coolies, because, coolies cannot be supplied from other quarters. Allow me to say that I, as an Indian, feel ashamed of that and feel very deeply that such may be the condition, that such may be the predicament into which we are, at present, forced. If some of us were to be sent there, as scholars, in the pursuit of knowledge . .

Mr. President: Order, order. The Honourable Member knows perfectly well we are talking about the conditions under which persons going to Ceylon as assisted emigrants may work there. He must confine himself to that subject.

Dr. Nand Lal: Very well, Sir, I shall do so. Therefore, Sir, as I have already submitted, these arguments, which have emanated from the Honourable the Revenue Member, have not appealed to my mind, at any rate. Now, Sir, we are told that the Ceylon Government will see their way to raise the wages after due inquiry and when the proper occasion arises for it. All right, Sir, let us then wait till the Ceylon Government tries to raise the wages of these people. What is the hurry about it? Hurry is not in favour of the labourers or coolies of India. This is being hurried on, if I mistake not, in the interests of the planters of Ceylon, and why so? It cannot be denied that the present wages are too low. It is extremely difficult to see how these unfortunate people live there, and I think, on their return to their own province, they must be coming back without even a farthing with them. That cannot be ~~desirable~~ and, therefore, the Government of India, I think, will feel it their duty to impress upon the Ceylon Government, the necessity of raising the wages of the labourers before they help them, otherwise, they should not help the Ceylon Government. As my Honourable friend, Rao Bahadur Rangachariar, has argued before the House, it is startling to us to see that in some past months there has been a great demand for labour. For instance, he told us that from May onwards there was a very large influx of emigrants in Ceylon. How is that? Where is the need for special demand?

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: In some months there will be greater emigration.

Dr. Nand Lal: I think the planters anticipate, and they foresee, that the labourers in Ceylon, that is the local men will not be satisfied with this low wage. Therefore, the real desire of the planters, if I can say so, is that the market should be dumped by importing a very large number of Indian coolies, so that the local labour may not be able to raise its head. I take it in that light. If I am wrong I may be excused, but that is the result of my study of the whole situation. Therefore, it seems to be highly undesirable that the Government of India should allow this state of things to continue. If the Government of India are not aware of the labourers' condition in Ceylon, then, I may respectfully submit, it is simply regrettable, and if the Government of India, who have very faithful sources of information, still continue to give assistance to the planters of Ceylon, though indirectly, in spite of their knowledge about the labourers' condition in Ceylon, then, I may say, it is still more regrettable. Now, the Honourable Mr. Sarma has very kindly told us about the proceedings which went on before the Deputation and about the understanding, which was come to between the Government of India and the Deputation. The crux of the whole thing is whether the Deputation has given any effective shape to the question which indirectly concerns the fixing of the minimum wage. They say: "tundu has been abolished." It is true that it has been abolished. We are told that the recruiters will not in future be given the liberty of inducing or persuading the Indian coolies to go. We must thank the Government of India for that. But what about the indebtedness which is hanging over their (the coolies') heads? As Mr. Rangachariar very ably put before the House: What about that? Can the Indian coolies' minds be relieved of it? Will they feel themselves free from that civil liability, or encumbrance, so to speak? These are the two points which ought to have been given prominence by our Government, and I am very sorry that the adequate consideration has not been paid to it. I take it, more or less though not exactly, as a kind of slavery, if I may be allowed to say so. May I hope that the English gentlemen here, members of that sympathetic nation that abolished slavery, will help Indian coolies and will join us in giving a defeat to the Government Benches, so far as this Resolution goes? However, Sir, the view of this side of the House is, that, if certain conditions, as described in our amendments, are considered and those conditions, when considered and placed before the Ceylon Government, are accepted, then emigration may be allowed. That is, there should be some increase in the wages, and there must be some practical and suitable arrangement in that behalf, in any case. In addition to that there must be an authoritative stipulation between the Government of India and the Government of Ceylon that the previous indebtedness of the coolies should be removed and the minimum wage fixed for the future. If these stipulations, these covenants, are accepted and they are acted upon, then, of course, we shall not have any hesitation to countenance the emigration from India to Ceylon. Unless and until these conditions are fulfilled, unless and until these sympathetic efforts are made, this House is not in favour of supporting this Resolution at all.

Mr. President: I propose to put Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din's amendment in view of the fact that nobody seems inclined to discuss it.

The original Resolution was:

"That this Assembly approves the draft notification which has been laid in draft before the Chamber specifying the terms and conditions on which emigration for the purpose of unskilled work shall be lawful to Ceylon, and recommends to the Governor General in Council that the notification be published in the Gazette of India."

Since which an amendment has been moved:

"That after the word 'Ceylon' the words 'for one year only' be inserted and at the end of the Resolution the following words be added:

'and further recommends that a Committee of Inquiry consisting of 3 persons be sent to Ceylon to investigate the condition of the labour with a view to find out on what terms emigration should be permitted after the 5th of March, 1924'."

The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: I propose now to adjourn and to take Mr. Bagde's amendment after Lunch. I may point out for the information of the Assembly that on the original amendment paper amendments Nos. 2, 4 and 5 are of the same character inasmuch as they make the continuance of emigration for the purposes of unskilled labour in Ceylon conditional on certain action being taken by the Government of Ceylon. And, therefore, it may be convenient to take one or other of these amendments as an amendment in its turn to Mr. Bagde's.

Sir Montagu Webb, in the new amendment put on the paper to-day, raises the same question in a slightly different form. He invites the House to give the Government of Ceylon a time notice of 18 months instead of one year.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Twenty Five Minutes to Three of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Twenty Five Minutes to Three of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

Mr. K. G. Bagde (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Before moving my amendment I beg the Chair's indulgence to effect some verbal changes in it. They are, before the word "emigrants" I intend to put the word "assisted," and I wish to omit the words "who have been assisted otherwise than by a relative." After introducing these changes the amendment would read thus:

"That after the word 'approves' the words 'with the modification set out below' be inserted; after the words 'the notification' the words 'as approved' be inserted; and at the end of the Resolution the following be added:

'After clause (3) of the draft notification the following clause shall be inserted:

'(4) Before the 1st of April, 1924, the Legislature of Ceylon shall have enacted a law fixing the minimum basic wage for assisted emigrants to the satisfaction of the Governor General in Council and of both Chambers of the Indian Legislature.'

'And the subsequent clauses shall be re-numbered accordingly.'

Sir, by this amendment I propose that no emigration should be allowed to Ceylon after the 1st of April 1924, if the Legislature of that country does not pass a law fixing the minimum basic wage for assisted emigrants. This demand for the fixing of a basic minimum wage has been made for a long time. Honourable Members are aware that Mr. Marjoribanks and the Honourable Mr. Ahmed Thambi Maricar were specially deputed for the purpose of an exhaustive inquiry into the condition of Indian labour in Ceylon and these two gentlemen made certain recommendations. These recommendations are given on pages 4 and 5 of the Memorandum with regard to Emigration to Ceylon that has been distributed to us. There is the seventh recommendation which reads thus:

"The fixing of a minimum wage for labourers."

It is also important to note that the Ceylon Government is trying its best to evade the fixing of this minimum wage. On page 18 of the same Memorandum we find the opinion of the Government of Ceylon with regard to this question of minimum wage. They say:

"As regards the minimum wage this Government is not in favour of introducing such a principle as there is no doubt that it would tend to deprive the coolie of the benefit of higher wages which he earns at times of good crops or scarcity of labour. The cost of living of a family consisting of a man, his wife and two children is approximately Rs. 17 a month for basic stuffs and rice. This, of course, excludes the cost of cloth, expenditure in festivals, etc."

[Mr. K. G. Bagde.]

This will give a clear idea that the Ceylon Government is trying its best to ignore this question of fixing the minimum wage. Now, I submit that the non-existence of a minimum wage involves a hardship upon the labourers in general. Labourers are allured from this country outside on the prospect of high wages. When they are taken there they find that the promises given to them were all false. They have no other alternative but to stick to the jobs there and work on wages that are offered to them. If a minimum wage is fixed the labourers in this country would know exactly what wages will be paid to them and therefore there would not be much ground for deception. If we look to the present standard of wages in Ceylon we find that it is extremely low in comparison with that which obtains in this country. Even in urban areas we find that labourers are required to be paid more highly than they are paid in Ceylon. There are other amendments than mine which involve the same principle. The Honourable Sir Montagu Webb has got his amendment and there is not much difference between his amendment and mine. In that amendment he fixes the period from the 1st of October 1924, while in mine I mention the period from the 1st of April 1924. I have taken the 1st of April 1924, because it is the beginning of the new official year. Then there is another difference and that is he wants the minimum wage only to satisfy the Governor General in Council, while in my amendment I have added that this minimum wage should satisfy the Governor General in Council, and both Chambers of the Indian Legislature. I specially introduce the Indian Legislature in this amendment because this question of emigration is very important. Day by day it is growing more important and the fates of thousands of Indians are involved in this problem. If this amendment as proposed is included in the notification, then a period may arise which will make it necessary for the Government of India to prohibit or restrict emigration to Ceylon. Now, if we look to clause 13 of the Indian Emigration Act, I mean Act VII of 1922, that clause reads thus: "The Governor General may, by notification in the Gazette of India, prohibit from a date and for reasons to be specified in the notification of persons or any specified class of persons from emigrating to any specified country from the territories of any Local Government or any specified part thereof for the purpose of unskilled work. Every notification issued under this section shall be laid before both Chambers of the Indian Legislature as soon as it is made." So that right is vested in this Legislature by this Act, and therefore I think it is not advisable for the Legislature to part with that right. With these words, Sir, I commend my amendment to the acceptance of this House.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"That after the word 'approves' the words 'with the modification set out below' be inserted; after the words 'the notification' the words 'as approved' be inserted; and at the end of the Resolution the following be added:

'After clause (3) of the draft notification the following clause shall be inserted:

(4) Before the 1st of April, 1924, the Legislature of Ceylon shall have enacted a law fixing the minimum basic wage for assisted emigrants, to the satisfaction of the Governor General in Council and of both Chambers of the Indian Legislature.'

And the subsequent clauses shall be re-numbered accordingly."

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju (Ganjam cum Vizagapatnam: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I have given notice of a similar amendment, and therefore I take the earliest opportunity of supporting Mr. Bagde's amendment.

The reason why a minimum basic wage was insisted upon by the Select Committee and why it was proposed for the acceptance of this House is this. Unfortunately, Sir, even if emigration to the Colonies were prohibited, they have fixed a certain wage, not less than one shilling, and subsequently increased it, to suit the conditions in other places. But though we have the advantage of not having long-term contracts in Ceylon which is called indenture, it is worse in some respects. Sir, for a period of no less than 40 years there has been no large substantial change in the wages Bill. Even if we refer to India—and I refer the House to the rise in wages given by the Government of India—you will find that all industries during the last 20 years increased their wages by about 75 to 100 per cent. This is the only place where there has been no substantial increase in wages. In the latest statistics published for Ceylon by an officer of the Government, they state that roughly they may put the increase of wages at 33 to 70 cents per day. I may take it that the high figure is with reference not to the Estate labour but with reference to other labour, because the Ceylon Government admitted that they are paying about 20,000 people employed in the harbour and Public Works and in Railways a wage of Re. 1 to Rs. 1-8, on the average Rs. 1-4. But when we come to State labour, it actually starts with one-third, 5 annas 4 pies. The increase, as pointed out by the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar, is 5 annas 9 pies, it may be 6 annas in some places, according to the ability of the worker. When we have seen that the whole world is moving, why should this country, Ceylon, remain at a standstill? The only suggestion that could be put forth by the planters is that the industry cannot bear a higher wage. But so far as the tea industry is concerned they cannot put forth any such plea, because I have figures before me to show that the productive cost of tea is about 35 cents, whereas the ruling price during the last 12 years, 45, has gone up to 60, even to 70 and I may go further and state that even when it is selling at 43 cents, there are several Companies which made profits of between 50 to 100 per cent. And if detailed dividends given by various Companies are wanted, I would only refer Members who are curious to know to what is called the Rupee Company Book, corresponding to the "Investors' Review". There they will find what dividends were made even when it was selling at a rate of Rs. 48. Therefore there is a sufficient margin; but in spite of a sufficient margin no increase is made. Now, the Honourable Mr. Sarma suggested that Government generally do not interfere. It is true, but they interfere in cases where a powerful organization on the one side and ignorant masses on the other side are concerned. That is the reason why this emigration law has been introduced. The Honourable Sir Barnes made it plain when he introduced this Bill that its object is to protect the ignorant masses of India, to prevent them being duped and advantage being taken of them by powerful and influential persons on the other side. That is the object of this emigration law; otherwise there is no object in bringing it in at all. According to the statements made by the Ceylon deputation, according to the statements made by the Ceylon Government, the actual cost of food alone for a man, woman and two minor children who do not earn, is Rs. 17, and Rs. 17-8 according to the Deputation. The cost of clothing is besides variously valued at Rs. 8-8 and Rs. 5. Whatever it be, Rs. 21 or Rs. 22 is absolutely essential for a man and his family. Moreover, wherever a man gets a decent pay he does not send his wife out to work to supplement the domestic budget. Here even the woman has to work. According to the Government of India's information, the wage for a man is Rs. 10 and for a woman Rs. 8. They can thus between them earn only Rs. 18, while the cost of living is Rs. 22. Is it fair that we should allow such a thing to go on? I may say, Sir, that the Government of India since the time of Lord Hardinge, during the Viceroyalty of Lord Chelmsford and in the present Viceroy's time, have made every effort to secure proper conditions for Indians overseas, but Ceylon has escaped notice all along. It is admitted that there are about five lakhs of Indians employed on the estates in Ceylon, and of these about 90 per cent. have nothing to count upon; they have not a pie saved and they have no property whatsoever while they are all indebted to the extent of from Rs. 70 to Rs. 200. Would any Government who cares for the interests of its subjects allow them to go to a foreign country, stop there for many years and in the end have nothing more than indebtedness to fall back on? It is not even suggested that they are wasting their money in drink or other evils. It is economically impossible for these people to save anything. When their expenditure is more than their income how is it possible for them to save? They have indeed to run into debt. With regard to this, one witness who gave evidence before the Committee stated that he has 2,000 coolies on his estate of whom only 150 are out of debt, and he stated that the misery and trouble of these people is due entirely to the low wages which they receive from the planters. These planters are not Europeans, but look like Anglo-Indians or Eurasians. They stated that unless you raise the wages to at least 75 cents (that is 12 s.p.m. annas), they cannot live; otherwise they must live in misery.

Now, Sir, it is stated,—and it must be said to the credit of the Government of India—that they insisted upon securing the abolition of the penal clauses and they have succeeded in that. Much credit is due to them for this and they have also abolished the Thundu, that is indebtedness for failure or breach of contract. For this they cannot be proceeded with criminally and in Ceylon they cannot be arrested civilly, though civil liability still exists. Those things the Ceylon Government have cheerfully accepted and we are also grateful to them for what they have done. But whenever we touch this question of decent wages, we do not expect acquiescence from them, for persons who are accustomed to take large dividends are not the persons likely to agree to forego any profit voluntarily; some pressure must be brought to bear upon them; and that is the reason why the Select Committee insisted that that should be done. The only suggestion that has been made by the Honourable Mr. Webb is that instead of having 12 months, it should be 18 months. Giving 12 months or 18 months must depend on whether there is any prospect of any immediate increase of wages. If there is no increase it will be ruinous to the lakhs of people who are suffering in Ceylon. The reasons why these people go there are numerous. As Mr. Rangachariar said, if so many people have gone there to secure Rs. 10 per head, there are other means of inducing these people to go. It may be that people are not better off in India. That does not redound to the credit of the British administration. If we say “our people cannot get a proper living, therefore let them go on starvation wages elsewhere.” I do not think that would be an argument. But it may be an argument for the Government to take necessary steps for improvement of conditions in India. Therefore, Sir, before we agree to a period longer than one year, which is reasonably suggested by Mr. Bagde, I appeal to the House. The Select Committee have recommended that there should be a basic wage and the Ceylon Government have been advised that they should adopt it, and that Government have stated that they have no objection to institute inquiries. We know what is the meaning of instituting inquiries. We do not want to leave it in a haphazard manner when the interests of 5 lakhs of people are concerned. This is the only occasion when we can exercise our right. We must insist that there should be a basic wage to the satisfaction of that Government, of our Government and of ourselves. Otherwise, there is no use in bringing forward any Emigration laws when we cannot safeguard the interests of our subjects. It is the fundamental duty of every State to protect its own subjects, and if it does not do so, then it is failing in one of its legitimate duties.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, I rise to take part in the debate because I think we are straying away from the real point which is before the House. On a reference to the literature on the subject with which we have been furnished, I find, Sir, that there is absolutely no difference of opinion as to whether the Ceylon Government should fix a minimum wage. No doubt, the Ceylon Government at one stage raised the question that such fixation of minimum wage might interfere with certain industries in that country. And they were inclined not to favour such a proposition. I refer to page 18 of the paper-book:

"As regards a minimum wage this Government is not in favour of introducing such a principle as there is no doubt that it would tend to deprive the cooly of the benefit of the higher wages which he earns at times of good crops or scarcity of labour."

But towards the end of the deliberations of the Standing Committee, I find, from the paper-book that the question was put in a very definite form to the representatives who came over from Ceylon, and it was suggested that this question of a minimum basic wage should be settled once for all. At page 44 of the paper-book, the House will find that the Standing Committee:

"Resolved that the Ceylon Government should be asked to make an inquiry into the question of fixing a basic wage subject to a minimum, and of the cost of living in relation to the rate of wages now paid. In the meantime the Government of India should do its best to secure an improvement in wages. On the receipt of the report suggested above, the Emigration Committee would have to consider the findings and to decide whether to ask for a Joint Committee to settle what should be the rate of wages and other details."

Now, Sir, the question to my mind, is this. But before proceeding further I should say that at page 42 it has been reported that—the Honourable Mr. Sarma stated to the Deputation from Ceylon, that "negotiations on the subject of a basic wage should take place at an early date with a view to an arrangement being arrived at, if possible, before the draft notification under section 10 should be laid before the two Houses so as to enable the Government of India to reach conclusions satisfactory to all and to carry the Councils with them." That being so, Sir, there is no doubt that the Committee came to the conclusion that the question of the basic wage should be settled before the notification was issued. The House has adopted by its attitude towards the notification, already certain suggestions which were recommended by the Standing Committee, and these have been embodied in the proposed notification. They are of very great practical utility and are entirely in accord with the decision which the Committee arrived at. It is incumbent upon us to see that the notification secures those conditions and safeguards for the benefit of the emigrants. Therefore there is only one question now standing out, for consideration by the House, namely, the fixation of the basic wage. That question, Sir, I may ask the House to consider, will take some time to settle, and the result of the amendments proposed will be that if for securing that end in view, we have to wait, and the notification in question be held back, for the present, emigration in the meantime will continue without those safeguards which have been provided in the notification itself and on the old lines, without securing those benefits which the notification intends to secure to the emigrants. The question of a basic wage, if it could have been settled in accordance with the wishes of the Committee, would have been settled before this notification was placed on the table of this House. That having failed of immediate achievement, the only question that now remains is whether we should allow the old state of things to continue, with regard to emigration, or have a notification at once securing most of the ends we have in view and which are exactly in accordance with the conclusions of the Standing Committee. If the wording of the amendments be considered, it will appear that it is more or less inconsistent with the notification itself, and that the amendments in question do not fit into the Resolution. The notification says that emigration shall be valid only if the conditions laid down therein are fulfilled, whereas the amendments that are proposed are to the effect (to take up the first amendment), that:

"After clause (3) of the draft notification the following clause shall be inserted:

'(4) Before the 1st of April 1924, the Legislature of Ceylon shall have enacted a law fixing the minimum basic wage for emigrants, who have been assisted otherwise than by a relative to the satisfaction of the Governor General in Council and of both Chambers of the Indian Legislature'."

It does not suggest any immediate action. Does it mean that if on the 1st of April 1924 the Legislature of Ceylon fails to enact a law fixing the minimum basic wage, all emigration will then become illegal? As it is, it simply declares a pious wish, because it merely says that the "Ceylon Government should enact by the 1st of April 1924, a law as proposed to the satisfaction of the Governor General in Council and of both Chambers of the Indian Legislature". It is really a direction to the Ceylon Government, and there are no means of compelling the Ceylon Government to accept the suggestion, and carry it out, within the proposed time-limit. On going through the papers supplied to us, I find that it was not decided by the Standing Emigration Committee that emigration should be stopped. Pending the settlement of the minimum wage questions I could have understood the position if emigration could have been stopped in the meantime and if the Standing Committee came to the conclusion that emigration should be suspended until conditions as to fixation of a minimum basic wage were fulfilled. But that is certainly not to the advantage of the emigrants themselves, or to the people of India. Further whatever we may say, emigration after all is the natural outcome of economic conditions, and therefore it must have operation where economic conditions require it. Therefore, Sir, if we try to stop it in British India, it will seek its natural outlet. If emigration is really wanted it will find some natural mode of operation. On the whole, I think it will not be good for the emigrants themselves if this House desists from all action, and allows things to go on as at present without our doing anything until the question of a basic wage is settled. I submit, Sir, that is not a desirable state of things to have. We have been told,—and it is a fact,—that the Government has retained the power of imposing upon the Ceylon Government certain conditions on the question of a basic wage. Judging from the papers before us, it will certainly take some time to settle this question satisfactorily. It requires some inquiry, and it cannot be done in a hurry. So that, if we take such a view of the whole question, it will not be difficult to see that it is altogether to our advantage that the restrictions and safeguards, whatever they are, as provided in the notification should meet with the acceptance of the House. We are assured that Government is prepared to act in accordance with the conclusions of the Standing Committee on that point. I for one therefore do not see any reason why in order to gain that one point, we should keep in abeyance the operation of the other clauses as laid down in the notification. I hope the House will consider the whole question from that point of view, and try and cut short the debate on a point which, if gained, will perhaps not carry any advantage to anybody.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras ceded Districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, before I enter into the merits of this question, I would refer to section 10 of the Emigration Act. According to that section, from the 5th of March of this year, all emigration to Ceylon will become illegal unless permission is given by notification by the Governor General in Council, and therefore this Resolution is put before the Assembly with certain conditions imposed in regard to emigration.

The new conditions we now propose will no doubt require a certain amount of time to negotiate. And therefore in our amendments we have given a further period to bring these conditions into operation. That does not mean that these amendments would prevent the continuance of emigration under the conditions laid down in the Resolution moved by Government.

Now, Sir, in regard to this question, my Honourable friends who have spoken have entered into the fullest details as regards the conditions of labour, wages and other matters. The point immediately covered by the amendment is the question of a minimum wage. Now, this question is important, apart from other considerations, in that, if the Government of Ceylon fixes a minimum wage, it will be an authoritative notification as it were to all emigrants of what they are sure to get in Ceylon and it will prevent, as has been said by one of the previous speakers, any exaggerated ideas of the wages that await the emigrant to Ceylon. That will be one good result of fixing a minimum wage. As regards this point, the Ceylon Government no doubt said they were agreeable to fix a minimum wage. But they said they would have to make inquiries as regards the prevailing rates in the various estates and also they want to make inquiries in Southern India, that is the area from which these emigrants come. I do not think that these two grounds are really very material. That is, a basic wage, to be fixed by the Government of Ceylon, must I suppose reasonably vary from one area to another. They cannot say that this is the minimum wage for every part of Ceylon. There must be some variation and that they must go about doing as quickly as they can. As to discovering the conditions of labour and all the amenities which the labourer enjoys in his own home, I think that is unnecessary, for this simple reason. You fix your wage just as you like. If the labourer desires it and if he thinks the wage is better than he would get at home, he will come; if not, he will not. For an inquiry like that into the wages earned in this area from which the emigrant generally goes, will not be a satisfactory one unless this Government also takes part in it, and it will be an inquiry which will have to take up various aspects of the question. There is rural agricultural labour, in which it is impossible to fix, impracticable to settle, the actual amount earned by a labourer, for this simple reason that there are so many things which the agricultural rural labourer in Southern India gets which, if converted into money, would be very much more than the money which the labourer gets in the city. He gets free housing, free vegetables, free fish, free firewood, and always a certain area of land for which nothing is charged in which he can grow his own garden or he can raise some short crops. And, besides, there are certain customary gifts at festivals given to the labourer—both festivals in his own house and festivals in the employer's house. I mean to say an inquiry like that in regard to rural agricultural labour will never be satisfactory. And that, I point out to the House, is at the root of the very low figure which sometimes is given as wages to agricultural rural labourers and all people who are philanthropically minded start saying: They get such a low wage. The test would be to find out what is the wages in towns—smaller towns, bigger towns and even in cities. That should be the test. That could be found out without much difficulty and no Ceylon Commission need come over here to inquire about that. We know, every one in this Assembly knows, that the minimum wage of an ordinary unskilled labourer in the towns is twelve annas

Dr. Nand Lal: More than that.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: More than that. I gather from my friends everywhere that it is more than that. I want to put my case on the most modest scale. I know it is one rupee or Rs. 1-8-0 or it even goes up to Rs. 2. Strong able-bodied men are able to earn Rs. 2 a day. That is by carrying loads from one place to another. Therefore, unskilled labour is not underpaid in India, at any rate in the smaller towns or larger towns. Well, then the question is—and it is a question when it is not easy to answer in one word—if there is such a high wage here, why do people go to Ceylon? We have got two facts. Even according to the highest estimate the wages in Ceylon varies from Rs. 12 to Rs. 17 per mensem. That gives us not more than 8 annas or 9 annas per diem. That is an undisputed fact. And we know also as a fact that the wages in India in towns is never less than 12 annas. Why do people go then? That, I consider, is a question which I can only answer by saying that there is some defect in the mental condition of a large class of people and that they do not understand what is good to them. That is all I can say. The question has been asked of me by several friends and I would only say that the defective judgment of these labourers is responsible for their not knowing that in India itself, not far from their homes in the villages, they could find better wages. Well, apart from that question, with regard to emigration to Ceylon, I will not say that there is much that we can say against our own Government. During the last 8 or 10 years the Government of India has taken a good deal of interest in this matter and has endeavoured to protect the interests of emigrants. Even at present, the Government of India are as keen, I have no doubt, as we are; only they are not in a position to speak out as strongly as we do. The Government cannot do that in respect to another Government. But the fact remains that these rural labourers who are admittedly in every country unable to protect themselves and unable to judge for themselves, are persuaded by some kind of promise, by some kind of rosy account, to go to Ceylon, after receiving some money and executing a bond for the amount. If it is not indenture in the strict sense of the term, the bond which they execute for moneys they receive and for moneys which they have not received—that is a point which is admitted in the Government papers and I do not think there can be any dispute about that—subsists all their lives in Ceylon. The wages they get in Ceylon does not enable them to discharge the debt which they have contracted and the bond which they have signed in India for advances to meet the expenses of the voyage and maintenance during transit. That debt subsists and so long as they are not able to discharge that debt, they cannot come back. Coming back means an expenditure of Rs. 10 or 15 and these people who are admittedly in debt to the tune of Rs. 70 to Rs. 200—that is one of the official figures—are unable to find the money to come back to their homes and therefore they remain there. I think that is an answer why people go there and do not come back. Therefore, the fixing of a minimum wage is an absolute necessity now-a-days.

Then, there is another consideration in regard to this. There are hardly any returned emigrants from Ceylon who could be pointed to as having improved their condition by this emigration. Such instances we have found from emigrants to the other colonies. Though hundreds may have gone under there have always been some who have come back better off than they were when they left the country and those were shown as examples of the advantages of emigration. But in the case of Ceylon we can hardly find a person who has improved his condition either when he came back or who is in an improved condition in Ceylon, having acquired a house, having acquired land or being in a better position.

These considerations ought to lead the Assembly to decide upon the fixing of a minimum wage. It is now too late. If we throw away the Resolution or if this Resolution which the Government has proposed is not passed, the whole thing will be upset and therefore we propose to give a time limit to the Government of Ceylon to fix a basic minimum wage for the labour that goes to Ceylon.

In that matter there is a slight difference in these amendments, but I shall refer to it for this reason. The amendment proposed by Mr. Bagde says that the minimum wage ought to be accepted by both the Chambers of the Legislature. It is a point on which there might be a difference of opinion. Is it necessary to have it before both the Houses of Legislature? Can we not trust the Governor General in Council to accept—I am simply putting the alternative case because I do feel personally that there is very little ground to complain against the action of the Government of India in this matter. I think they may well be trusted to look after the interests of labourers, while I cannot say the same of the Government of Ceylon which unfortunately is peculiarly situated, because it has long identified itself with the planters and all this recruiting goes on at the expense of the Government of Ceylon, and naturally owing to certain conditions in Ceylon the Government has to identify itself with the planters. Therefore, in regard to that point it is a matter on which there might be a difference but I should prefer not to divide the House on that matter and it is better for us to be unanimous about it. Then as to the time limit there is again this difficulty. A year's limit is proposed in the amendment which my Honourable friend, Mr. Bagde, has moved. Sir Montagu Webb suggests 18 months. I do not know whether we should divide on that point again, whether Mr. Bagde or Sir Montagu Webb cannot either of them give up his position and agree, because we all seem to agree upon the main question that a minimum wage ought to be fixed and I do not see why we should on small matters disagree. Now in regard to the wage, the substantial grievance is the wage figure, 10 and 16. 10 is the figure given in Mr. Merjibanks' report. That was a report which was published in 1917. I consider that as a report which the Assembly could readily accept, probably more readily accept than other statements which were made before the Emigration Committee and on other occasions. Now, Mr. Marjoribanks and Mr. Maricaire put Rs. 10 as the maximum wages earned by a man and about Rs. 6 as the wages earned by a woman. That is Rs. 16 for both man and woman. Now, it is apparent that when the cost of living is Rs. 20 and annas 4 only for feeding and clothing, without any extras, the husband and wife are both compelled to earn in order to make up only Rs. 16. It means a wage less than that on which they could live in comfort. Now we have another figure. That is the cost of maintaining a person in jail in Ceylon. It is Rs. 6 and some annas. Honourable Members will at once see the disparity between the wages earned and the cost of living.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: May I ask the Honourable Member whether he is moving his own amendment or speaking on Mr. Bagde's amendment.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: I am only speaking on Mr. Bagde's amendment.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Are you moving yours?

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: Please wait. The question of minimum wage is very important and there is great disparity between the wages earned and the cost of living. I have pointed out that it is so great that it has become necessary that we ought to fix a minimum wage. Now, I do not know how you are going to deal with these amendments. I shall however move my amendment now. I do not want to get into conflict with any of those who are at one with me on the main question. That is my difficulty at present. This is not a matter on which I should like to fritter away the support of the Assembly on any small matter on which we may disagree and therefore my amendment is to the effect that we may trust the Governor General in Council to see that the minimum wage which the Ceylon Government may fix is sufficient to keep only body and soul together for these people but also keep them in comfort and keep them in some kind of self-respect and the time limit which I propose is that it may be extended to one year. I have no objection to that. That is the first of my amendments. I have three amendments on the paper. My first amendment reads thus:

"To the Notification the following shall be added, namely:

"Within six months from the issue of this Notification or within such further period as the Governor General in Council may by notification appoint before the 5th March 1924 the Government of Ceylon shall take and complete the necessary steps to legally fix a minimum wage to be paid to emigrants by the Ceylon planters—such wage being one previously approved by the Governor General in Council."

Then my next amendment runs as follows:

"The number of new emigrants after the date of this Notification to Ceylon shall not exceed 10,000 for the period ending 5th March 1924."

It is an important one for this reason. A large overcrowding of these emigrants to Ceylon would necessarily reduce the wages. The competition would be so great that practically either they would be without employment or accept such low wages as the planters, the employers, choose to give them and as during the last one or two years after this question was raised and after the passing of the Act and after the introduction of the Bill, the emigration activities, the recruiting activities have been very keen, large numbers of people have been taken to Ceylon, and there is a sufficiently large number of labouring population there, it is better to cry halt at this stage so that the numbers that now flock to Ceylon may not reduce the wages and make the rule under which we are going to have a minimum basic wage practically inoperative. It is on that view, I say, that the number of emigrants ought to be restricted. Ordinarily about 25,000 people

Mr. President: I must draw the Honourable Member's attention to the fact that his time is exhausted.

Rao Bahadur O. S. Subrahmanayam: Ordinarily 25,000 people used to emigrate, and as large numbers emigrated later on, so I reduce it to 10,000. Another amendment is that during this period, the transition period, that is, the period before the fixing of the minimum basic wage, undoubtedly we must call upon the planters to raise the wage they are now giving on each estate by 30 per cent., by at least 30 per cent., and that is the third point. I therefore move, Sir, my amendment.

Mr. W. S. J. Willson: Sir, I should like to thank Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar for asking for this complete set of papers which Government have kindly given us, and it has been a most interesting study. Since we have had it, as the latest recruit to the Emigration Committee, I feel that I can make some remarks upon the labours of my predecessors, for which I was not responsible, and I think we may very well congratulate them on the results of their efforts with the Ceylon Government, which tend so much to improve and ameliorate the conditions under which labour is employed in Ceylon. For myself, I am impressed with the Government letter from Colombo dated the 28th October and with the readiness with which the Ceylon Government have yielded to the persuasive powers of our letter of the 11th October and their promise to at once institute an inquiry with a view to ascertaining the cost of living and the rates of wages paid, etc., etc. That wish was the one arrived at by the Emigration Committee, and my own view is that we shall be very well advised to await the results of that inquiry before we attempt to legislate for what ought to happen after the 1st April 1924 or any other date which may be mentioned in these other Resolutions. Sir, this House does not know what it is likely to do itself by the 1st April 1924, or what is likely to be the position anywhere; so that it seems to me rather unreasonable to ask the Government of Ceylon to enact what planters shall do in 1924 in what is now an unknown state of the trade in that year. Various figures were given, particularly by Mr. Raju, and I noticed that he confined his remarks entirely to the wages paid in the tea trade and he referred to the temporary, or at any rate recently accrued, prosperity of the tea gardens. But rubber is very far from being a prosperous concern. Now, Sir, I find it very difficult indeed to lend any support to any amendment in favour of fixing a basic minimum wage. We know very well that to move from his home in India the common lot of the labourer. I have travelled down through Southern India and I have seen labourers living there in the most miserable mud huts where a man of my size could very easily touch the roof; where they have no facilities of any sort of description and where they earn what seems to me to be absolutely a beggarly wage. It is, as I have said, customary for labour to emigrate everywhere. Even my own syce in Calcutta has found it to his advantage to emigrate from Delhi; with me in Calcutta he gets Rs. 17 a month and no other allowances. Now these gentlemen who emigrate from South India to Ceylon have only to travel a little distance of 22 miles by sea. I have visited plantations, Sir, in Ceylon (though I may say that I am not financially interested in any of them) and I did not go to examine the position personally with a view to addressing this House on the subject but merely as a passer-through. I found there very comfortable outfits generally for the workers on the estates that I happened to come across. They are provided with very good houses and they have all sorts of allowances which I need not go into because they are all reported on in this list. But it strikes me that they had arrived at a state of comfort, convenience and happiness which they—a great many of them—did not have originally in their own homes. Now I say that the proof of the pudding is in the eating. If these men were as well off in their own homes, they would not want to go to Ceylon though it is only just a very little distance away. They are, it is true, of an ignorant class, but they are by no means fools and a man knows when he is well-fed and reasonably housed and what is to his own personal advantage so far as purely creature comforts are concerned. Efforts have been made all the world over to fix basic rates of wages, and so far as I know they have practically all failed. Labour is a commodity and we all live by disposing of our commodities, whatever they may be; they may be our brains, our houses, our goods or the labours of our hands. Labour is employed in producing something. What that something fetches in its turn is governed by the law of supply and demand, and that law must inevitably react on the labour that is used to produce it. One Honourable Member compared the wages paid in places like the docks and harbours in Ceylon, which is Rs. 1 8 a day, with the wages shown in this paper earnable on a tea estate; but the conditions are totally different. In the first place, labour on an estate is rather a pleasant occupation, if any occupation which we have to indulge in to earn a living is pleasant, whereas labour in docks is extremely hard work, and people prefer the lighter duties on an estate and the open air life in the country to those conditions in town labour, where they have to find expensive lodgings, and those comparisons made are, to my mind, outside the point. I should be very pleased indeed if by a mere stroke of the pen we could raise the wages of everybody, of very cooly to Rs. 100 a month, of every clerk to Rs. 1,000 a month, double the wages of every medical practitioner, halve the wages of every lawyer, and so on, but it cannot be done, Sir. Labour has its value which comes out in the article which it produces. Mr. Rangachariar made rather a point about the indebtedness to the kanganis. But I find, from this very excellent brief, that of the 90 lakhs which were at one time outstanding, two-thirds of it have been paid off, and that being so, I think we can leave it to time to adjust the balance. As I have said, Sir, I cannot support any amendment which aims at fixing a basic wage, because I am convinced that it is impracticable, and I have no fear, as seems to be entertained in some quarters in this House, that labour is likely to rush off to Ceylon in such overwhelming quantities that it will bring down the market. Mr. Rangachariar also mentioned the figures on page 43 showing that 49,000 men went between January and August 1922, at the rate of some 10,000 a month during June, July and August. Sir, there is nothing striking in those figures at all, because if he will turn to page 30 of the brief, he will find that in the 9 years from 1913 to 1921, 585,401 coolies went, which divided by 9 gives an average of 65,000 per year, which is a little less than 5,500 per month, against 6,000 per month that he has pointed out in the figures which he quoted; and, I must remind him that those figures for June, July and August relate to a time of the year when crops are coming on and it is the natural time when labourers should go. I do not think, Sir, that I need labour the point any further about the fixing of a basic wage. I am very much afraid of it. I do not think it will work. I do not think it is right that we should attempt to impose on the Ceylon Government what they ought to do twelve months hence, whereas, I say, we do not in the least know what we are likely to do then ourselves or what the position is likely to be.

[Mr. W. S. J. Willson.]

Rai Bahadur S. N. Singh (Bihar and Orissa: Nominated Official): I move that the question be now put.

Sir Montagu Webb (Bombay: European): Sir, I have spent most of my life in India. One of the results of that experience is that I yield to no Member of this House in my desire, I may say ~~in~~ my anxiety, to see that all Indians who go overseas to labour, shall be treated fairly and properly, and with that respect which is due to Members of the British Empire. Now, Sir, we have heard a great deal about the alleged misfortunes and the poverty of these unfortunate men who have gone to Ceylon. It has been my good fortune, Sir, to see with my own eyes the state of the Indian labour in Ceylon. I have also seen it in Natal. I have seen it in Central Africa; and in other parts of Africa and of the world. I must say that the impression left upon my mind is that on the whole those Indians who go overseas, generally do very well for themselves and are living very comfortably and satisfactorily, perhaps even more so than they did in this country. I know in some cases that Indians who go overseas not only live comfortably, but they acquire property and they amass considerable wealth. I can recall several parts of the British Empire where Indians own shops, houses and properties far superior to those which some of the Europeans on the spot hold.

(An Honourable Member: "Not in Ceylon.")

Sir Montagu Webb: I remember, Sir, if I may recall the incident, I remember a few years ago when I was travelling in Central Africa,—in Northern Nyasaland to be quite definite,—some hundreds of miles away from the coast, to my astonishment, away in the jungle I came upon an Indian with a little field and a little shop. I was so astonished that I stopped to inquire where this man came from, and he told me "Oh I belong to Porbandar,"—half way between Karachi and Bombay. I felt that I was meeting one of my own countrymen, and I stopped and had a very long conversation with this man. We were very pleased to meet each other. I cross-questioned him closely. He was doing very well. He was satisfied with his surroundings, and he was remitting—this is the point—he was remitting through the Post Office a considerable sum of money to India. A few weeks later when I happened to be talking to some of my European friends in that part of the world about this man, they said "Oh yes, these Indians are not much good to this country because they do not spend very much here; they remit all their money back to India." Sir, I seem to have heard that argument before, about people who do not do much good where they work, because they remit all their money back to their mother country. Sir, I am no believer in those theories.

Dr. Mand Lal: I thought we had to discuss the question of Ceylon only.

Sir Montagu Webb: I mention these facts merely to lend emphasis to my argument that Indians working overseas remit their savings to India, and further that the labour in Ceylon is not nearly so badly off as some of the speeches which we have heard in this House this morning might lead us to believe. Mr. Willson has just given one or two explanations and anticipated my remarks with regard to certain figures of emigration which I had proposed to quote. Now, Mr. Rangachariar could not make out why it was that so many people went from the south of India to Ceylon. May I suggest that the explanation is obvious? They are going there to better their conditions of life. They are going there, Sir, because they are finding better circumstances, and they are better off in Ceylon than they are in the South of India. There is in my mind not the slightest doubt about it. I have been there and seen it with my own eyes. My friend, Dr. Nand Lal, went so far as to hint there was a sort of slavery in Ceylon. Why, Sir, I can only say in reply that there must be still more slavery in Southern India. I suppose it is to escape that kind of slavery that some of this labour goes over to Ceylon. Now, Sir, I have an amendment on the paper which indicates that my sympathies in this matter and those of the movers of other amendments are very much the same. We should all like to see something done to benefit the labour that goes over to Ceylon. But I think Sir,—I do not know if the Honourable Members who moved their Resolutions can see eye to eye with me, but I venture to submit that my Resolution puts the matter perhaps a little bit more acceptably. It proposes for example not to alter the Notification. I have suggested merely that we should add a few words to Government's Resolution. I have suggested in my amendment that we should give another six months—eighteen months in all—to the Ceylon Government in order to do what they can, and I think this House has every reason to feel confidence in the Ceylon Government. They have to consult the different parts of the country; they have to satisfy their own Legislature. All this will take time. There will be consultations with the Government of India and naturally this will take more time. I do not think, Sir, that we should press for too short a period, and I have therefore suggested that we should give the Ceylon Government time up to the 1st of October, 1924, and thereafter, if they have not brought about an improvement in the conditions of labour which this Government thinks satisfactory, we can move again. I quite share the doubts expressed by Mr. Willson as to the possibility of fixing a minimum wage. I do not think such a thing has ever been done in the East yet, and although it was attempted in the United Kingdom, there is no doubt whatever that the attempt has broken down. It is not so easy to fix a minimum wage as some Honourable Members think. At the same time, I am prepared to give the Ceylon Government an opportunity of improving the conditions of this labour. I think it is our duty to do so, and I would therefore ask Mr. Subrahmanayam if he can see his way to accept the proposal I have put forward. I do not know, Sir, whether I can move still another amendment to the amendment that he proposes. Perhaps my friend Mr. Bagde will accept the proposals I have put forward Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: You don't make it a condition. You simply make a recommendation, while the others make it a condition.

Mr. President: I took Mr. Ahmed's amendment first against the Resolution because it stood first on the paper. Then Mr. Bagde proposed to make the continuance of emigration conditional on certain action by the Ceylon Government. The Honourable Member does not propose to do that.

The scope of his amendment is even narrower. I must put Mr. Subrahmanayam's amendment as an amendment to Mr. Bagde's amendment as an improvement or the reverse of it according to the judgment of the House. It depends upon the decision of the House whether that excludes the Honourable Member from moving another amendment.

Sir Montagu Webb: In that case, Sir, I will wait for the opinion of the House, before moving my amendment.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: Sir, although I sympathise with some of the proposals in the amendments proposed before this Assembly, I must say that I cannot accept several others put forward by my Honourable friends. In the first place, it must be made quite clear that I do not want that any restrictions should be imposed upon the labourers against their leaving the country if they feel that by going out of the country they can improve their condition. We have no right to keep them here when they feel so. Sir, although that is my view, it is also necessary for us to see, when we allow large emigration to those Colonies where there are a large number of Indians already settled, that their wages are not lowered by fresh emigration to a point which is undesirable. The solution of this question is not very easy. We have to reconcile the interests of those people 4 P.M. who want to go out to better their prospects with the interests of those people who have already settled in the Colony. If these people who are settled in the Colony are not Indians perhaps this Assembly may not give much attention to that point, but still it is necessary for us to look to the interests of those who are already settled there. I, therefore, feel that, under these difficult conditions, it would have been much better if the whole question of negotiation had been left to Government. I do not believe an Assembly like this is capable of negotiating a treaty with a foreign Government. That is the business of the Government. Unfortunately, even Government, in order to please the Assembly, put a clause in the Bill that such conditions should be approved by this Assembly. The whole difficulty is created on account of that. And, therefore, we see here proposals made which unfortunately we cannot throw out nor can we accept. Take the proposal of my friend, Mr. Subrahmanayam. I sympathise with him that the number of people to be sent should be limited. But how are we to decide whether that number should be 10 thousand or 15 thousand? That is a matter which he should have left to the Government of India and certainly I should have then supported him. As regards the minimum wage, Sir, my sympathies are fixing a minimum wage. I have no fears, which my Honourable friend, Mr. Willson, and my Honourable friend, Sir Montagu Webb, have, about fixing the minimum wage. The minimum wage has been fixed in several countries and these minimum wage laws have not yet been repealed, so we can have some assurance in our minds with regard to these laws. If we fix the wage, to some extent, we protect the interests of those who are already settled. Sir, but it is also out of place to fix the minimum wage in our Assembly. It is a matter which we must leave to the Government of India,—whether that minimum wage should be Rs. 15, or Rs. 16, or Rs. 17. I therefore do not approve of the idea that the fixing of the minimum wage should be in the hands of this Assembly. Sir, when we have to fix the minimum wage, we must see that we do not fix the minimum wage at such a high point that the emigration will be stopped. My Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, said: Why should the Ceylon Government inquire into the conditions of Southern India? It is necessary to find out whether it will be advantageous to the labourer in Southern

[Mr. N. M. Joshi.]

India to go to Ceylon on a particular wage. Therefore, an inquiry into the conditions in Southern India is certainly necessary. But there are some people who are afraid of that inquiry. They know that the inquiry will bring out information which they do not wish should see the light. Only the other day, my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, was praising the planters of India and he painted a glowing picture of the conditions of the plantations in India. What are those conditions? In the plantations in India people are paid Rs. 6 or 7 or 8. Why should we prevent these people from going to Ceylon to get Rs. 12, even if they do not get Rs. 17? Sir, the other day I also wanted several conditions to be pressed upon the planters in India in order that the conditions should be improved for the labourers, but, Sir, the proposal was not accepted. Unfortunately, the Standing Emigration Committee now comes forward to lay down restrictions upon the planters in the sense that the people should be repatriated under certain conditions, sick leave should be given, etc. If we want that our labourers should not go to Ceylon, the best thing is to improve the conditions in India and therefore I think my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, instead of painting glowing pictures of the labour conditions in India, should henceforth try to improve them. Sir, Mr. Rangachariar also referred to the debts which these labourers have with kanganis and from that he inferred that the people who are there do not really prosper. It is a wrong conclusion altogether. If he had inquired into the debts which existed on the Indian plantations he would not have been surprised by this at all. It is the business of the planters to keep these people in debt, whether they prosper or not. My friend, Mr. Nag, who has got experience of Assam, will tell you that if a man goes and pays his debt, the planter will not accept the money. That is a fact in India in Assam.

Mr. B. C. Allen (Assam: Nominated Official): I protest against that statement. Mr. Joshi has no foundation whatever for making that statement against the Assam planters.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I would only refer my Honourable friend to the report which was recently published by the Assam Labour Committee.

(An Honourable Member: "I have got the authority.")

Mr. B. C. Allen: Can Mr. Joshi quote it here? Can he let me have the paragraph?

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I cannot quote it here to-day.

Mr. N. M. Samarth (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): He has given the authority. The Honourable Member had better consult it.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I am quite sure of my facts. There is here my friend, Mr. Nag, who has got a lot of experience of plantations in India and I am quite sure he would corroborate that fact. Therefore, the fact that these labourers are indebted to some extent is not a negation of the fact of their own prosperity at all. I therefore think that although we should fix the wage, and it is necessary to fix the wage in the interests of the people who are already settled there, we must not fix it at such a point which will prevent emigration altogether and which will be against the interests of the people who have to emigrate from this country. Therefore, when we try to settle the conditions on which we should permit emigration, we should take into consideration the fact that without sacrificing the interests of those people who are settled there, and without also sacrificing the interests of those who want to go, we should be in a position to improve their condition. The only way in my humble judgment to secure improvement is that the Government of India should be watchful about the interests of our people. Sir, nobody has mentioned that it is necessary for the Government of India to appoint an agent in these Colonies. I do not know whether the Government of India has decided

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: It is one of the conditions.

Mr. N. M. Joasi: It is one of the conditions, but I want to know from the Government of India whether they are going to fulfil that condition themselves. This is not a condition to be fulfilled by the Ceylonese Government. It is a condition to be fulfilled by the Government of India. The Government of India have never mentioned yet that, as soon as emigration is permitted, they will appoint an agent. If an agent is appointed, I think that fact in itself will tend to improve the labour conditions in Ceylon. It will enable us to get correct reports upon which we can place reliance and upon which we can take action. Sir, if we have got our agents, then we can get correct information, and if we get correct information, we can propagate that information, so that no person will go out of the country under any misapprehension or on any incorrect information. If they do this much, I think we shall have taken sufficient care of the people who will be going out. But the real solution of the problem lies in our improving conditions here. Unless you improve the conditions here, people will go out, and it is not right that we should prevent their going out. On the whole, Sir, after having seen all these amendments, I am inclined to support the amendment of Sir Montagu Webb, because it does not ask the Government of India to stop emigration altogether but it lays a certain duty upon them to see that a minimum wage will be fixed very soon. With these remarks, Sir, I resume my seat.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: Sir, I have been always an optimist in my life and I am sure that after shewing me the indulgence of hearing me once again, the House will agree that the Notification which has been put by the Government of India before them is one that they can readily accept. I do not propose to go into all the details of the criticisms that have been levelled against us for it is a very late hour and it is unnecessary to dwell minutely on the state of the wages in Ceylon. But there are some salient points which have been urged on the attention of the House which I should like to deal with.

A good deal of confusion of thought has been exhibited in the course of the discussion between the causes which have led to the indebtedness of the cooly in Ceylon in the past and existing at present there and the conditions on which we propose to allow labourers to emigrate hereafter to Ceylon. Every one admits that under former conditions the labourer went to Ceylon saddled with debt. The cost of emigration, the advances given to him when he was in India, the penal provisions which were provided to enforce labour, the facilities for his obtaining loans, enabled him, or rather compelled him, induced him to get into debt, and that, as has been shown, is going to be wiped out. He is to be no longer subject to that debt and cannot be imprisoned for it. And under our Notification the labourer from India would go to Ceylon without any debt whatsoever. All the expenses must be met from the common fund. No agreement for more than a month would be valid. The monies that are advanced to him in India, or that may be advanced in Ceylon cannot be recovered.

Dr. Nand Lal: What about civil liability?

Mr. President: Order, order.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: I am talking of the labourer that is going hereafter from India and that is the only labourer we have to deal with under this Notification, because the other labourers are there already. This labourer goes saddled with no debt whatsoever. He cannot contract any debt enforceable by arrest. There is no penal provision binding him. At the end of a month he can quit. We have, furthermore, provided that the Government undertake to repatriate him at their expense provided he satisfies our Emigration Agent or other officer who may be appointed in his stead that the conditions do not suit him. Therefore, every precaution that can be taken has been taken under the Notification laid before you. Nor would it be possible for Honourable Members. I think, to justify such a gloomy picture as has been drawn as to the state of wages obtaining in Ceylon. As has been effectively put by one of the members of the Revenue Department, in former days, if you are going to calculate the cost of labour on the footing that every man has to be paid a certain rate, if the cost of cultivation be counted up in money, there would hardly be any profit left to any agriculturist and the wonder would be how any agriculturer could manage to subsist on the soil or pay any revenue whatever. Similarly, elaborate calculations have been made as to what the labourer and his family have been deriving in the past in the shape of wages and their sufficiency. As has been aptly put, the proof of the pudding is in the eating of it. The men find it to their advantage to go there. I go further. We have positive proof. Two members of the Deputation which went to Ceylon in 1917 reported to us that the wages were not altogether unsatisfactory:

"The rate of wages paid on estates (they give calculations) does appear to be sufficient to keep a labourer in health and strength and to leave a margin over."

I had the curiosity to send for the post office statistics and I find that there were three hundred thousand and odd money orders remitted to India during 1921-22 to the extent of 87 lakhs of rupees. I am not going to contend for a moment that all this represents the savings of labour but surely three hundred thousand traders are not there and the number itself clearly shows that a large number of labourers have been remitting small or large sums to India and they would not have been labouring there if they had not been in a position to do so. I do not wish the House to be under the impression that the Government are satisfied that the wages are as adequate as they might be, but to depict the picture the other way and show that the conditions are absolutely unsatisfactory is, I think, overdrawing it. We have positive information that a large number of labourers have been remitting their savings to this country. It is a fact that about 60,000 or 70,000 labourers have been coming and going back and that shows that the conditions cannot be as unsatisfactory as is imagined by many individuals. The figures that have been quoted in the proof that has been circulated show clearly that every year 60,000 or 70,000 or sometimes as many as 100,000 come back and many go back to Ceylon. It is quite easy to understand those figures, the total labouring population being about six hundred thousand, only 10 per cent. come back owing to various causes and there must be other people who replace them. Apart from the question of new labour, 60,000 labourers are coming and going and in addition to that a certain number of new labourers are added every year to the plantations in order to replace wastage. That accounts for the figures which have been shown at the last page and my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, complains there has been a very large influx of labour during the last 8 months into Ceylon showing thereby that the planters were taking a very large number in anticipation of any prohibition which we may seek to impose upon them. 31,000 come down and 49,000 go out again and the net surplus is about 8,000 and as has been pointed out that this occurs in the summer months when there is not much labour here and there is more demand for labour in Ceylon. Therefore we need not be perturbed by these facts. Taking them all into considerations, the conditions there are not so unsatisfactory that a remedy has to be found immediately or the normal flow should be stopped at the end of one year. I commend to the House the view taken by Mr. Joshi. Mr. Joshi has got the interests of the labourers at heart as much as anybody and the view taken by him is eminently reasonable barring one exception in that he accepts the amendment which is suggested by Sir Montagu Webb. These matters are matters which really might be left to negotiation as between the Ceylon Government and the Government of India. That was the view taken finally by the Emigration Committee themselves. No doubt they have felt keenly the desire to improve the lot of the labourer that may be going to Ceylon or that has been already settled there and they press very hard for an increase in the wage and finally when the matter was considered as to whether it should be a condition precedent the final Resolution was that the Ceylon Government should be asked to make an inquiry into the question of fixing a basic wage subject to a minimum and about the cost of living in relation to the rate of wages now paid. In the meantime the Government of India should do their best to secure an improvement in wages. The Government of India immediately addressed the Government of Ceylon and the Ceylon Government have promptly promised to do their best to improve the wages and they have told us so.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: May I ask whether they answered that portion of the letter?

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: They have answered that the wages have been rising, that they are closely watching the interest of the labourers, that the Tundu system has been abolished, that the labourer has been able to find his feet, that there is a great movement between estate and estate and they say that there has been a rise in wages; and the very fact that there is voluntary emigration on an appreciable scale from India, they point out as a clear proof that the wages have risen in the Colony. They say that they are as anxious as our Government to see that all that can be done is done, and they have promised to institute inquiries at once. But we cannot reasonably blame them for not having instituted an inquiry until they know as to whether we are going to issue a notification, and the Government of India are in a position to press upon the Ceylon Government the institution of an inquiry or any further expenditure on that account, until we make up our mind and tell them that we are going to give them a reasonable margin of time in order to set their house in proper order. I therefore think, Sir, that the Ceylon Government's attitude cannot be depicted or pictured as being an unreasonable one so far as the past is concerned. We need not go back to an Antediluvian period to see what had been done years ago. We have now the fact that they have readily complied with every one of the conditions that we stipulated—they have readily agreed—you may say, some of you, because they had no other option, but I would not do them that injustice; they have agreed to everyone of the conditions that we laid down, and they are apparently going to institute an inquiry. But as I put it some time ago, there are 1,200 odd tea estates alone, and there is the further difficulty that most of these workers do work on the piece-work system. The figures that have been referred to by Mr. Rangachariar are somewhat illusory for this reason that on the whole, including overtime, including sundries and so on, the wage is between Rs. 16 to 20 in the case of rubber estates and Rs. 12 to 16 in the case of tea estates per adult male labourer. They take into consideration the average wage no doubt, but that does not mean that the minimum is very much below. The figures that have been given were for a particular kind of work which has to be finished, which may be finished within 5 or 6 hours, but after that work is finished, after the task work is finished, there would be ample leisure according to the evidence given in which more money can be earned and the average wage any labourer can earn is between Rs. 16 to Rs. 20 and Rs. 12 to 16. In addition to that, they get some perquisites which I need not refer to at length.

Mr. J. P. Cotelingam: May I point out, Sir, that this includes piece-work and overtime work?

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: I did not say that. Rs. 12 to Rs. 16, that figure is exclusive of overtime. I am excluding the perquisites from it which are marked below 5, 7 and 8 in the last column.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: It is not everyone that does overtime, only the able-bodied.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: Yes, everyone, I suppose, who goes there is an adult labourer, is not lazy, but does work. And then we must also remember the class of labourer which emigrates from Southern India to Ceylon—a large section of the labourers go from the depressed classes and from the classes, in which both men and women work, and even in Southern India we find that it is impossible to maintain a household until both men and women work on the fields. They do work here, and they work in the same way there, to earn their living; and simply because there is a distinct Government, a different Government there, we should not I think interfere unduly between employer and employee. We must let the natural laws operate and make the necessary adjustments, but if we find that those natural laws oppress the weak, the Government may have to step in and will step in. I therefore suggest, Sir, that the Committee and the Government were fully right in imposing as conditions only those that have been shown in the notification, that the Government might be well left to adjust matters and to press upon the Ceylon Government to immediately bring out an increase if it be possible, to see that the interests of the labourers are safeguarded, and that the inquiry is concluded at as early a date as possible. It will be impossible for the Government to accept this limitation with regard to the number of emigrants. For instance, 60,000 people may return on a holiday to their homes in one year; there must be somebody to take their places or they will not be able to come to their homes to see their people, and 10,000 fixed as the limit will be absolutely inadequate. You will, if you introduce such a limit, be compelling the labourers now there to work on year in and year out without a holiday to India. The inflow and outflow of the coolie population to and from Ceylon is on an entirely different footing from that which obtains in respect of other distant overseas possessions. I therefore submit that the limitation proposed could not work at all.

With regard to the fixing of a minimum wage 80 per cent. above present rates, I suggest that there is some danger in such a course. We have first to see indeed whether it may not be necessary to fix the minimum at an even higher figure, and these artificial interim increases will not only be illusory but will in the end prejudice the cause we have at heart. If we tell them that we will be satisfied with this ad interim increase and that be fixed as the minimum, it may become as well the maximum: whereas on inquiry it may be found that it is necessary for us to press for more; and if in the meanwhile we accept this much, we shall be prejudicing our chances of getting what is really needed. And I submit that since we have allowed this system to go on since 1847 up till this date, we may well have patience and wait for another year or two when this inquiry by the Ceylon Government will be finished. The Emigration Committee have stipulated that the report of that committee of inquiry should be put before them in order that they may have their say before the Government take it into consideration, and in order that they may do so in the light of the criticisms they may make, before further representations are made to the Government in Ceylon. In the ordinary course of things it may be impossible for us to consult this House before it meets again in January; and in any case the ad interim negotiations could most probably not be carried out in less than 12 or 18 months. I am not asking the House for a moment to rest content. But the Government has said that they will press the matter firmly on the Ceylon Government, and I think having regard to what has been done in the past by the Ceylon Government and the ready and speedy manner in which the recommendations of the Government of India have been accepted by them, this House may I think leave it to us to do a little more in the way of securing a better wage for the labourer.

I do not think, Sir, that I need refer at any length to one or two observations made by my friend Mr. Rangachariar as to the constitution of the Deputation. He complained that the Government entrusted its work to non-officials. The President of the deputation is an eminent lawyer of Ceylon. My friend said that they had not done the right thing in not having a Government official as a member. Well, it shows the confidence which the Government has in its non-officials. That shows the confidence which the Government has in its non-official public in advocating the cause and not being so bureaucratic as to send one of their own men to be in charge; and, apart from that, I would say that the letters from the Ceylon Government show distinctly how anxious they have been not to mix themselves up with the Labour Commission. One of the reasons as to why they would not agree to our first condition is that they said that they would like to adopt a benevolent neutral attitude or an attitude of aloofness where they can press the Labour Commission to adopt any views which they may have to enforce to keep the balance even between the labourer and the planter. They do not want to identify themselves in any way with the Commission or with recruitment for the planters. That is an index to the frame of mind of the Ceylon Government, nor can we blame them for that. I, therefore, think, Sir, that we cannot cavil at the constitution. The constitution is, I think, one of the best that could be constituted and the advocacy has been entrusted to one of the most eminent lawyers of the island and everybody has had an opportunity of having his say and all the figures have been placed before the committee fully. My friend, Dr. Nand Lal, had some doubts as to whether the Government of India have the interests of the labourers at heart or the planters at heart and as to why they do not interfere for the sake of the educated few who may be going there. I need hardly assure him that the Government of India cannot at any moment under any circumstances sacrifice the interest of the labourers for the sake of any planters, whether here or elsewhere. I wonder why such a doubt should have arisen in his mind. Nor are the Government prepared to draw a limitation, an adverse limitation, as between the interests of the planters and the labourers. I do not see why there should be any necessary conflict, and if the labourer gets his due and the planter also benefits, I do not see that it is our business or the business of any Government to grudge any indirect benefit which the planter may derive thereby. Therefore, the answer to him would be that it would be primarily the labourer we have in mind and they would not grudge if the planter in Ceylon also gets the benefit of any labour that may go from here. My friend Mr. Joshi was anxious as to whether the Government of India would appoint an agent to watch the interests of these labourers in Ceylon. I thought I already mentioned in my preliminary remarks that the Government of India hope to and believe they will be able to appoint an agent, but if I have not said more, it is because we have to consider as to what it would cost. But there seems to be absolutely no reason as to why out of the money that we would be able to secure in the shape of fees we should not be able to appoint an agent, without burdening the general taxpayer. We hope to be able, Sir, to appoint an agent shortly after emigration is re-opened. I should like to have accepted Sir Montagu Webb's amendment. I appreciate the reason as to why he has substituted 18 months for 12 months. He sees that twelve months would be too short a period and the Legislative Council and the Emigration Committee cannot be consulted within that time. But I would suggest to the House that there is no need for such an amendment. We distinctly put to the Ceylon Government certain conditions which we were going to notify under section 10. The committee did not insist upon the settlement of wage as a condition precedent. The Government of India have not done so, and it is not fair to the Ceylon Government that we should now fix as a condition precedent to any emigration being allowed to that colony, the settlement within a particular period of this very difficult, complicate and intricate question of a basic minimum wage. I think the House may rest content that the two Governments will put their heads together and secure the welfare of the labourer and see that the basic minimum wage is obtained if it is practicable and possible.

* Mr. President: I will put Mr. Subrahmanayam's amendment against Mr. Bagde's.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: Only the first clause of my amendment, clause 10 of my amendment, and not the others. They do not tack on to Mr. Bagde's amendment. My amendment may be put separately, one by one.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member does not withdraw.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: I cannot withdraw them.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"That after the word 'approves' the words 'with the modification set out below' be inserted; after the words 'the notification' the words 'as approved' be inserted; and at the end of the Resolution the following be added:

'After clause (3) of the draft notification the following clause shall be inserted:

'(4) Before the 1st of April, 1924, the Legislature of Ceylon shall have enacted a law fixing the minimum basic wage for assisted emigrants, to the satisfaction of the Governor General in Council and of both Chambers of the Indian Legislature'."

To which an amendment has been moved:

"Omit all words after the figure 4 in order to insert—'within six months from the issue of this notification, or within such further period as the Governor General in Council may by notification appoint before the 5th March 1924 the Government of Ceylon shall take and complete the necessary steps to legally fix a minimum wage to be paid to emigrants by the Ceylon planters, such wage being one previously approved by the Governor General in Council.'"

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: May I suggest, Sir, that Sir Montagu Webb's amendment is really a limitation and his amendment to the amendment I think is a condition. It is not a mere recommendation. He says the Council's recommendation shall be enforced from October, etc., provided certain things are done. That is really a condition, and it is in the nature of an amendment. Not that I am accepting. I am only putting it that it is really in the nature of an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. President: In form both of them are recommendations to the Governor General in Council. But I think I must proceed to put this amendment against the other, though no doubt the Assembly in voting will bear in mind that Sir Montagu Webb's amendment is still on the paper. The question I have to put is that Mr. Subrahmanayam's amendment to Mr. Badge's amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member has originally moved three amendments together—10, 11 and 12. Does he wish to insist on 11 and 12?

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: Yes, I do.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"That after the words 'both Chambers of the Indian Legislature' in Mr. Badge's amendment, the following be inserted:

'(4A) The number of new emigrants after the date of this Notification to Ceylon shall not exceed 10,000 for the period ending 5th March, 1924'."

The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"That after the words 'both Chambers of the Indian Legislature' in Mr. Badge's amendment the following be inserted:

'(4A) The Government of Ceylon shall require the Ceylon Planters Association to increase the existing rate of wages by at least 30 per cent. within three months from the date of this Notification'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The Assembly then divided as follows:

"This Assembly further recommends to the Governor General in Council that the notification shall be in force up to the 1st October, 1924, and shall continue thereafter provided that in the meanwhile the Government of Ceylon shall have fixed by law a minimum wage for labour on estates, such wage having been previously approved by the Governor General in Council."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is

"That this Assembly approves the draft notification which has been laid in draft before the Chamber specifying the terms and conditions on which emigration for the purpose of unskilled work shall be lawful to Ceylon, and recommends to the Governor General in Council that the notification be published in the Gazette of India."

The motion was adopted.

RESOLUTION RE EMIGRATION OF UNSKILLED LABOURERS TO STRAITS SETTLEMENTS AND MALAY STATES.

Mr. J. Hullah (Revenue and Agriculture Secretary): I move

"This Assembly approves the draft notification which has been laid in draft before the Chamber specifying the terms and conditions on which emigration for the purpose of unskilled work shall be lawful to the Straits Settlements, the Federated Malay States of Perak, Selangor, Negri, Sembilan and Pahang and to the Unfederated Malay States of Kedah, Perlis, Johore, Kalantan, Trengganu and Brunei, and recommends to the Governor General in Council that the notification be published in the Gazette of India."

Mr. President: Honourable Members will observe that the amendments sent in to this Resolution raise almost precisely the same questions as the amendments to the Resolution which we have just passed, and except in so far as conditions may vary, and they do vary, between Ceylon and the places named in the second Resolution, it will be a sheer waste of time to continue the debate on the lines on which the previous one has followed. Members will be within the "letter of the law" if we allow the debate to proceed along such lines, but I should think we should be violating the spirit of it.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): I have great pleasure in supporting the motion made by Mr. Hullah. We must make a distinction between Government and Government. I have entirely satisfied myself from the Deputation, from the way in which they behaved, from the very frank and ready way in which they placed facts and figures before us, from the earnestness and anxiety which they displayed for the welfare of labourers, our labourers run any risk in going to the Straits Settlements. The Government there are taking every care so far as I am able to see,—at any rate Mr. Gillman who appeared before us as the representative of that Government gave such a full and frank statement that I was simply delighted with the way in which that Deputation behaved. The wages the labourers earn there are not very high. They earn about 10 or 12 annas a day there, much better than, nearly double of what the people earn in Ceylon, and although we have pressed them to accept an inquiry for fixing the basic minimum wage, they have agreed to it and I think we may trust the Government of the Straits Settlements to see to what is necessary being done. I therefore support the motion.

Mr. K. Ahmed (Rajshahi Division: Muhammadian Rural): In order just to remind the Government of India, I must draw the attention of the Assembly to the fact, why is it that the Chinese cooly works at a higher rate of pay than the Indian cooly there in the Malay States and other places stated in this Resolution. I know, Sir, there are instances before me where Indian people are treated badly while the Chinese people are much better off and apart from that, Sir, there are other nationalities whose condition is much better than the Indians. Indians are looked down upon by the people because the Malayan State Government and others do not appreciate the position of Indians and if the Government of India will try to bring things together and take proper steps, we shall be very thankful. Sir, we have many other things to say but since we have already seen the result of the first Resolution of this morning it is not worth while to discuss the second one when the sun is setting and darkness will now begin. Sir, an eminent authority like Mr. Polak who has worked for 18 years to ameliorate the condition of the labourers says:

"I am strongly of opinion that save upon conditions India ought not to consent to the emigration of Indians. These two conditions are, first the satisfactory settlement of the Kenya question, and secondly, that any scheme that may be considered genuinely partakes of the nature of colonisation and is not merely a camouflaged system of labour emigration. The case of Kenya must be taken as a test by which the question of status is to be judged. If Kenya does not grant that real equality of citizenship to which His Majesty's Government are pledged then there cannot be any kind of certainty that such equal status can be secured at the present time in any other colony or protectorate."

Mr. Jannadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): May I rise to a point of order? The Honourable Member is talking of Kenya which does not form one of the places about which we are discussing.

Mr. K. Ahmed: I think the Honourable Member will shortly appreciate my point.

Mr. President: What is the Honourable Member talking about?

Mr. K. Ahmed: About Malaya: Mr. Polak says:

"I think that as news of conditions in Ceylon or Malaya is gathered sifted and published, Indian opinion will realise more and more that so long as Indian emigration is practically confined to the ill-paid and worse-organised labouring classes, no real equality of citizenship is possible or even to be expected. Even a clean statute book cannot bring this about. Status is not merely a matter of law; it is still more one of facts."

Then, Sir, in 1857, Lord Salisbury told us:

"Above all things we must confidently expect as an indispensable condition of the proposed arrangement that the Colonial laws and their administration will be such that Indian settlers who have completed the terms of service to which they agree, as the return for the expense of bringing them to the Colony will be free men in all respects, with privileges in no way inferior to those of any other class of His Majesty's subjects resident in the Colony."

I need not point out how this pledge has been fulfilled more in the breach than in the observance, and in so far as the condition of Lord Salisbury is concerned, it has remained up till now a dead letter. Now, Sir, probably what Lord Hardinge has said will be appreciated by my Honourable friend opposite in charge of the Department. Lord Hardinge said this: "That is not the duty of the Government of India to supply coolies to the Colonies"; and the kind of duty that we find that the Government of India, as the great benefactor of these poor, miserable people living in this part of the country, do, is that they have always accepted invitations from the Colonies to supply coolies instead of leaving them in this country. Every State has got that, Sir, and every constitutional Parliament—the House of Commons, I say—the Prime Minister's house, there you find glasses of windows broken—and I hope my Honourable friend who comes from that part of the country realises that he should uplift the condition of these poor people, of these poor, miserable people, and try his utmost to see that their status, their condition is improved. Look at the treatment that they receive at the hands—I do not like to attack any of these colonials—but we did attack and the result, Sir, was not very much satisfactory to our mind, because we got defeated already twice or three times. We are not strong enough but humbly ask Government that they must realise the situation as far as they can, to uplift the condition of these poor people, and see their way to ameliorate their condition.

With these few words—probably, Sir, my position is just the same as my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar—and I do in a way support the motion of Mr. Hullah.

Mr. N. M. Joshi (Nominated: Labour Interests): Sir, I wanted to make one or two remarks, and I also wanted some explanation from the Government of India on one or two points. In the first place I insist that the Government of India should appoint an agent—I was somewhat apprehensive from the remarks of the Honourable Mr. Sarma that if the Government of India gets sufficient money from the fees, then only would the Government of India appoint an agent. Sir, I deprecate this thing altogether. There was some sympathy shown . . .

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma (Revenue and Agriculture Member): I did not say that it is only if we get fees that we are going to appoint an agent, but that I am looking forward to the fees also as a possible way of our immediately appointing an agent. I did not say that we would not otherwise appoint an agent.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I do not mean that the Government are looking forward to getting large fees from the planters, but I do not want the Government of India to depend upon those fees. There was so much sympathy shown for the working classes here to-day that I am quite sure that if a proposal were brought forward for sanctioning the salary of the agent, the House would pass it unanimously.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: And pay a good salary too. I want the Government of India to explain to me whether strikes in Malaya or in these Colonies are legal or not. From my study, I have, Sir, doubts on this point. Sir, the House knows very well that in the case of poor people the strike is the only weapon by which they can get their demands satisfied; they have no political influence at all. Therefore I insist that the Government of India should make an inquiry as to whether strikes in these Colonies are legal or not. If they are illegal, I think the Government of India should at once make a strong recommendation to that Government and say that they must not expect any more labourers unless that law is abrogated. Then, Sir, I find from the papers circulated to us that the Government of Malaya make education compulsory for the Malaysians but in the case of Indians they leave it voluntary. I want the Government of India also to impress upon the Government of Malaya the necessity of giving compulsory education to Indians. It is absolutely wrong for a British Government, whether the Government of India or a Colonial Government, to make any distinction between subjects in their territories. They are after all British subjects; and if education is to be compulsory for the Malaysians, it ought to be compulsory for the Indians. I therefore hope that the Government of India will write to the Government of Malaya on these points and receive satisfaction on all of them.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: We will make the necessary inquiries and try to redress the matters complained of.

Mr. President: The question is that that Resolution be adopted.

The motion was adopted.

STATEMENT OF BUSINESS.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): Sir, it has just been brought to my notice that by a notification issued on the 9th of February the Local Government has gazetted next Tuesday instead of Wednesday as the date of Shivaratri and as a public holiday. We arranged our business on the basis of the former notification issued by the Local Government, and took Wednesday to be the public holiday. In the circumstances, I would ask you to decide whether we should take the business which was put down for Tuesday on Wednesday, taking Tuesday as our public holiday.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): I do not think, Sir, that the existing arrangement need be disturbed, because the holiday is for Mahashivaratri and we do the puja on the night of that day, and if the next day is a holiday it will be all the better for us.

Mr. President: I do not think I am qualified to pronounce upon the point raised by the Honourable Member from Madras; but will meet the convenience of everybody concerned if, when a public holiday is declared by the local authority within whose province we happen to meet, we also observe that as a public holiday; as the Government would be placed in some difficulty if it attempted to carry on its operations without the backing of the Secretariat. Therefore I propose that we should observe the holiday which has been decreed by the Chief Commissioner. When adjourning the House on Monday I shall adjourn it till Wednesday and I presume that Government will carry their business over from Tuesday to Wednesday.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Monday, the 12th February, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Monday, 12th February, 1923

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock
Mr. President was in the Chair

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

VACANCIES DURING PROBATIONARY PERIOD ON RAILWAYS

336 Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: With reference to the answer given on the 15th January 1923, to unstarred question No 5 is it a fact that vacancies in permanent posts sometimes occur before the probationary period of any of the probationers, and if so, is it the normal practice on railways to make temporary arrangements for filling such vacancies to admit of probationers being permanently appointed thereto on completion of their probationary period?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: Unforeseen vacancies naturally do occur. There is no normal practice for dealing with such unforeseen vacancies. Each case has to be decided on its merits taking into consideration its own particular circumstances.

RULES OF COMPANIES WORKING STATE RAILWAYS

337 Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: With reference to the answer given on the 15th January, 1923 to unstarred question No 84, is it a fact that companies working State railways do not furnish Government with copies of their rules?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: There are no orders requiring them to do so. The policy of Government is to interfere as little as possible with details of domestic management.

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE RAILWAY BOARD

338 Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: With reference to the statement of "Establishment of the Railway Board" appearing in the Railway Revenue Budget for 1922-23, will Government kindly state (a) which of the posts require engineering qualifications, (b) whether any of such posts have ever been filled by officers of the company-worked railways, (c) whether any of such posts have ever been filled by Indians, and (d) if the reply to either (b) or (c) is in the negative, why not?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) The only posts in which engineering qualifications are required are

(1) Chief Engineer,

(2) Two Assistant Secretaries,

(3) Additional Assistant Secretary.

(4) ...

(d) The posts are filled by selection and hitherto Indian and Companies officers with suitable qualifications and whose services could be spared have not been available when the vacancies occurred.

I. C. S. AND LOCAL VERNACULARS.

339. Mr. B. N. Misra: (1) Is it a fact that the Indian Civil servants are compelled to pass in Local Vernaculars?

(2) If so, is there any time limit during which they are required to pass in Local Vernaculars?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (1) Yes.

(2) No period is prescribed but officers have the best incentive to pass their departmental examinations quickly as until they do so they are not eligible for increments of pay.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it desirable for any judicial officer of the service to perform any functions in the Court, as for instance, to hear evidence . . .

Mr. President: The Honourable Member is asking for an opinion, not for information.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it not a fact, Sir, that members of the service cannot possibly discharge their onerous duties when they are sitting on the judicial bench, unless they pass examinations in the vernacular, to take down the evidence of witnesses?

Mr. President: I think that is a matter of opinion too.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it not obvious, Sir, that it is impossible for members of the service, unless they know the vernaculars, to record evidence and to write out judgments thereon?

WAITING ROOMS FOR INTERMEDIATE AND THIRD CLASS PASSENGERS.

340. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan: (a) Is it a fact that the male and female passengers of Intermediate and Third Classes are not provided with separate waiting rooms?

(b) If not, do the Government propose to order such arrangements to be made as to prevent the male and female passengers of the Intermediate and Third Classes from grouping together at one and the same place?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) and (b). It is understood that Railways provide separate waiting accommodation for intermediate and third class lady passengers where necessary.

In this connection the Honourable Member is referred to the answer given on the 14th March, 1921, in this Assembly to question No. 464, asked by Rai Bahadur Pandit Jawahar Lal Bhargava regarding waiting accommodation for third class lady passengers.

WAITING ROOMS AT DELHI STATION.

341. Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan: (a) Is the Government aware that the 1st and 2nd class waiting rooms at the Delhi Junction have been removed to the upper storey of the station?

(b) If so, will they be pleased to order their removal to some such place as may be close to, and on the same floor, as the Refreshment Rooms?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) Yes.

(b) The Railway Administration intend to open the main refreshment rooms in the upper storey shortly. A lift has been installed for the convenience of passengers.

STAMP PRINTING IN INDIA.

842. Mr. B. S. Kamat: With reference to the question of Stamps Printing in India, and the discussion thereon in the Assembly in March, 1922, will Government be pleased to furnish the following information:

- (i) Have any steps been taken to notify to Messrs. De la Rue that their contract may not be renewed after 1924;
- (ii) Have any steps been taken to find out if any Firms in India, either Indian or European, are willing and able to undertake the contract and if necessary, to import and instal the necessary special plant for stamp printing? If the answer is in the affirmative, will Government please state the nature of their inquiries and the result? Had Government offered to guarantee the contract for a definite number of years?
- (iii) Is it true that the Controller of Stamps, Stationery, and Printing was addressed by an Indian Firm of Printers in this matter in 1922, and that he replied that this contract would be given only for one year at a time unlike the contract for 10 years given to Messrs. De la Rue & Co.?
- (iv) Is it true that Government have deputed one officer (Mr. Ascoli?) to England to study the question of stamp printing? When is this officer likely to return? What experience had he of printing processes before going to England?
- (v) What are the present arrangements for printing Post Cards and embossed envelopes?
- (vi) What are the rates and the terms and conditions settled with Messrs. De la Rue & Co., in the matter of their existing contracts?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (i) No. The contract does not expire until the 31st December, 1924, and it is only necessary to give six months written notice of an intention to terminate it.

(ii) No detailed inquiries have so far been instituted by Government but information on the subject has been supplied to two firms who have addressed the Controller on the matter.

(iii) Yes, an Indian firm did make certain inquiries of the Controller of Printing, Stationery and Stamps, in this connection in March, 1922. That officer did not say that any new contract would only be an annual one.

(iv) Colonel Willis, an officer of the Mint Department, has been deputed to England to examine the question of the possibility of printing Currency Notes in India. He has also been asked to take up the question of the printing of stamps, and Mr. Ascoli who is on leave in England has been associated with him in the latter inquiry. Mr. Ascoli is expected to return from leave in July next. For some months before he went Home he was on special duty in connection with the re-organisation of the printing presses under the Government of India and in the course of this work he acquired considerable experience of printing processes in India.

(v) Postcards and embossed envelopes are printed by Messrs. De la Rue and Company, though at times it has been necessary to get Postcards printed in this country, e.g., when the new half-anna Postcards were introduced.

(vi) The contract with Messrs. De la Rue and Company is a lengthy document consisting of 82 clauses and 7 schedules and covers 82 large pages of print; it is available in my office for inspection by the Honourable Member or any other Honourable Member of this House.

OFFICIALS AS M. L. A.'s.

343. Maulvi Miyan Asjad-ul-lah: Is it a fact that a person who is an official or who is in service of the Crown in India is not qualified for election to be member of the Indian Legislature?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: If the Honourable Member will refer to sub-section (1) of section 63E of the Government of India Act, he will find that the answer to his question is "yes".

SPECIAL TRAINS FOR ENGLISH MAILS.

344. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: 1. Upon what lines of Railway in India are special trains run to and from Bombay carrying English mails and passengers?

2. What was the total cost of running these trains in the last financial or calendar year details for which may be available?

3. Do these trains carry passengers other than those going to or returning from the United Kingdom? If not, why?

4. What is the amount of time saved by running these special trains?

5. Do these trains pay for their running from passenger fares? If not, what was the total loss to the public exchequer during the last financial or calendar year?

6. Is any extra postage charged for mails carried by these special trains? If so, what was the amount of this extra postage gained during the past financial or calendar year?

7. Has the Government considered the advisability of stopping these trains until better times? If not, do Government propose to consider the matter?

8. Is it a fact that ordinary mail and passenger trains are held up at roadside stations to allow the special trains to pass on?

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: The Honourable Member is referred to the reply given to question No. 138 asked by Mr. N. M. Joshi in this Assembly on 7th September, 1922, on a similar subject.

MAIL CONTRACTS IN POONA.

345. Mr. A. B. Lathie: Will the Government be pleased to state—

(a) For which years and for what respective places were mail contracts given to Messrs. Sultan Chivoy, Contractors, East Street, Poona?

(b) For which of these contracts were tenders invited from other Motor Companies in Bombay and Poona? and

(c) If reply to the part (b) of the question be in the negative in full or in part, why were tenders not invited?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: The necessary information is being obtained and will be supplied to the Honourable Member as soon as possible.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF ASSAM LABOUR INQUIRY COMMITTEE.

346. *Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Are the Government of India aware that the majority of the Assam Labour Inquiry Committee recommend that Act XIII of 1859 should cease to apply to the tea gardens in Assam, and that the Governor of Assam in Council accepts the recommendation? Do Government propose to bring in a Bill during the present session either to repeal Act XIII of 1859, or at least to give effect to the above recommendation by amending it?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Yes. Government are at present considering the replies of Local Governments to the reference made to them as a result of the discussion in the Assembly on the 10th September, 1921, on the Resolution moved by Mr. Joshi. The final replies have only recently been received. It is possible, however, for the Government of Assam by action under section 5 of the Act as amended in 1920, to secure that the Act shall not apply to some or all of the tea-gardens in Assam.

COMPOSITION OF THE SHIPPING COMMITTEE.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Will the Government be pleased to give to this House information regarding the composition of the Shipping Committee and also the qualifications of Sir John Biles who has been appointed a Member of the Committee, his previous pay, and his experience in the India Office also?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I am sorry that I have not got available an answer regarding the composition of the Committee but Honourable Members know. I think, that its composition was published in the Gazette of India of Saturday last. As regards Sir John Biles, Kt., K.C.I.E., LL.D., he is Honorary Vice-President of the Institution of Naval Architects, Member of the Society of Naval Architects of the United States of America; Honorary Member of the Japanese Society of Naval Architects. He has been Naval Constructor with the Admiralty, Naval Architect and Manager to the Clydebank Shipyard; Professor of Naval Architecture, Glasgow University, and is senior partner in Sir J. H. Biles and Company, a firm of Naval Architects and Engineers. He has visited professionally the United States of America, Canada, Japan, China, India and Australia. He has served on at least nine Committees appointed by the Board of Trade to inquire into different marine questions. He is a Past Master of the Worshipful Company of Shipwrights and a Past President of the Engineering Section of the British Association. He is Consulting Naval Architect to the India Office. It is understood that he succeeded the late Sir E. Reed in this post.

The Mercantile Marine Department of the Board of Trade supplied on request the names of certain gentlemen with expert knowledge who had dealt with shipbuilding problems on a large scale and were capable of taking broad and long views on such matters. Sir John Biles was invited to serve on this Committee in view of the fact that he had already visited India and in regard to his well recognized position as an authority on shipbuilding.

I have no information as to what remuneration he has drawn from the India Office.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Has a Secretary been appointed to this Committee?

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: Yes. Mr. J. H. Green.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Is it not generally the rule that where a European President is appointed to a Committee, an Indian Secretary is appointed and vice versa where there is an Indian President an English Secretary is appointed?

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: I am not aware, Sir, of the existence of any such rule, but I may say that I offered the appointment to an Indian gentleman who refused it.

STATE MANAGEMENT OF RAILWAYS.

Sir Campbell Rhodes: Sir, I wish to ask the Honourable the Home Member the question of which I have given him private notice:

In view of the fact that the Bengal Chamber of Commerce has expressed very emphatic and definite views on the question of State Management of Railways, which views it naturally desires should be voiced in this Assembly by its President, and in view of the fact that Government have provisionally fixed for the discussion of Maulvi Miyan Asjad-ul-lah's Resolution two dates on which it is impossible for the President to attend owing to the Statutory Annual Meeting of the Chamber of Commerce on 27th instant, I beg to inquire whether it would be possible for the Government to allot some other day for the consideration of the Resolution.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: I am very sensible of the difficulty due to the fact that we have had to postpone the discussion of this important Resolution to a date on which it will be impossible for the President of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce to be in his place. The Bengal Chamber of Commerce is of course intimately concerned with this question, and moreover we ourselves would have welcomed the assistance of Sir Campbell Rhodes in our discussion on the subject, not only as a representative of the Chamber but on personal grounds. But, the difficulty of arranging another date is very great. It would mean of course that we should be obliged to postpone the discussion till March, but there are few dates available in that month, and it is possible that even those dates must be occupied by other urgent Government business. I am afraid, that in the circumstances I can see no way of surmounting this difficulty.

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

MHOW GRIEVANCES.

154. Mr. Pyari Lal: 1. Has the attention of the Government been drawn to an article headed "Mhow Grievances" published in the Cantonment Advocate of 10th November, 1922?

2. Is it a fact that Mr. A. A. Dadabhoy, a representative of the local House-Owners Association nominated to the Cantonment Committee, has been told that he could take part only in those meetings where question regarding house property is to be considered and that his participation in the deliberations of the Committee will be confined to that question only?

3. Is the Government aware that as a protest against this imposition of this limitation on his appointment as a member of the Committee, Mr.

Dadabhoj has never taken part in any meeting of the Cantonment Committee?

4. Is it a fact that as a result of Mr. Dadabhoj's absence from the Committee, the important interests of the House-Owners Association have gone unrepresented on the Committee?

5. Will the Government be pleased to state why this qualification has been imposed upon the appointment of the representative of the House-Owners Association and under what law?

Mr. E. Burdon: 1. Yes.

2—5. The Government of India have no information on the subject, but inquiries are being made. I will let the Honourable Member know the result in due course.

FEE IN CANTONMENT GENERAL HOSPITALS.

155. Mr. Pyari Lal: 1. Is the Government aware that fee is being charged in Cantonment General Hospitals for professional services rendered within the premises of the Hospital?

2. Is it a fact that the Cantonment Reform Committee has recommended the desirability of stopping this practice?

3. Do the Government propose to direct or suggest to the Cantonment Committees, the desirability of carrying out the recommendations of the Cantonment Reform Committee in this connection?

Mr. E. Burdon: 1. Fees are leviable for treatment in Cantonment Hospitals and dispensaries under the provisions of Section 207 read with Section 206 of the Cantonment Code.

2 and 3. The Honourable Member is presumably referring to the recommendation made by the Cantonment Reforms Committee in paragraph 64 of their report.

Government have no information that charges of the kind there described are in practice levied, but if the Honourable Member will report to the local military authorities any cases of the kind that have come to his notice, the Government of India feel sure that the matter will receive proper attention. They do not think it necessary to issue directions or suggestions on the subject to Cantonment Committees.

RAILWAY CATERING DEPARTMENTS.

156. Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state whether there are any catering Departments in the East Indian Railway and Eastern Bengal Railway on the same lines as that obtaining in the Bengal Nagpur Railway or lines similar thereto?

(b) If there are not, what are the reasons for absence thereof and what takes their place for providing food and refreshment for the travelling public on the journey?

(c) Is it proposed to introduce on the East Indian Railway and Eastern Bengal Railway arrangements like those obtaining on the Bengal Nagpur Railway.

Mr. O. D. M. Hindley: (a) The catering on the East Indian and Eastern Bengal Railways is not done by the Railways themselves as in the case of the Bengal Nagpur Railway.

(b) To introduce the departmental system at the present time, with high prices prevailing, would involve an expenditure on initial outlay which the railways cannot afford. Food and refreshments are provided by Contractors and Vendors under railway supervision and this arrangement has been in force for a number of years.

(c) No, not at present.

INDIAN STUDENTS IN ENGLAND.

157. Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state what action has been taken on the recommendations of the Lytton Committee about Indian students in England?

(b) If no action has been taken what action is proposed to be taken and when?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: The Report has been published and circulated to local Governments and Administrations and is under the consideration of the Government of India. It is hoped that Local Governments will shortly be addressed in the matter.

MUTUAL BENEFIT SOCIETIES.

158. Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: 1. Has the Government framed rules under explanation to Section 10 (2) (iii) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, re: Mutual Benefit Societies?

2. Is it a fact that in the Income-tax Manual, page 90, it is stated that no change in law has been made as no rules have been framed?

3. Will the Government be pleased to state whether the rules have been framed, since the publication of the Manual?

4. Will the Government be pleased to state when they will make these rules?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: 1. No.

2. No. The statement in the Income-tax Manual is that "no action can be taken (under the explanation) until a rule is made".

3. No.

4. Applications have been received from several Societies but action has been postponed pending a decision of a High Court to which reference has been made as to whether profits of such Societies are taxable at all.

PRINTING OF STAMPS IN INDIA.

159. Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: 1. Will the Government be pleased to state what stage has been reached in the consideration of the question of printing Stamps in India?

2. Will the Government be pleased to state whether Indian States do use Indian-made stamps for their judicial, non-judicial and postal services and if so, which of them and for what purposes?

3. Will the Government be pleased to state how many printing establishments there are under the Government of India?

4. Have the Government instituted a system of exact costing in regard to the printing establishment of the Government?

5. With reference to the Honourable Mr. Chatterjee's answer to my question on the same subject, will the Government be pleased to lay on the Table the results of any inquiry regarding the system of exact costing obtaining in the printing establishments under the Government of India, that may have been made already?

Mr. A. H. Ley: 1. The question of printing stamps in India has been taken up by Government, and Government are now awaiting a report from an officer who has been specially deputed to examine the practicability of the proposal.

2. The Government of India have no official information on the subject.

3. Twelve, including the printing establishments of minor Administrations, Residencies, Commercial Departments and State Railways.

4 and 5. There is already a system of costing in force in the main Government of India Presses, which shows the cost of each job including overhead charges, depreciation of machinery, etc. Except possibly in one or two minor respects, the existing system seems to be complete; but it is now being subjected to a close examination in order that Government may be satisfied that any defects are brought to light and remedied.

RAILWAY EXPENDITURE IN ENGLAND.

160. Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state the total amount spent in England on account of the Railways in India and on what class of materials?

(b) Has any attempt been made to get any of those supplies in India?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) It is assumed that the Honourable Member desires to know the amount spent in England during the current year. The expenditure to end of November 1922, the latest period for which figures are available, is £5·68 millions.

Materials purchased in England for State-worked railways are those not produced or manufactured in India or not obtainable in India in the quantities required or to the conditions as to quality or price prescribed in the Stores Rules. Generally they include specialised machinery and plant, locomotives, wagons, steel rails, etc. The Company-worked railways have full powers to make their own arrangements for the supply of stores and usually purchase the same classes of materials in England.

(b) State-worked lines are governed by the Stores Rules the general conditions of which are that articles produced or manufactured in India should be purchased in India provided the quality is satisfactory and the price not unfavourable. In accordance with these Rules tenders are invited in India for such articles as are produced or manufactured in India of the requisite quality. Company-worked lines generally speaking follow a similar procedure.

REGISTRARS, ETC., OF JOINT STOCK COMPANIES.

161. Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam: (a) Are the Registrars of Joint Stock Companies or their Assistants, Chartered Accountants or holders of diplomas in Accountancy?

(b) Will the Government be pleased to see that these or some of these posts are filled by men who possess such qualifications?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (a) Under Section 248 (2) of the Indian Companies Act, 1913, appointments of Registrars and Assistant Registrars of Joint Stock Companies are made by Local Governments. The Government of India have not therefore detailed information about the qualifications of the particular officers, but it is understood that the first Registrars at Calcutta and Bombay were respectively a Chartered Accountant and a lawyer well trained in Company Law.

(b) The Government of India invited the attention at the time when the Companies Act was passed of Local Governments to the desirability of appointing a wholtime officer in the large commercial centres, at any rate, with special training and experience fitting him for the work required.

CONSTITUTION AND FUNCTIONS OF THE PUBLIC SERVICES COMMISSION.

162. Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state what action, if any, has been taken under section 96-C of the Government of India Act since the answers given to Mr. Samarth in the Assembly on the same subject?

(b) If no action has been taken, will the Government please state when and what action is proposed to be taken?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The constitution and functions of the Public Services Commission provided for in section 96-C of the Government of India Act cannot be determined until a decision has been reached on some of the questions involved in the larger problem of the increased Indianization of the services, which is now under consideration and will doubtless engage the attention of the Royal Commission. It has been decided, therefore, to hold the matter in abeyance for the present.

THE MALABAR (COMPLETION OF TRIALS) SUPPLEMENTING BILL.

* The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): I beg to move: "That the Bill to supplement the Malabar (Completion of Trials) Act, 1922, be taken into consideration."

I fully explained the circumstances under which this Bill was introduced on Saturday last, and as it is of a formal nature, I need not further enlarge on either the principle or the details of the measure.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhamadan Rural): Sir, I welcome this Bill because it rectifies an error; but I have to draw the Honourable the Home Member's attention to an obvious duty on the part of the Government to rectify other errors, and also to rectify a very serious omission. In the first place, I fear that such omissions and errors have occurred in connection with the Ordinances passed by His Excellency the Governor General. It is obvious, because this is one instance of it. Now the particular matter to which I wish to draw the attention of the Honourable Member is that the last of the Ordinances, one of the provisions of which this Bill proposes to continue by an Act of the Legislature, expires next Monday, and there are other provisions under these Ordinances which have expired and which may result in very serious consequences, as I shall presently point out. I mentioned this matter to the late Home Member, Sir William Vincent, and what I suggested was that after these Ordinances have expired, it would be necessary to allow the Indian Legislature to pass a General Indemnity Act with regard to the powers exercised under these Ordinances. On Saturday last when this Bill was laid on the table—it was not circulated before but laid on the table—I mentioned it to the present Home Member, Sir Malcolm Hailey. He asked me to give the matter my consideration; but yesterday being a Sunday I have been unable to refer to books and authorities. All the same I have looked into these Ordinances very carefully, all of them, and I am deliberately of opinion that it is absolutely necessary now on the part of the Government to get a General Indemnity Act passed with regard to them.

I shall take first the Ordinance, No. II of 1921, which purports to declare Martial Law with regard to Malabar. That Ordinance has got an indemnity section, section 23, but that has absolutely expired because the life of these Ordinances only lasts for six months. I am not saying this in any captious spirit, but I am pointing out to the Government an obligation, a duty, which is absolutely incumbent on them. Now the first Ordinance which was passed, Ordinance No. II of 1921, was passed on 26th August 1921. What did it purport to do? It purported to declare Martial Law in Malabar. That was quite right and we do not question the policy or justification at all. Now what is our present position with regard to the declaration of Martial Law? My Honourable friend will remember that there was a statutory provision, the Bengal Regulation of 1810. Yesterday being Sunday, I have not been able to look into the date of that Regulation, but my Honourable friend, Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith, will correct me if I am in error. It was a Regulation of 1810, the Bengal Martial Law Regulation, which was extended to the whole of India, and Martial Law could be declared thereunder. That was the position before it was repealed. Under the recommendations of the Repressive Laws Committee, that Regulation was repealed.

Mr. President: I should like the Honourable Member to explain how this matter is relevant to a measure which is extremely narrow in scope, namely, enabling appeals to be made to the High Court which would otherwise not be made, unless we pass this Bill.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Yes, I shall explain it this way. Sir, you will notice that the Statement of Objects and Reasons recites that on the expiration of the Malabar (Completion of Trials) Ordinance, this Act is to come into operation. This Ordinance—the Completion of Trials Ordinance, 1922—is the last Ordinance; it will expire next Monday. Some of the later Ordinances refer to some of the earlier ones, some of which have expired. My submission is that Government should come forward with a proper Indemnity Bill. They have now come forward with a Bill, a very proper Bill, for extending the Completion of Trials Ordinance, because if this Ordinance expired on Monday then a number of appeals which are pending before the Madras High Court and other appeals about to be filed will fall to the ground. The Local Legislature passed an Act for continuing the jurisdiction of the High Court of Madras with regard to appeals from trials held under the Malabar Ordinances in Madras; and one of the Acts which was passed by the Local Legislature was found to be ultra vires, that is, was against the statute law of India. Now, the Honourable the Home Member has come forward very justly with an Act which would rectify that ultra vires legislation. Now, I say since the last of these Ordinances expires on Monday, the 19th instant, and many have expired before, I ask the Government to bring forward an Indemnity Bill before this House.

Mr. President: The mere fact that the Honourable Member finds it necessary to ask the Government to bring forward another Bill shows that his remarks on this Bill are not relevant.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: What I say is that this Bill

Mr. President: I am prepared to allow the Honourable Member to ask his question of the Government; I am not prepared to allow him to argue the merits of the question.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Then, Sir, I shall sum up by putting this question. What I would ask is this. We have got also a responsibility in regard to this matter. When these indemnity sections have all of them expired, I earnestly request the Home Member to bring before this House a general Indemnity Bill, and I can assure him that we are not so wanting in the sense of responsibility as to obstruct. But it is absolutely necessary in the interests of the public servants

Mr. President: The Honourable Member is now arguing the merits of the case; he had better put his question and see whether the Government is prepared to answer it.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: I ask whether Government will consider that question, and I would point out the obligations of the Government with regard to sections 127 and 128 of the Government of India Act and also ask them to take into consideration the fact that Bengal Regulation with regard to martial law has been repealed. Whether it is repealed or not, in every instance where martial law has been in force an Indemnity Act has been brought before the House; that has been invariably the practice; and I am of opinion that without an Indemnity Act serious consequences may arise

Mr. President: The Honourable Member can use that argument when an Indemnity Bill is before us. I ask him now to confine his remarks to the subject of the present measure.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: What I wish to point out is that it is an ultra vires legislation on the part of the Government of Madras which this Bill seeks to rectify by an Act of the Imperial Legislature. I say that this is not a complete Act; there are other Regulations and things done under the Ordinances which might have been ultra vires, and since the Ordinances have expired, they would be regarded as ultra vires, and I would therefore ask the Honourable the Home Member to bring forward another Bill embodying general indemnity for the protection of all military and civil officers as also private citizens who have acted under any of these Ordinances. That is all that I have got to say.

Mr. T. V. Seshaguri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I wish to raise a point which I hope you will hold a little more relevant than the one which has been raised by my friend, Mr. Chaudhuri. It is this. I would put it in the nature of a question to the Honourable the Home Member—whether he considers that this constant resort to the central Legislature is desirable or necessary, whether the proper course would not be for moving the Parliament to so change the Government of India Act as to make it unnecessary for Local Governments to seek the aid of the Central Legislature?

Mr. President: I am afraid the Honourable Member was a little sanguine in his opening remark—in thinking that his point was more relevant than that raised by Mr. Chaudhuri.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: I am putting it in the nature of a question: whether it is not desirable that we should avoid this constant recourse to the Supreme Legislature, and so amend the Government of India Act as to make it possible for the Local Legislature to pass laws which would be applicable throughout the whole of the Presidency; otherwise we have to come here often and the result is that there will be a great deal of delay. I myself had to apply to the Central Legislature to extend an Act to the Presidency Town, because the Government of India Act was in that respect defective; and also the Government of Madras finds that in regard to the Religious Endowments Bill they cannot pass a law which would apply to the Presidency Towns because the Government of India Act is defective. I bring it to the notice of the Honourable the Home Member so that he may move Parliament for the purpose of correcting this defect and avoiding, if possible, unnecessary resort to the Central Legislature.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Mr. Chaudhuri mentioned to me on Saturday the point which he has elaborated to the House; I am afraid, that I was not able to give to it the same extensive study as he was able to bestow on it, because my Sunday was otherwise engaged—engaged in what will no doubt appear to those who have objections to the taking of animal life, a much less innocuous occupation. But I can nevertheless deal sufficiently with his point. He suggests the necessity of bringing in a general Indemnity Act which will cover anything done under martial law in Malabar and provide for any other case which like the one now under discussion reveals action taken ultra vires. A general Indemnity Act is of course a natural corollary to martial law. Those who remember the celebrated discussion in the Imperial Legislative Council of 1919 will bear me out when I say that it was amply proved to that Council that everywhere where martial law has been applied a general Indemnity Act has followed. But equally, it is not usual to bring forward such an Act until practically every incident of Martial law has closed; you cannot propose to the Legislature that they should give a general carte blanche to Government and must place it in possession of the completed story of Martial Law transactions when you are asking it to legislate for indemnity.

As regards Malabar and the incidents which occurred there, it is still a matter of consideration whether we should put forward a general Indemnity Bill, applying to all acts taken in pursuance of Martial Law. Mr. Chaudhuri suggested that the Bill we now propose in itself illustrates an action which needs covering as being ultra vires; but the statement which I made to the House on Saturday will show that we are not in this Bill dealing with any act committed outside the law by any officer in exercising Martial Law functions. Nor again are we as he suggests proposing to extend the operation of the Ordinances. The effect of the last of the Ordinances will expire on the 18th or 19th of this month and in view of that expiration the Madras Council itself passed an Act granting certain Magistrates the powers as a speedy procedure for disposing of a large number of cases still pending on their hands. That Council could not, however, in so doing affect the powers of the High Court because under the Letters Patent the local Legislature has no authority to do so, and that is the sole reason why it is necessary for us to legislate in order to confer the necessary powers on the High Court. Our Bill, therefore, is very restricted in scope. It is merely necessary in order to supplement the legislative powers of the Madras Council.

Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar asked whether it was necessary to have such frequent resort to the Central Legislature in order to get over difficulties of this nature. That is a question as to how far we are prepared to legislate or to ask for legislation in order to allow local Legislatures to deal with modifications in the Letters Patent for the Presidency High Courts. I am sure that the Assembly will not desire that I should enter into this question this morning. It is a somewhat important matter and it is one to which we should desire to give a good deal of thought.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Bill to supplement the Malabar (Completion of Trials) Act, 1922, be taken into consideration."

The motion was adopted.

Clause 1 was added to the Bill.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Sir, with regard to the Title I have to point out . . .

Mr. President: If the Honourable Member had been watching, he would have seen that I gave him an opening. Clause 1 now stands part of the Bill.

Clause 2 was added to the Bill.

Mr. President: The question is that this be the Title to the Bill.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: It is not clear, Sir, whether this Act is of this Legislature or of the Madras Legislature, and I want to draw the attention of the Honourable the Home Member to it. It is usual to cite the local Acts as the Bengal Act, Madras Act, and so on, and so this omission might lead to confusion, and therefore I would suggest that we should put down the title as the Malabar (Completion of Trials) Act, No. (Madras) of . . .

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Title is put in the present form, because we do not yet know the No. of the Act passed in Madras. But I think that the Honourable Member's intention will be sufficiently met if when we print up the Bill we place in the margin, the proper reference to the Madras Act.

The Title was added to the Bill.

The Preamble was added to the Bill.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Sir, I move that the Bill be passed.

The motion was adopted.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. President: The Assembly will now proceed to the further consideration of the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Court-fees Act, 1870, as passed by the Council of State. On the last occasion clause 127 was postponed for further consideration in view of the fact that the amendment standing in the name of Mr. Agnihotri, though acceptable in principle to Government, required re-drafting. I understand that it is now found that the amendment will be more appropriate in clause 127A.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions : Non-Muhammadian) : Sir, I want to move another amendment which stands in my name, and that is that the order under this section shall be appealable

Mr. President: We are now on amendment No. 339.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: As advised I beg to withdraw it, Sir.

Clause 127 was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move that for 127A, the following be substituted, namely :

" 127A (1). Section 489 of the said Code shall be re-numbered as sub-section (1) of section 489, and in that sub-section as re-numbered for the word 'fifty' the words 'one hundred' shall be substituted :

' (2) To the same section the following sub-section shall be added, namely :

' Where it appears to the Magistrate that, in consequence of any decision of a competent Civil Court, any order made under section 488 should be cancelled or varied, he shall cancel the order or, as the case may be, vary the same accordingly '."

This clause relates to maintenance section in the Criminal Procedure Code, and this is the draft which the Government and myself have agreed to put into this clause. Therefore, Sir, I propose that this amendment be accepted by the House.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 127A as amended was added to the Bill.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division : Non-Muhammadian) : Sir, in moving my amendment No. 342 to clause 129 (2), I wish to point out the law as it stands at present. Under the present Code of Criminal Procedure, a Public Prosecutor can only be appointed in respect of cases triable by the Court of Sessions. The amendment proposed by Government does away with that condition and makes it lawful for the Government to appoint a Public Prosecutor in all cases, whether triable by a Magistrate or by a Court of Sessions. Honourable Members will find that a Public Prosecutor may be appointed either generally or in any specified class of cases or in any particular case by the Governor General in Council or the Local Government. That is the general provision. In the clause under reference, provision is made for the appointment of a Public Prosecutor by the District Magistrate or, subject to the control of the District Magistrate, the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, and it is pointed out that, where such a Public Prosecutor has been appointed, no private Prosecutor can be appointed except in two cases and two cases only, namely, in the absence of the Public Prosecutor or where no Public Prosecutor has been so appointed. Reading the two clauses together, Honourable Members will find the law is boiled down to this that in all cases where a Public Prosecutor has been appointed for any area—let us say a district—no person can be appointed as a Public Prosecutor in any particular case, and therefore no person appointed as such can possess the right of withdrawal from the case. The amendment I propose for the acceptance of this House is intended to enable the District Magistrate or, subject to his control, the Sub-Divisional Magistrate to appoint any pleader as a Public Prosecutor only for the purposes of that case in which he appears,—not only in cases where the Public Prosecutor has not been appointed or is absent, but also in cases where the Public Prosecutor, though generally appointed for the district, is not interested in that particular case. Honourable Members will see that criminal cases in the Courts—and I am now referring to the magisterial cases—are sub-divided by the Criminal Procedure Code into compoundable and non-compoundable cases, but, as Honourable Members are aware, a case may be a compoundable case and yet the prosecutor may desire to withdraw from the case, either because he finds that his witnesses do not support the case or because, for other reasons he thinks it expedient to withdraw from the prosecution of the case. Now, in a case of this kind, let us assume instituted upon complaint and more or less of a quasi-criminal character, take the case of defamation, insult, adultery and the like, in which the Public Prosecutor, though appointed to the district, is not likely to be appointed for the conduct of the prosecution of that case,—what is to be the procedure? The law, as proposed by the Government, would disentitle a pleader appointed by the complainant to prosecute the case and while in full possession of the facts to withdraw from the prosecution because forsooth there exists in the district, in the shadowy background invisible to the Court and unknown to the parties concerned, a Public Prosecutor. Let us assume for the sake of argument that the pleader appointed in that particular case wishes to conform to the provisions of law and goes to the Public Prosecutor generally appointed for the district. He goes to him and says: "My client had complained against the accused for an insult. I find I have no witnesses and therefore I wish to withdraw from the case." The Public Prosecutor will say: "I know nothing about the facts of your case. The law must take its course. The case must go on and must be disposed of upon its merits." Therefore, the Public Prosecutor retained in that case is deprived of the liberty of cutting short a trial and has to prosecute the case, whether he wishes it or not, till its termination, ending in the discharge or acquittal of the accused. I submit this would involve in many cases sheer waste of time on the part of the Magistrate, and I do not see how the interests of justice would be served by disqualifying a private Prosecutor appointed by the Magistrate to conduct a prosecution in a particular case. I quite see the position of the Government of India would be that where in a particular district a Public Prosecutor has been appointed, he is in sole charge of criminal litigation on behalf of the Crown. He is a man who takes a detached and independent view of all criminal cases entrusted to him and he is the best law adviser of the Crown and, as the right of withdrawal is incident to the ordinary functions of a Public Prosecutor, he and he alone must possess that power. Now, on this point, I invite the attention of the House to the provision contained in the Code of Criminal Procedure, section 4, sub-clause (t). Honourable Members will find that provision lays down:

" 'Public Prosecutor' means any person appointed under section 492 and includes any person acting under the directions of a Public Prosecutor."

It is perfectly clear, therefore, that the power of withdrawal was not intended to be conferred upon a Public Prosecutor alone. It was equally intended by the Statute to confer the power of withdrawal upon the person acting under the directions of a Public Prosecutor, and he is for the purpose of withdrawing from the case included in the general definition of a Public Prosecutor. Therefore the argument that the Public Prosecutor should be the sole public servant who should possess the power of withdrawing from criminal prosecution is certainly not the policy of the law as embodied in the present Code of Criminal Procedure. But even assuming for the sake of argument that that were the policy of law, my amendment provides that the person who is to be appointed to conduct a prosecution with the power of withdrawal is to be appointed by the District Magistrate or by the Sub Divisional Magistrate subject to his control, and that gives the legal representative of the Crown the District Magistrate, ample jurisdiction and discretion to decide whether he will entrust the prosecution of a particular case to the complainant's pleader and thereby confer upon him the right of withdrawal. As soon as an application is made to the District Magistrate by the complainant's pleader or by the complainant that he wishes the case to be prosecuted through a particular law agent and that he should be appointed a Public Prosecutor or a Prosecutor with the power of withdrawal within the meaning of section 492 clause (2), the District Magistrate will open his book and see whether the case in which the application is made for his sanction to prosecute is of such a character as might be left to a Public Prosecutor and if he finds that the State has a very remote interest or no interest at all in the case and that the offence is of a character in which the conflict is between two parties rather than between the State and a private person he will allow the prosecution to be conducted by the complainant's pleader. If, on the other hand the District Magistrate finds that the case is of a serious character and in the prosecution of which should not be entrusted to a private individual such as the complainant's pleader he will withhold his sanction. I therefore submit that any argument that might be addressed to this House on behalf of Government that it would take away a salutary check which at present exists in allowing all prosecutions to be conducted by an accredited agent of the Crown will fall to the ground. I do not see Sir, what is the Government will be prejudiced by accepting my amendment. On the other hand I wish to draw the attention of the Government to the very great benefit and economy of time which will ensue if they accept my amendment. I have already pointed out that the jurisdiction of the Public Prosecutor is now to be extended from Sessions to Magisterial Court. I have further pointed out that if there is a Public Prosecutor appointed for a particular District not necessarily for the conduct of any particular case it would be an impediment and an insuperable impediment to the appointment of a Prosecutor under this section with the power of withdrawing from the case. I have further pointed out Sir that if such a person is appointed a Prosecutor it must always be as my amendment propose subject to the general control and sanction of the District Magistrate and I have further pointed out that in a very large number of cases if the matter is left to the sole discretion and judgment of the Public Prosecutor it would be left to the judgment of a person who has probably in many cases least knowledge of the facts of the case. I wish to point out further that in concentrating this power of withdrawal in all cases in a District in the Public Prosecutor, there would be a strong incentive on the part of a private litigant to employ the Public Prosecutor as his counsel in the case. But that, surely, is not the object of Government. The object of Government is that all State prosecutions must be subject to State control. That object is perfectly intelligible to Honourable Members. It is intelligible to me and I am not combating their views on that subject. The further object the Government have in view that the Public Prosecutor, if he exists, or if he is appointed in any District, he and he alone must possess the power of withdrawal, is a matter upon which I have already addressed this House. I therefore submit that we shall gain nothing by allowing the Government amendment to be passed into law and we shall, I submit, greatly improve the Code if we make the provisions of section 492, sub-clause (2), a little more elastic to suit cases instituted upon private complaint, at the instance of a private complainant, in which the State is not directly and intimately concerned, and which is after all a matter of quarrel between two parties, the complainant and the accused. What objection can there be to the complainant or his pleader asking the District Magistrate, "Please allow my pleader to appear in this case and prosecute the case possessing the power of withdrawal from the case if he is unable to prove his case or if otherwise he should be so minded." These are matters, Sir, upon which I hope the Government will meet Members of this House half way. I have given notice of my amendment in one particular form but on maturer consideration I find that the addition of ~~the~~ words would satisfy the requirements of my amendment, that is, if after the words "where no Prosecutor has been appointed" "in any case" be added. That will completely satisfy me and serve the purpose I have in view. I have left copies of the amendment with the Secretary to the Assembly. (An Honourable Member: "How would the section read then?") The section would then read thus:

"The District Magistrate, or subject to the control of the District Magistrate, the sub-divisional Magistrate may, in the absence of the Public Prosecutor, or 12 Noon. where no Public Prosecutor has been appointed in any case, appoint any other person, not being an officer of Police below such rank as the Local Government may prescribe in this behalf, to be Public Prosecutor for the purpose of the case."

That ensures the fact that if the Public Prosecutor is appointed in any case he and he alone will conduct that prosecution, but if for any reason owing to the triviality of the offence or other character of the offence the Government do not wish to go to the expense of appointing a Public Prosecutor in any case, it should not debar the District Magistrate from giving power to any other pleader appearing on behalf of the complainant to conduct the prosecution. That, I submit, is all that I want. I think my request is reasonable and I ask the House to endorse it. With these words I move my amendment.

Mr. President: Does the Honourable Member move the amendment as printed in No. 342?

Dr. H. S. Gour: I move it, but I have suggested this alternative change in the form which I think will serve my purpose. I may point out that I am absolutely indifferent how the section is worded. I am only anxious that the object I have in view is brought out. Language is of no consequence to me and I am quite prepared to accept any draft that the Government suggest in conformity with my views.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 129 (2) after the words 'same sub-section' insert the following:

'after the word 'may' the following words shall be inserted, namely: 'appoint a pleader to conduct the prosecution in any case pending in a Court subject to their jurisdiction, and they may and'."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): I think it would have been better for the House if Dr. Gour had made clear at the outset which was the amendment he intended to move. He spoke for something like 25 minutes and we all thought he was moving the amendment which appears on the paper. However, he has said he is prepared to accept any wording that the Government may put into the Bill which will give him what he wants. I am suggesting to the House that the Bill as it stands gives him what he wants. There is no necessity for any amendment whatever. Dr. Gour's real motive seems to me to give a very wide extension to the category of compoundable offences. He said, where a case is a case between two parties, not a case between the State and a party, why should not a pleader, though he may not have been appointed a Public Prosecutor, be able to withdraw? The House spent some time—the Members of this House spent a great deal of time outside this Chamber—in examining the categories, the list of compoundable offences, and decided what offences should be compoundable and what offences should not and I think the House should be prepared to leave it at that. If there is to be a question of withdrawing from a prosecution in a case which is not, according to the decision of the House already arrived at compoundable under the Code of Criminal Procedure, then the discretion should be in the hands of an impartial authority like the Public Prosecutor. Sir, I have some apprehension that Dr. Gour has not properly understood section 492 (2). First of all, under section 492 (1) the Government has the power to appoint a Public Prosecutor, and under sub-section (2) certain Magistrates have power to appoint a Public Prosecutor in cases where none has been appointed by the Government or any Public Prosecutor appointed by the Government is absent. I think all the lawyer Members of this House at all events know quite well that it is a most frequent thing for the District Magistrate to appoint a Public Prosecutor for the purposes of a particular case. One obvious reason for that is that one person cannot be in several places at the same time. The magisterial Courts in the district are numerous and possibly there is only one Public Prosecutor and he cannot attend to all the cases that are going on. Dr. Gour said, why should there be no power to withdraw a case, because somewhere in the shadowy background there exists a Public Prosecutor about whom the parties know nothing? That remark may have deceived the House. It is quite irrelevant to the subject we are discussing. The point is if the Public Prosecutor is in the shadowy background, a Public Prosecutor will have been appointed for the particular case by the Magistrate and that Public Prosecutor will not be in the background; he will be there conducting the case and he will have the opportunity to withdraw. If it is a case that is compoundable, it does not matter whether there is a Public Prosecutor there or not, or whether there is a person in Dr. Gour's words appointed to conduct the prosecution or not. The complainant is quite capable of compounding the case. I listened to Dr. Gour's remarks to try and ascertain whether he proposed to draw any distinction between "a Public Prosecutor" and "a person appointed to conduct the prosecution". It seems to me they are going to be exactly the same thing. It is not, according to his own words, a person appointed by the party to conduct the prosecution on his behalf. He intends this person to be appointed under the Code in the regular way by a Magistrate, and therefore this person will be a Public Prosecutor just as much as the Public Prosecutor appointed by the Government or by the District Magistrate. Dr. Gour has moved only amendment No. 342 on the paper but he directed his arguments to amendment No. 344 which follows and which is most certainly consequential. That is why I have referred very freely to the Public Prosecutor's powers to withdraw—the withdrawal power coming in section 494 of the Code. The fact is that any Public Prosecutor under the amendment which the Bill proposes in the Code, whether he is appointed by the Government or whether he is appointed by a Magistrate, will now have power to withdraw from a prosecution, and it seems to me quite unnecessary to make any further extension of the provisions with regard to the appointment of the Public Prosecutor or with regard to his power to withdraw.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, not only is this amendment unnecessary but I am afraid it may work an injustice to the complainant. Under the law as it stands, under section 495, Honourable Members will notice, the complainant who wants to conduct a prosecution may do so either personally or by a pleader. If this amendment of Dr. Gour's is accepted and if you leave it to the District Magistrate to appoint a pleader to conduct the prosecution, it may imply that without such an appointment by the District Magistrate the complainant may not be entitled to appoint a pleader to conduct the prosecution. There is that risk. Apart from that, I think it is quite unsafe to leave the withdrawal of a prosecution of an offence which is not compoundable in the hands of private parties. Our system ought to aim at all prosecutions for offences in this country to be in the hands of independent prosecutors, prosecutors employed by the Crown. My ideal is to have a Director General of Prosecutions in every province and, under him, Prosecutors, Public Prosecutors, for every district, who will act as independent legal officers bringing a judicial mind to bear upon the conduct of prosecutions in this country. Private prosecutors, we know, Sir, often act from motives of vengeance, motives of spite, and a pleader engaged by a complainant oftentimes partakes of the feelings of the complainant. A Public Prosecutor ought to be above such sentiments and feelings. He is not there to get convictions, as has often been pointed out by Courts; the Public Prosecutor is there to get justice done, and therefore, in non-compoundable cases we ought not to leave it to a private public prosecutor to say, 'I withdraw from the case'; it ought to be left to the Public Prosecutor, and I therefore submit, Sir, that this amendment is unnecessary. The District Magistrate has now got the power to appoint persons to conduct a particular case. That, Sir, as has been pointed out, means to conduct a particular case as Public Prosecutor whether in the High Court and in the mufassil. There was never any difficulty felt, because there was a Public Prosecutor in the district who says you cannot appoint a Public Prosecutor to conduct a particular case. That difficulty was never felt,—I have been so appointed; I do not know where my Honourable friend gets the idea that it is only where the Public Prosecutor is not appointed or if the Public Prosecutor is absent from the district, then only a person can be appointed a Public Prosecutor for a case. In heavy batches of cases where riots take place, it is very common to appoint public prosecutors to conduct cases, although the Public Prosecutor of the district may be there and available. Therefore, there is nothing to prevent it, and I submit, Sir, that this amendment is unnecessary and likely to prove injurious to the complainant.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): I think, Sir, the House will be delighted to have a house divided against itself; and a party divided against itself is perhaps a better spectacle than a house divided against itself. I am rather inclined to think that sufficient importance has not been attached to the idea which Dr. Gour has in his mind in this matter. A point which seems to have escaped the notice of my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, and also of the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith, is this. There may be cases in which the Public Prosecutor, even in a non-compoundable case, will not be in a position to conduct the prosecution; for example the Public Prosecutor may have attachments to one of the parties, and it may not be desirable that he should be in a position to conduct the prosecution. Under those circumstances, supposing a person is appointed to be a public prosecutor, should he not have the power to withdraw? Apparently a great deal has been made both by Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith and Mr. Rangachariar based upon the apprehensions which they express, namely, that it is not desirable that in non-compoundable cases private persons should have the right to compound. Sir, these two Members have been to a certain extent confusing the right to withdraw with the right to compound. The two are distinct rights, and I do not think they have placed before themselves the distinctive character of each of these rights. What Dr. Gour wants is this. Not only the District Magistrate and the Sub-Divisional Magistrate should have power to appoint a Public Prosecutor in cases where the Public Prosecutor is unable to be present, but in all cases where it is desirable that a new pleader, that a new public prosecutor, should be appointed for a particular case, the District Magistrate should have the power. He wants to enlarge the powers of the District and the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, and I doubt very much whether the language is quite apt for conveying that meaning. If his view finds favour with the Government, the amendment may be differently drafted, such language may be used as would effectuate the purpose. The intention is this. Not only in cases where according to section 492 (2) the Public Prosecutor is absent or where a Public Prosecutor is not able to be present, but also in cases where it is desirable to supersede him and appoint a person for a particular case, the power should be vested in the District Magistrate for the purpose; and his power should not be circumscribed by the two conditions. If that idea is kept in view, you may use whatever language you like, even though Dr. Gour may have used language which may not be quite appropriate for the purpose, but that purpose should be effectuated by amending section 492 (2) in the manner suggested by Dr. Gour.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): Sir, it seems to me, with all respect, that there is a certain amount of confusion between the law as it now is and the law as it will be if the Bill now under consideration by this House is enacted. In the law as it now stands, we have a definition of public prosecutor covering every person appointed under section 492. But under section 494 we have the power of withdrawal from a prosecution permitted only to what I may describe as the original public prosecutor appointed by Government.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: No, No. 492 is being amended.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Yes, but I am speaking of the existing law. In the Bill we have the appointment of a Public Prosecutor extended to every case, from a mere insult to a murder—from a case which may terminate in an apology to a case which terminates on the gallows—and the Mover of the amendment seems to have overlooked what I may call the consequential amendment of section 494 which has provided for the very inconsistency which he thinks to exist. The power of withdrawal will not be reserved under the amended Act to the prosecutor appointed by the Government but to every public prosecutor as defined in section 4 and as appointed under section 492. That is how I read the amendment. If that view is correct, then it seems to me that my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has correctly described this proposed amendment as unnecessary. I have read the Bill very carefully, and I therefore agree with the view put forward by Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith and Mr. Rangachariar that in the circumstances, assuming that the proposed amendment of section 494 made by the Bill is carried, the amendment now proposed is unnecessary.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment* be made.
The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 129 stand part of the Bill.
The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move the following amendment:

"In clause 130, sub-clause (i), after the word 'omitted' add the following:
'and after the words 'Public Prosecutor' the words 'or complainant in proceedings instituted on complaints' shall be inserted'."

Sir, this clause 130, sub-clause (1), refers to section 494 which authorises any public prosecutor to withdraw any case from any Court. The Honourable Dr. Gour, when he moved his amendment, wanted this power to be extended even to other persons, whether they be public prosecutors or not, whether or not the case was a cognizable one or whether or not the case was a compoundable one. The explanations that came from the Government Benches and the opponents of Dr. Gour went to show that any person could be appointed as a Public Prosecutor for any purpose, and, the person who was appointed as a Public Prosecutor could also withdraw the case. But who is to appoint a Public Prosecutor? The Public Prosecutor is to be appointed either by the District Magistrate or, subject to the control of the District Magistrate, by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate. That means that in every case in which a person wants to withdraw the case he will have to approach the District Magistrate or the Sub-Divisional Magistrate to appoint him as a Public Prosecutor in that particular case and for that particular purpose, that is to withdraw the case. This involves an unnecessary burden on a complainant of approaching the District Magistrate for this purpose. In this very section 494, we also provide that even the Public Prosecutor cannot withdraw a case without the consent of the Court in which the case be pending. Therefore, when the consent of the Court has already been provided as necessary in this section, where is the necessity of asking the complainant to go to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate or the District Magistrate for a formal appointment of the complainant or his pleader as a Public Prosecutor for the purpose of withdrawing the case? Even the District Magistrate, were he so minded to appoint the complainant or his pleader as a Public Prosecutor to withdraw the case, would invariably consult the Magistrate in whose court the case be pending, to find out as to whether the case was of such an importance that permission to withdraw should not be given. Why should this further obstruction be put in the way of the complainant or his pleader to go to the Public Prosecutor? I think it would meet the ends of justice and is a sufficient safeguard that the Court concerned, that is the Court in which the case be pending, is required to give its consent for the withdrawal of the case to the complainant or to any other person. Sir, there may be many cases which are not cognizable, i.e., in which the police cannot arrest the accused without a warrant. In those cases in which the police cannot arrest an accused without a warrant or in those cases which are not compoundable, it should also be provided that the complainant or his pleader could withdraw with the consent of the Court. The Court could very well look after the interests of the State or the public. If the police thought that the case was of importance and in which the public was interested, the Court may not allow its withdrawal; but in every petty case, say, for instance, of insult, to approach the District Magistrate for the appointment of a Public Prosecutor or to send the record for the perusal of the Public Prosecutor to be appointed by the Government, would be a very tedious job and would much delay the trial of criminal cases. Therefore, I beg to move my amendment; but I shall be willing to accept any amendment of my amendment if any be suggested by the Government and if the Government Member accepts the principle, which I am afraid they do not, because Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith had said that the withdrawal of cases in non-compoundable cases should only be left in the hands of the Public Prosecutor. But from what I have said before, it would seem to be undesirable that in many petty cases this question of withdrawal be left in the hands of the Public Prosecutor or the District Magistrate.

* "In clause 129 (2) after the words 'same sub-section', insert the following:

With these words, Sir, I commend my amendment for the consideration of the House.

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, I submit to the House that the Assembly has twice very emphatically given its opinion on the subject raised by the Honourable Member. When he moved his amendment No. 226, he proposed that in all warrant cases instituted upon complaint, if the complainant was absent on the day fixed for hearing, then the Magistrate should be able to discharge the accused. Again, in his amendment No. 263, he suggested that all cases instituted upon complaint should be compoundable. In both those cases, Sir, I believe that the amendments secured the support of only one person in this House. The issue raised by the present amendment is exactly the same, and I would submit, therefore, that it is rather a waste of the time of the House to move it. Of course, as I pointed out on the first occasion, and as was accepted by the House, such a proposal really leaves the door open to blackmail and abuse of justice. The amendment would also be entirely in the wrong place, because this Chapter deals with Public Prosecutors and not with private complainants.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 180 was added to the Bill.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: My amendment seeks to substitute for the proposed proviso to clause 181, the following:

"Provided further that nothing in this section shall prevent a Magistrate acting under section 107, sub-section (4) or section 117, sub-section (3) from imposing such conditions as to him seem advisable before releasing the accused on bail."

This relates to the question of bail. Hitherto, there was no provision like the one which the draftsman on the present occasion has introduced. My object is that in regard to cases under section 107, clause (4), and section 117, sub-section (3), the Magistrate should have power to impose such conditions as would enable the accused person to be present whenever called upon. The House will find that section 107, clause (3), relates to proceedings for keeping the peace, and there is no reason why in such proceedings the Magistrate should not have power to impose conditions, because it does not really deal with an offence, it is really a preventive measure, and more than in non cognizable cases there should be every facility given to the Magistrate as well as to the accused to be bound by certain terms, and that the accused should not be detained in custody. Section 107, clause (3), says: "Where any Magistrate not empowered to proceed under sub-section (1) has reason to believe that any person is likely to commit a breach of the peace," and so on. Then, it says "after recording his reasons, issue a warrant for his arrest (if he is not already in custody or before the Court), and may send him before a Magistrate empowered to deal with the case, together with a copy of his reasons."

My amendment suggests that, instead of sending him in custody, the Magistrate may release him on such conditions as to him may seem advisable. A bond may be taken from him, so that he may appear when called upon. If you pass the clause as it is and if you bring in these provisos under section 496—the result of it will be that the Magistrate will have no power to impose such conditions upon the person who is asked to keep the peace; and the accused must necessarily be detained in custody. The proviso says:

"Provided further that nothing in this section shall be deemed to affect the provisions of section 107 etc."

Under these circumstances the House will see no difficulty in regard to the first part of my amendment, that is, as regards 107 (4).

There is some little difficulty as regards 117 (3). I am prepared to admit that; but I think even there it is desirable to extend the power. Some provision must be made for imposing conditions even on persons who are brought before the Court under section 117 (4). If the House will turn to section 117, clause (3), the Members will find that pending the completion of the inquiry under sub-section (1) the Magistrate if he consider that immediate measures are necessary for the prevention of a breach of peace or a disturbance of public tranquillity and so on may direct the person in respect of whom the order under section 112 has been made to execute a bond with or without surety for keeping peace or maintaining good behaviour until the conclusion of the inquiry, and may detain him in custody until such bond is executed or in default until the inquiry is concluded.

No doubt there is some provision here for executing a bond for keeping the peace; but the accused is to be detained in custody pending the execution of the bond. Now take a case where a Magistrate wants a bond with sureties. It will take the accused some time to find a surety. Why should he be detained in custody till he is able to find a surety? Why should he not be released on certain conditions that he agrees to, and why should he not be called upon to execute a bond afterwards?

As regards 107 (4) there is no difficulty whatsoever. It is a clear case, and I think it is a case of omission on the part of Government. As regards 117 (3) it is desirable that a provision like the one that I am asking to be introduced should be substituted for the present proviso. Sir, I move the amendment standing in my name.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, those Honourable Members who have studied the report of the Lowndes' Committee will find that they treated an amendment of section 496 on similar lines to those now in the Bill as absolutely consequential, and I submit, Sir, for the consideration of this House that that is really the position as regards the proviso which my Honourable friend proposes to omit from the Bill and for which he proposes to substitute another proviso. Of course section 496 refers to a person other than a person accused of a non-bailable offence. It therefore covers cases dealt with in the proviso and unless some such proviso is included, then the provisions of section 496 will practically, or might be thought to, override the provisions of section 107 (4) and section 117 (3), which have already been approved by this House.

As regards section 107 (4) my Honourable friend suggests that there is no doubt that his amendment should be accepted. I think, Sir, that this House has already, in connection with the amendment moved by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, on the 18th January, rejected that contention. My Honourable friend's motion was that any person who is detained in custody under sub-section (4) or is brought under arrest and so on should be able at once to make the final bond and secure release. That proposal was rejected, because it is covered by section 117(3). And that is my point now, Sir, as regards 107 (4). Section 107 (3) relates to a case when a Magistrate who does not have jurisdiction decides that immediate measures for the prevention of a breach of the public peace are necessary and arrests a person. He sends him to a Magistrate having jurisdiction and under sub-section (4) of section 107 the Magistrate is able to detain him in custody until he takes further action under the Chapter. The further action is taken practically at once, because the order under section 112 is read out and then immediately the provisions of section 117 (3) apply. We have those definite provisions, they have already been accepted by the House and I submit, Sir, that we certainly ought not to substitute for the proviso in the Bill the proviso recommended by my Honourable friend.

I would proceed a little further, Sir, with reference to the exact form of the amendment which has been moved. I would like, Sir, to ask my Honourable friend what conditions the Magistrate is going to include in the bond which he would cause to be executed if this proviso is accepted.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Not to address a meeting for a particular period.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Well, he can say "You shall not leave your house, never go outside your own house." Well, Sir, we have definitely in section 117 (3) covered both the cases of 107 (4) and 117 (3) and there is really no necessity for the amendment which my Honourable friend has moved.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I am afraid my Honourable friend, Mr. Tonkinson, has not sufficiently realised the difference between executing a bond as required by section 117 and a bail bond as required by section 496. The bail bond is for appearance at the inquiry whereas the bond required in section 117 (3) is the bond which will eventually have to be executed on the completion of the inquiry with sureties for keeping the peace or for good behaviour. That is the bond which he is called upon to execute under section 117 (3). Now, Sir, in a case where the person is not convicted of any offence—in fact he is not even accused of an offence—the Magistrate should not have the power to detain him in custody when he is prepared to execute a bond for his appearance. That is all my

[Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar.]

Honourable friend proposes. My amendment was to give absolute power to give bail, which I dropped in favour of Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's modest amendment, because a Magistrate taking a bail bond may impose also certain conditions suited to the case. Therefore I do not see how anybody suffers. It is not that we are anxious to shut a man up in jail whether he is a good man or a bad man. It is not an easy job to find sureties. Many an innocent person is kept in jail because he is not able to find sureties. In the case of a bail bond for appearance I am sure people will be more readily found to stand surety, but to get people to stand surety for good behaviour and for keeping the peace may be more difficult. Therefore there is a good deal of force in Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's amendment, and my Honourable friend Mr. Tonkinson tried to confuse the issue by referring it an amendment of mine at a former stage which was altogether a different amendment from the present one. There I asked that the man may be released if he executes an ad interim bond. That was my amendment—an ad interim bond on the same terms and on the same conditions as would apply to a bond which he will have to execute, that is, the security bond itself. But Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's idea is not a security bond, but a bail bond under section 496, namely, a bail bond for appearance. Therefore, Sir, I support the amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, just one word. Mr. Rangachariar has explained that the intention of Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's amendment is to enable a Magistrate, instead of acting under section 117 (3) and taking an interim bond for good behaviour during the proceedings, to take bail for appearance with conditions imposed. I desire, Sir, to point out to the House that Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's amendment will not achieve that. It merely lays down, Sir, that when a Magistrate acts under section 117 (3), that is to say, takes an interim bond from the accused, or gives the accused an opportunity of furnishing an interim bond for his good behaviour, the Magistrate will then in addition to the terms of the bond be able to impose further conditions. As Mr. Tonkinson pointed out, by adopting this amendment the House will be giving to the Magistrate an opportunity to impose all sorts of onerous conditions on the accused. All we want, Sir, is that the accused during the pendency of the proceedings should be of good behaviour; we do not want to empower the Magistrate to say in addition to that—as Mr. Tonkinson suggested—"You shall not leave your house; you shall stay in a particular place and you are to report yourself at the police station every day." All these conditions will be possible under Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's amendment and I think it is distinctly undesirable that that power should be put in the hands of a Magistrate.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Sir, I venture to oppose the amendment. It seems to me that the proviso entered in clause 131 of the Bill is as necessary for Legislative consistency as the amendment proposed by the Honourable Mover would be inconsistent. We have legislated already on sections 107 and 117 of the Criminal Procedure Code—preventive sections the primary objects of which are to prevent breaches of the peace and to secure good behaviour. A person brought up under section 107 to keep the peace is not a person accused of any offence whatever; therefore, as Mr. Tonkinson has very clearly pointed out, he is not a person accused of a non-bailable offence, and he can claim to be released on bail as a matter of right the moment he is brought before the court, if the proviso now proposed by the Bill is not introduced. By sections 107 and 117, as amended by us, we have given a discretion to the Magistrate to detain such a person until the preventive sanctions have been obtained. If the proviso proposed by the Bill to be added to section 496 is not enacted we shall immediately take that discretion away; that is inconsistent. A small illustration will perhaps make clear what the effect of the amendment would be having in mind the clear explanation of the difference between a bond to keep the peace and a bail bond, given by my friend, Mr. Ramachariar. A and B anxious to get at each other like two fighting cocks are brought up before a Magistrate who requires them to execute bonds to keep the peace. The Magistrate is of opinion from the evidence before him that, if these two persons are not detained until that bond is executed and they have been bound down as far as they can be bound down to peace by such a bond, a breach of the peace between them will take place. Now, if these people can claim (as they would be able to do under the amendment now proposed or as they would be able to do if the proviso sought to be introduced by the Bill is not introduced) to be released on bail as soon as they are brought up, what is likely to happen? They will gladly find bail for the sake of going and having their fight. Where then would come in the preventive provisions of section 107? A man who is desirous about committing a breach of the peace against any person or body of persons will give a bail bond for his appearance without any difficulty, and then he will go and commit his breach of the peace and then appear in answer to his bail bond. No bond will be broken; there will be no forfeiture, but the breach of the peace which the section was intended to prevent will have taken place. Therefore, for the sake of consistency, the proviso which is sought to be introduced by the Bill is absolutely necessary, and I oppose the amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

Clause 131 was added to the Bill.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas (Sind: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I move this amendment* that stands in my name and for explanation make the following observations. The clause of which mine is an amendment is an amendment of section 497 of the Criminal Procedure Code. That provision relates to bail and as the law now stands under section 497 the Magistrate has got discretion to grant bail in non-bailable cases only where there appear reasonable grounds for believing that the accused is not guilty of the offence. Section 497 runs:

"When any person accused of any non-bailable offence is arrested or detained without warrant by the officer in charge of a police-station, or appears or is brought before a Court, he may be released on bail, but he shall not be so released if there appear reasonable grounds for believing that he has been guilty of the offence of which he is accused."

Clause (i) of the Bill proposes to substitute words "an offence punishable with death or transportation for life" for the words "the offence of which he is accused." Now in one way this clause is intended to liberalise the bail provisions as they now stand by not fettering the discretion of the Magistrate in granting bail as it was fettered before so that if there were grounds for believing that the accused was guilty of the offence the Magistrate had no discretion to grant bail, but now he has, except in cases

* "In clause 132 (i), omit the words from 'in sub-section (1)' to the word 'substituted' and in their place substitute the following:

'in sub-section (1) the words beginning with the words 'but he shall not be' to the end of the sub-section shall be omitted.'

[Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas.]

where the offence is punishable with death or transportation for life. But if you look into the question a little deeper, this provision in another respect is rather illiberal and goes backwards from the present law. Because under the present law, unless the Magistrate is of opinion that there are reasonable grounds for believing that the man is guilty of an offence punishable with death or transportation for life, he can release him on bail even in cases of such offences, that is to say, if he thinks, or I may put it roughly although I may not be precisely accurate, if the Magistrate thinks that the case is a doubtful one or if he does not think that the accused is guilty of the offences punishable with death or transportation for life. Under the present law he has got the discretion of granting bail in such cases also, but this proviso takes away that right from him, because the section reads thus:

"When any person accused of any non-bailable offence is arrested or detained without warrant by an officer in charge of a police station or appears, or is brought before a Court, he may be released on bail, but he shall not be so released if there appear reasonable grounds for believing that he has been guilty of the offence of which he is accused."

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: That was so even before.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: I stand corrected, and so far as this part of my speech is concerned, I think I was wrong. Further, I say that the discretion even as regards these offences should not be withdrawn from the Magistrate, because I understand that the conditions attaching to the refusal of bail in all civilized countries, at least in some civilized countries that I am aware of, are that provision should be made to see that the accused person does not run away or escape justice, but otherwise so long as he is under trial his liberty should be granted to him until he is convicted. For that reason I would like that the whole of this clause, as it has been provided, should be withdrawn so that in all cases whether this condition which is prescribed in the last clause of the sub-section exists or not, the Magistrate should have discretion to grant bail.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, I have refrained consistently during this month from taking part in the debate over this Bill. I venture, however, this morning to intervene in this debate on the ground that the issue to-day seems to be somewhat important, and secondly on a much more slender ground, that at one time—I do recollect it—I was an unpaid Magistrate, and some years before that still I had my legal training at the University Examination.

Now, Sir, speaking of the merits of this amendment and the issue involved, it seems to me that the amendment which Government propose to make in the Criminal Procedure Code, and on which my friend, Mr. Harchandrai, has just now spoken, is not a desirable one. Section 497 (1) deals with non-bailable offences. The Magistrate under that section has the ordinary discretion to release an arrested person on bail, but that section proceeds to say that he shall not be released if there appear reasonable grounds for believing that he has been guilty of the offence with which he is charged. Government now come forward and say that they want to stiffen this section up. (A Voice: "No, no. It is just the other way about.") Government say that the accused shall not be released if the Magistrate has reasonable grounds to believe that he will be guilty of an offence punishable with death. That is the criterion which Government now

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: It is not the Government; it is the Joint Committee.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: Or rather the Joint Committee—the criterion which the Joint Committee seek to introduce is the nature of the punishment. Now we shall take an illustration. Supposing a man is charged under section 400 of the Indian Penal Code, which is a section which deals with breach of trust as a public servant or as a banker, or as a merchant or as an attorney or as a broker or as an agent. Now, technically speaking, that offence is a non-bailable offence and also the punishment provided for it is transportation for life. Both these conditions are satisfied, if I read the Indian Penal Code aright. Now in such a case what is the Magistrate to do? Take the case of a banker in Bombay who is charged, say, with breach of trust or an attorney with breach of trust about a document. Now if the Magistrate puts the strictest construction on this section, he will say the punishment in this case is transportation for life, and I am not going to release even the biggest banker on bail. Is that a correct criterion? The correct criterion should be not whether the punishment for that offence is transportation for life but whether the man will abscond. Now, I will take another section of the Indian Penal Code. Take section 477 which deals with tampering with a will or with the authority to adopt a son. Now supposing a man is charged before a Magistrate with these offences. Now these are non-bailable offences and these are also punishable with transportation for life as an extreme punishment. What is the Magistrate to do if he reads this amendment strictly according to the letter? He will have no other alternative but to refuse bail. Now, a man who is charged with these offences, really speaking, may deserve bail. The only criterion, therefore, which should be introduced is whether the man is likely to abscond and defeat the ends of justice. The wording as proposed by Government does not satisfy that criterion, and I therefore think that I should support this amendment.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, the provisions relating to bail have been the subject-matter of controversy for a large number of years, and the fact that no less than 16 or 18 amendments find their place on the agenda paper shows the wide interest this section of the Criminal Procedure Code evoked in this House. There is no doubt, Sir, judging from the multiplicity of amendments that we are dissatisfied with the present draft, and judging from their multiplicity, there is no reason whatever, Sir, to doubt that we are not quite satisfied with our own drafts. But the fact remains that there is a strong consensus of opinion in this House that the whole of the provisions relating to bail require re-examination and over-hauling, and here, I submit, it is the duty of the Government and the Government draftsmen to meet the generally expressed wishes of this House and bring the provisions of section 497 in conformity with our wishes. Honourable Members will find that there are two pertinent provisions embodied in the Code of Criminal Procedure which deal with the subject of bail. So far as the High Courts and the Courts of Session are concerned, they possess an unlimited and unfettered power to release any person on bail. That is section 498. But, when we descend from the High Court and the Court of Sessions to the Magistracy, we are immediately confronted with the qualifications which surround section 497 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Now, Sir, the release of a person on bail is often demanded after his arrest and before his trial and sometimes during his trial but before his conviction. In other words, the provisions of section 497 are brought into requisition in a case which is then sub-judice. What does the existing provision, however, provide? It says: no Magistrate shall release a person on bail if there appear reasonable grounds for believing that he has been guilty of the offence of which he is accused. The Magistrate is to prejudge the case and he is to say to the accused: I have reasonable grounds for believing that you have been guilty of this offence; therefore, whatever may be the reasons which would move me to release you on bail, you cannot be released on bail. That is the sole criterion from which Magistrates in India regard the question of bail. Now, if we turn to the English law, we shall find a very different criterion there for releasing persons on bail, and, in inviting this House to adopt either the one or the other, I shall ask the House to remember what is the underlying principle for arresting a person and releasing him on bail. It requires no large legal training such as my Honourable friend, the last speaker, possesses, nor need one be an unpaid Magistrate to understand that. When a man is arrested, the sole and single purpose of his arrest is that he should not run away, and, when he is released on bail, the sole criterion for releasing him on bail and fixing the quantity of bail is that he should not run away. (Mr. N. M. Samarth: "Nor commit suicide.") Very few people do that; and even people under arrest sometimes commit suicide. That is, then, the sole criterion. Well, I submit, if the Magistrate is assured that the man is not likely to run away—(The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: "How?")—because the quantum of bail, the amount of bail which he gives is the best security against his absconding, is there any reason why he should be detained in custody? That, I submit, is what my friend the Mover of this amendment wants. You shall not prejudge a case, you shall not decide, before you have heard the evidence, whether the accused should be released on bail or not. You place yourself in a position of grave embarrassment to yourself, and you cause unnecessary suspicion in the mind of the accused against the impartiality of the very tribunal before whom his trial is pending. The Magistrate says: "I cannot release you on bail because during the course of this trial I have to examine and see whether you are not guilty, or, at any rate, whether there are not reasonable grounds for believing that you are guilty. I believe that there are reasonable grounds for believing that you are guilty." Well, the accused says: "Sir, you have prejudiced my case. You have prejudged me. You may not release me on bail, but it is perfectly obvious to me that after those observations I cannot consider you to be as impartial as I should expect a judicial tribunal to be." That, I submit, is a wrong view. That, I submit, places the Magistrate in a position of great awkwardness. That, I submit, is a principle of law which is not only contrary to the English law but contrary to the very first principles upon which arrest is made and bail granted. Therefore, Sir, this House demands that you shall place a right principle before the Magistracy for the release of persons on bail. What is the object you have in view? It is that the offender should not escape from justice. Make sure of it and make that the sole criterion for arresting, for keeping under arrest, or for releasing a person on bail. That, I submit, is a salutary principle. I have already pointed out to the Honourable Members that in the case of the High Court and the Court of Sessions, this is the principle. In fact, as I have said in the earlier part of my speech, they have an unlimited and unfettered power of releasing any person at any time on bail. Why should not the same power be conferred upon a Magistrate who has studied the case, who has probably recorded part of the evidence and before whom the facts are laid by both sides with greater fullness than they can be in the miscellaneous papers filed before the Sessions Court or the High Court. I submit, Sir, that the Government should meet us halfway at any rate upon this point. The provisions of law which they ask the House to concur in are unacceptable to us. They must revise their draft and, if they can show that the object of the Legislature, that the object of the Government would be sufficiently fulfilled if the accused does not escape justice, they shall have combined commonsense with justice.

1 P.M.

Now, Sir, one more point and I have done. Honourable Members will find that the Government draft that is to say, the draft in the Bill is a great improvement on the existing law. It proposes to remedy the rigour of the present Code of Criminal Procedure by allowing the release of persons in circumstances mentioned in the proviso, even in cases where the offence is punishable with death or transportation for life. That is a wholesome change. We welcome it, but, at the same time, I would ask the Government in this connection to see that by the mere enumeration of circumstances which they have provided in their proviso now sought to be added to section 497 they have left out a large number of cases ejusdem generis which they could not compendiously enumerate and which would perhaps more conveniently have been stated in a more general principle. If these two conditions are fulfilled there will be no necessity to press the numerous amendments of which notice has been given and I hope, Sir, that the Government will see their way to compromising with the various authors of the amendments upon the lines I have indicated.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, has informed us of what must be clear to anyone from a perusal of this page of amendments that Honourable Members opposite have not been able to suggest any satisfactory criterion to propose in substitution for the provisions in the Bill.
